INTRODUCTION

WHEN Richard Steele, in number 555 of his Spectator, signed its last paper and named those who had most helped him 'to keep up the spirit of so long and approved a performance, he gave chief honour to one who had on his page, as in his heart, no name but Friend. This was 'the gentleman of whose assistance I formerly boasted in the Preface 'and concluding Leaf of my Tatlers. I am indeed much more proud of his long-continued 'Friendship, than I should be of the fame of being thought the author of any writings 'which he himself is capable of producing. I remember when I finished the Tender Husband, I told him there was nothing I so ardently wished, as that we might some time 'or other publish a work, written by us both, which should bear the name of THE 'MONUMENT, in Memory of our Friendship.' Why he refers to such a wish, his next words show. The seven volumes of the Spectator, then complete, were to his mind The Monument, and of the Friendship it commemorates he wrote, 'I heartily wish what I 'have done here were as honorary to that sacred name as learning, wit, and humanity 'render those pieces which I have taught the reader how to distinguish for his.' So wrote Steele, and the Spectator will bear witness how religiously his friendship was returned. In number 453, when, paraphrasing David's Hymn on Gratitude, the 'rising soul' of Addison surveyed the mercies of his God, was it not Steele whom he felt near to him at the Mercy-seat as he wrote

Thy bounteous hand with worldly bliss
Has made my cup run o'er,
And in a kind and faithful Friend
Has doubled all my store?

The Spectator, Steele-and-Addison's Spectator, is a monument befitting the most memorable friendship in our history. Steele was its projector, founder, editor, and he was writer of that part of it which took the widest grasp upon the hearts of men. His sympathies were with all England. Defoe and he, with eyes upon the future, were the truest leaders of their time. It was the firm hand of his friend Steele that helped Addison up to the place in literature which became him. It was Steele who caused the nice critical taste which Addison might have spent only in accordance with the fleeting fashions of his time to be inspired with all Addison's religious earnestness, and to be enlivened with the free play of that sportive humour, delicately whimsical and gaily wise, which made his conversation the delight of the few men with whom he sat at ease. It was Steele who drew his friend towards the days to come, and made his gifts the wealth of a whole people. Steele said in one of the later numbers of his Spectator, No 532, to which he prefixed a motto that assigned to himself only the part of whetstone to the wit of others, 'I claim to myself the merit of having extorted excellent productions from a 'person of the greatest abilities, who would not have let them appear by any other means.' There were those who argued that he was too careless of his own fame in unselfish labour for the exaltation of his friend, and, no doubt, his rare generosity of temper has been often misinterpreted. But for that Addison is not answerable. And why should Steele have defined his own merits? He knew his countrymen, and was in too genuine accord with the spirit of a time then distant but now come, to doubt that, when he was dead, his whole life's work would speak truth for him to posterity.

The friendship of which this work is the monument remained unbroken from boyhood until death. Addison and Steele were schoolboys together at the Charterhouse. Addison was a dean's son, and a private boarder, Steele, fatherless, and a boy on the foundation. They were of like age. The register of Steele's baptism, corroborated by the entry made on his admission to the Charterhouse (which also implies that he was baptized on the day of his birth) is March 12, 1671, Old Style, New Style, 1672. Addison was born on May-day, 1672. Thus there was a difference of only seven weeks.

Steele's father according to the register, also named Richard, was an attorney in Dublin.<sup>1</sup> Steele seems to draw from experience—although he is not writing as of himself or bound to any truth of personal detail—when in No. 181 of the Tatler he speaks of his father as having died when he was not quite five years of age, and of his mother as 'a very beautiful woman, of a noble spirit.' The first Duke of Ormond is referred to by Steele in his Dedication to the Lying Lover as the patron of his infancy, and it was by this nobleman that a place was found for him, when in his thirteenth year, among the foundation boys at the Charterhouse, where he first met with Joseph Addison, who was at school at Lichfield in 1683-4-5, went to the Charterhouse in 1686, and left in 1687, when he was entered of Queen's College, Oxford. Steele went to Oxford two years later, matriculating at Christ Church, March 13, 1689-90, the year in which Addison was elected a Deny of Magdalene. A letter of introduction from Steele, dated April 2, 1711, refers to the administration of the will of 'my uncle Gascoigne, to whose bounty I owe a liberal education. This only representative of the family ties into which Steele was born, an 'uncle' whose surname is not that of Steele's mother before marriage, appears, therefore, to have died just before or at the time when the Spectator undertook to publish a sheetful of thoughts every morning, and—Addison here speaking for him—looked forward to 'leaving his country, when he was summoned out of it, with the secret satisfaction of thinking that he had not lived in vain.' To Steele's warm heart Addison's friendship stood for all home blessings he had missed. The sister's playful grace, the brother's love, the mother's sympathy and simple faith in God, the father's guidance, where were these for Steele, if not in his friend Addison?

Addison's father was a dean, his mother was the sister of a bishop, and his ambition as a schoolboy, or his father's ambition for him, was only that he should be one day a prosperous and pious dignitary of the Church. But there was in him, as in Steele, the genius which shaped their lives to its own uses, and made them both what they are to us now. Joseph Addison was born into a home which the steadfast labour of his father, Lancelot, had made prosperous and happy. Lancelot Addison had earned success. His father, Joseph's grandfather, had been also a clergyman, but he was one of those Westminster clergy of whose simplicity and poverty many a joke has been made. Lancelot got his education as a poor child in the Appleby Grammar School, but he made as own way when at College, was too avowed a Royalist to satisfy the Commonwealth, and got for his zeal, at the Restoration, small reward in a chaplaincy to the garrison at Dunkirk. This was changed, for the worse, to a position of the same sort at Tangier, where he remained eight years. He lost that office by misadventure, and would have been left destitute if Mr. Joseph Williamson had not given him a living of £120 a year at Milston in Wiltshire. Upon this Lancelot Addison married Jane Gulstone, who was the daughter of a Doctor of Divinity, and whose brother became Bishop of Bristol. In the little Wiltshire parsonage Joseph Addison and his younger brothers and sisters were born. The essayist was named Joseph after his father's patron, afterwards Sir Joseph Williamson, a friend high in office. While the children grew, the father worked. He showed his ability and loyalty in books on West Barbary, and Mahomet, and the State of the Jews, and he became one of the King's chaplains in ordinary at a time when his patron Joseph Williamson was Secretary of State. Joseph Addison was then but three years old. Soon afterwards the busy father became Archdeacon of Salisbury, and he was made Dean of Lichfield in 1683, when his boy Joseph had reached the age of 11. When Archdeacon of Salisbury, the Rev Lancelot Addison sent Joseph to school at Salisbury, and when his father became Dean of Lichfield, Joseph was sent to school at Lichfield, as before said, in the years 1683-4-5. And then he was sent as a private pupil to the Charterhouse. The friendship he there formed with Steele was ratified by the approval of the Dean. The desolate boy with the warm heart, bright intellect, and noble aspirations, was earned home by his friend, at holiday times, into the Lichfield Deanery, where, Steele wrote afterwards to Congreve in a Dedication of the Drummer, 'were things of this nature to be exposed to public view, I could show under the Dean's own hand, in the warmest terms, his blessing on the friendship between his son and me, nor had he a child who did not prefer me in the first place of kindness and esteem, as their father loved me like one of them.' Addison had two brothers, of whom one traded and became Governor of Fort George in India, and the other became, like himself, a Fellow of Magdalene College, Oxford. Of his three sisters two died young, the other married twice, her first husband being a French refugee minister who became a Prebendary of Westminster. Of this sister of Addison's, Swift said she was 'a sort of wit, very like him.' 'I was not fond of her.'

In the latter years of the seventeenth century, when Steele and Addison were students at Oxford, most English writers were submissive to the new strength of the critical genius of France. But the English nation had then newly accomplished the great Revolution that secured its liberties, was thinking for itself, and calling forth the energies of writers who spoke for the people and looked to the people for approval and support. A new period was then opening, of popular influence on English literature. They were the young days of the influence now full grown, then slowly getting strength and winning the best minds away from an imported Latin style adapted to the taste of patrons who sought credit for nice critical discrimination. In 1690 Addison had been three years, Steele one year, at Oxford. Boileau was then living, fifty-four years old, and Western Europe was submissive to his sway as the great monarch of literary criticism. Boileau was still living when Steele published his Tatler, and died in the year of the establishment of the Spectator. Boileau, a true-hearted man, of genius and sense, advanced his countrymen from the nice weighing of words by the Precieuses and the grammarians, and by the French Academy, child of the intercourse between those ladies and gentlemen. He brought ridicule on the inane politeness of a style then in its decrepitude, and bade the writers of his time find models in the Latin writers who, like Virgil and Horace, had brought natural thought and speech to their perfection. In the preceding labour for the rectifying of the language, preference had been given to French words of Latin origin. French being one of those languages in which Latin is the chief constituent, this was but a far following of the desire to make it run pure from its source. If the English critics who, in Charles the Second's time, submitted to French law, had seen its spirit, instead of paying blind obedience to the letter, they also would have looked back to the chief source of their language. Finding this to be not Latin but Saxon, they would have sought to give it strength and harmony, by doing then what, in the course of nature, we have learnt again to do, now that the patronage of literature has gone from the cultivated noble who appreciates in much accordance with the fashion of his time, and passed into the holding of the English people. Addison and Steele lived in the transition time between these periods. They were born into one of them and—Steele immediately, Addison through Steele's influence upon him—they were trusty guides into the other. Thus the Spectator is not merely the best example of their skill. It represents also, perhaps best represents, a wholesome Revolution in our Literature. The essential character of English Literature was no more changed than characters of Englishmen were altered by the Declaration of Right which Prince William of Orange had accepted with the English Crown, when Addison had lately left and Steele was leaving Charterhouse for Oxford. Yet change there was, and Steele saw to the heart of it, even in his College days.

Oxford in times not long past, had inclined to faith in divine right of kings. Addison's father, a church dignitary who had been a Royalist during the Civil War, laid stress upon obedience to authority in Church and State. When modern literature was discussed or studied at Oxford there would be the strongest disposition to maintain the commonly accepted authority of French critics, who were really men of great ability, correcting bad taste in their predecessors, and conciliating scholars by their own devout acceptance of the purest Latin authors as the types of a good style or proper method in the treatment of a subject. Young Addison found nothing new to him in the temper of his University, and was influenced, as in his youth every one must and should be, by the prevalent tone of opinion in cultivated men. But he had, and felt that he had, wit and genius of his own. His sensitive mind was simply and thoroughly religious, generous in its instincts, and strengthened in its nobler part by close communion with the mind of his friend Steele. May we not think of the two friends together in a College chamber, Addison of slender frame, with features wanting neither in dignity nor in refinement, Steele of robust make, with the radiant 'short face' of the Spectator, by right of which he claimed for that worthy his admission to the Ugly Club. Addison reads Dryden, in praise of whom he wrote his earliest known verse, or reads endeavours of his own, which his friend Steele warmly applauds. They dream together of the future, Addison sage, but speculative, and Steele practical, if rash. Each is disposed to find God in the ways of life, and both avoid that outward show of irreligion, which, after the recent Civil Wars, remains yet common in the country, as reaction from an ostentatious piety which laid on burdens of restraint, a natural reaction which had been intensified by the base influence of a profligate King. Addison, bred among the preachers, has a little of the preacher's abstract tone, when talk between the friends draws them at times into direct expression of the sacred sense of life which made them one. Apart also from the mere accidents of his childhood, a speculative turn in Addison is naturally stronger than in Steele. He relishes analysis of thought. Steele came as a boy from the rough world of shame and sorrow, his great, kindly heart is most open to the realities of life, the state and prospects of his country, direct personal sympathies, actual wrongs, actual remedies. Addison is sensitive, and has among strangers the reserve of speech and aspect which will pass often for coldness and pride, but is, indeed, the shape taken by modesty in thoughtful men whose instinct it is to speculate and analyze, and who become self-conscious, not through conceit, but because they cannot help turning their speculations also on themselves. Steele wholly comes out of himself as his heart hastens to meet his friend. He lives in his surroundings and, in friendly intercourse, fixes his whole thought on the worth of his companion. Never abating a jot of his ideal of a true and perfect life, or ceasing to uphold the good because he cannot live to the full height of his own argument, he is too frank to conceal the least or greatest of his own shortcomings. Delight and strength of a friendship like that between Steele and Addison are to be found, as many find them, in the charm and use of a compact where characters differ so much that one lays open as it were a fresh world to the other, and each draws from the other aid of forces which the friendship makes his own. But the deep foundations of this friendship were laid in the religious earnestness that was alike in both, and in religious earnestness are laid also the foundations of this book, its Monument.

Both Addison and Steele wrote verse at College. From each of them we have a poem written at nearly the same age, Addison's in April, 1694, Steele's early in 1695. Addison drew from literature a metrical 'Account of the Greatest English Poets.' Steele drew from life the grief of England at the death of William's Queen, which happened on the 28th of December, 1694.

Addison, writing in that year, and at the age of about 23, for a College friend,

A short account of all the Muse possess,
That, down from Chaucer's days to Dryden's tunes
Have spent their noble rage in British rhymes, was so far under the influence of French critical authority, as accepted by most cultivators of polite literature at Oxford and wherever authority was much respected, that from 'An Account of the Greatest English Poets' he omitted Shakespeare. Of Chaucer he then knew no better than to say, what might have been said in France, that —age has rusted what the Poet writ

Worn out his language, and obscured his wit
In vain he jests in his unpolish'd strain,
And tries to make his readers laugh in vain

Oh! Spenser next warm'd with poetic rage,
In ancient tales amused a barbarous age,
But now the mystic tale, that pleased of yore,
Can charm an understanding age no more

It cost Addison some trouble to break loose from the critical cobweb of an age of periwigs and patches, that accounted itself 'understanding,' and the grand epoch of our Elizabethan literature, 'barbarous.' Rivier, one of its critics, had said, that 'in the neighing of an horse, or in the growling of a mastiff, there is a meaning, there is as lively expression, and may I say, more humanity than many times in the tragical flights of 'Shakespeare.' Addison, with a genius of his own helped to free movement by the sympathies of Steele, did break through the cobwebs of the critics, but he carried off a little of their web upon his wings. We see it when in the Spectator he meets the prejudices of an 'understanding age' and partly justifies his own, by finding reason for his admiration of Clara Chase and the Rubis in the Wood, in their great similarity to works of Virgil. We see it also in some of the criticisms which accompany his admirable working out of the resolve to justify his true natural admiration of the poetry of Milton, by showing that Paradise Lost as planned after the manner of the ancients, and supreme even in its obedience to the laws of Aristotle. In his Spectator papers on Imagination he but half escapes from the conventions of his time, which detested the wildness of a mountain pass, thought Salisbury Plain one of the finest prospects in England, planned parks with circles and straight lines of trees, despised our old cathedrals for their 'Gothic art, and saw perfection in the Roman architecture, and the round dome of St Paul's. Yet in these and all such papers of his we find that Addison had broken through the weaker prejudices of the day opposing them with sound natural thought of his own. Among cultivated readers, lesser moulders of opinion, there can be no doubt that his genius was only the more serviceable in amendment of the tastes of his own time, for friendly understanding and a partial sharing of ideas for which it gave itself no little credit.

It is noticeable, however, that in his Account of the Greatest English Poets, young Addison gave a fifth part of the piece to expression of the admiration he felt even then for Milton. That his appreciation became critical, and, although limited, based on a sense of poetry which brought him near to Milton, Addison proved in the Spectator by his eighteen Saturday papers upon Paradise Lost. But it was from the religious side that he first entered into the perception of its grandeur. His sympathy with its high purpose caused him to prize, in the same pages that commended Paradise Lost to his countrymen, another 'epic, Blackmore's Creation, a dull metrical treatise against atheism as a work which deserved to be looked upon as 'one of the most useful and 'noble productions of our English verse.' The reader, he added, of a piece which shared certainly with Salisbury Plain the charms of stateliness and extent of space, 'the reader cannot but be pleased to find the depths of philosophy enlivened with all the charms of 'poetry, and to see so great a strength of reason amidst so beautiful a redundancy of the 'imagination.' The same strong sympathy with Blackmore's purpose in it blinded Dr Johnson also to the failure of this poem, which is Blackmore's best. From its religious side, then, it may be that Addison, when a student at Oxford, first took his impressions of the poetry of Milton. At Oxford he accepted the opinion of France on Milton's art, but honestly declared, in spite of that, unchecked enthusiasm

Whatever his pen describes I more than see,
Whilst every verse, arrayed in majesty,
Bold and sublime, my whole attention draws,
And seems above the critic's nicer laws.

This chief place among English poets Addison assigned to Milton, with his mind fresh from the influences of a father who had openly contemned the Commonwealth, and by whom he had been trained so to regard Milton's service of it that of this he wrote

Oh, had the Poet ne'er profaned his pen,
To tarnish o'er the guilt of faithless men,
His other works might have deserved applause!
But now the tragic age can't support the cause.
While the clear current, tho' serene and bright,
Betrays a bottom eddies to the sight

If we turn now to the verse written by Steele in his young Oxford days and within twelve months of the date of Addison's lines upon English poets, we have what Steele called 'The Procession'. It is the procession of those who followed to the grave the good Queen Mary, dead of small-pox, at the age of 32. Steele shared his friend Addison's delight in Milton, and had not, indeed, got beyond the sixth number of the Tatler before he compared the natural beauty and innocence of Milton's Adam and Eve with Dryden's treatment of their love. But the one man for whom Steele felt most enthusiasm was not to be sought through books, he was a living moulder of the future of the nation. Eagerly intent upon King William, the hero of the Revolution that secured our liberties, the young patriot found in him also the hero of his verse. Keen sense of the realities about him into which Steele had been born, spoke through the very first lines of this poem:

The days of man are doom'd to pain and strife,
Quiet and ease are foreign to our life,
No satisfaction is, below, sincere,
Pleasure itself has something that's severe.

Britain had rejoiced in the high fortune of King William, and now a mourning world attended his wife to the tomb. The poor were her first and deepest mourners, poor from many causes, and then Steele pictured with warm sympathy, from a form of human suffering. Among those mourning poor were mothers who, in the despair of want, would have stabbed infants sobbing for their food,

But in the thought they stopp'd, their looks they tore,
Threw down the steel, and cruelly forbore
The innocents their parents' love forgive, Smile at their fate, nor know they are to live.

To the mysteries of such distress the dead queen penetrated, by her 'cunning to be good'. After the poor marched the House of Commons in the funeral procession. Steele gave only two lines to it:

With dread concern, the awful Senate came,
Their grief as all their passions, is the same
The next Assembly dissipates our fears,
The stately, mourning throng of British Peers.

A factious intemperance then characterized debates of the Commons, while the House of Lords stood in the front of the Revolution, and secured the permanency of its best issues. Steele describes, as they pass, Ormond, Somers, Villars, who leads the horse of the dead queen, that 'heaves into big sighs when he would neigh'—the verse has in it crudity as well as warmth of youth—and then follow the funeral chariot, the jewelled mourners, and the ladies of the court,

Their clouded beauties speak man's gaudy strife,
The glittering miseries of human life.

I yet see, Steele adds, this queen passing to her coronation in the place whither she now is carried to her grave. On the way, through acclamations of her people, to receive her crown,

She unconcerned and careless all the while Rewards their loud applauses with a smile,
With easy Majesty and humble State
Smiles at the trifling Power, and knows its date.

But now

What hands commit the beautiful, good, and just,
The dearer part of William, to the dust?
In her his vital heat, his glory lies
In her the Monarch lived, in her he dies.

* * * * *
No form of state makes the Great Man forego
The task due to her love and to his woe
Since his kind frame can't the large suffering bear
In pity to his People, he's not here
For to the mighty loss we now receive
The next affliction were to see him grieve.

If we look from these serious strains of their youth to the literary expression of the rarer side of character in the two friends we find Addison sheltering his taste for playful writing behind a Roman Wall of his own making. For among his Latin poems in the Oxford Muse Anglicana are eighty or ninety lines of resonant Latin verse upon 'Mælinæ Gesticulationes, or the Puppet-show'. Steele, taking life as he found it, and expressing mirth in his own way of conversation, wrote an English comedy, and took the word of a College friend that it was successful. There were two paths in life then open to an English writer. One was the smooth and level way of patronage, the other a rough up-hill track for men who struggled in the service of the people. The way of patronage was honourable. The age had been made so very discerning by the Romans and the French that a true understanding of the beauties of literature was confined to the select few who had been taught what to admire. Fine writing was beyond the rude appreciation of the multitude. It is, therefore, the reading public been much larger than it was, men of fastidious taste, who paid as much deference to polite opinion as Addison did in his youth, could have expected only audience fit but few, and would have been without encouragement to the pursuit of letters unless patronage rewarded merit. The other way had charms only for the stout-hearted pioneer who forsook where the road was to be made that now is the great highway of our literature. Addison went out into the world by the way of his name, Steele by the way of ours.

Addison, after the campaign of 1695, offered to the King the homage of a paper of verses on the capture of Namur, and presented them through Sir John Somers, then Lord Keeper of the Great Seal. To Lord Somers he sent with them a flattering dedication addressed to Somers who was esteemed a man of taste, was not unwilling to 'receive the present of a muse unknown'. He asked Addison to call upon him, and became his patron. Charles Montagu, afterwards Earl of Halifax, came and met himself, shone also among the statesmen who were known patrons of letters. Also to him, who was a prince of patrons 'fed with soft dedication all day long, Addison introduced himself. To him, in 1697, as it was part of his public fame to be a Latin scholar, Addison, also a skilful Latinist, addressed in Latin, a paper of verses on the Peace of Ryswick. With Somers and Montagu for patrons, the young man of genius who wished to thrive might fully commit himself to the service of the Church, for which he had been bred by his father, but Addison's tact and refinement promised to be serviceable to the State, and so it was that, as Steele tells us, Montagu made Addison a lawyer. His arguments were founded upon the general pravity and corruption of men of business, who wanted 'liberal education'. And I remember, as if I had read the letter yesterday, that my Lord 'ended with a compliment, that, however he might be represented as no friend to the Church, he never would do it any other injury than keeping Mr Addison out of it'. To the good offices of Montagu and Somers, Addison was indebted, therefore, in 1699, for a travelling allowance of £300 a-year. The grant was for his support while qualifying himself on the continent by study of modern languages, and otherwise, for diplomatic service. It dropped at the King's death, in the spring of 1702, and Addison was cast upon his own resources, but he threw, and lived to become an Under-Secretary of State in days that made Prior an Ambassador, and rewarded with official incomes Congreve, Rowe, Hughes, Philips, Stupney, and others. Throughout his honourable career prudence dictated to Addison more or less of dependence on the friendship of the strong. An honest friend of the popular cause, he was more ready to sell than give his pen to it, although the utmost reward would at no time have tempted him to throw his conscience into the bargain. The good word of Halifax obtained him from Godolphin, in 1704, the Government order for a poem on the Battle of Blenheim, with immediate earnest of payment for it in the office of a Commissioner of Appeal in the Exchequer worth £200 a-year. For this substantial reason Addison wrote the Campaign, and upon its success, he obtained the further reward of an Irish Under-Secretaryship.

The Campaign is not a great poem. Remains of Campaigns would not have made Addison's name, what it now is, a household word among his countrymen. The 'Remarks on several Parts of Italy, &c.', in which Addison followed up the success of his Campaign with notes of foreign travel, represent him visiting Italy as 'Virgil's Italy,' the land of the great writers in Latin, and finding scenery or customs of the people eloquent of them at every turn. He crammed his pages with quotation from Virgil and

According to the second title of this book it is 'an Argument, proving that no Principles but these of Reason are sufficient to make a Great Man.' It is addressed to Lord Cutts in a dedication dated from the Tower-Yard, March 23, 1701, and is in four chapters of which the first treats of the heroism of the ancient world, the second of man with his Creator, by the Bible Story and the Life and Death of Christ, the third defines the Christian as set forth by the character and teaching of St. Paul, applying the definition practically to the daily life of Steele's own time. In the last chapter he descends from the consideration of those bright incentives to a higher life, and treats of the ordinary passions and interests of men—the common springs of action (of which, he says, the chief are Fame and Conscience) which he declares to be best used and improved when joined with religion, and here all culminates in a final strain of patriotism, closing with the character of King William, 'that of a glorious captain and (what he much more values than the most splendid titles) that of a sincere and honest man.' This was the character of William which, when, in days of meagre public sense, Steele quoted it years afterwards in the St. James's, he broke off painfully and abruptly with a —Faint Hum, et ingens

Gloria

Steele's Christian Hero obtained many readers. Its fifth edition was appended to the first collection of the Tatler into volumes, at the time of the establishment of the Spectator. The old bent of the English mind was strong in Steele, and he gave most unostentatiously a lively wit to the true service of religion, without having spoken or written to the last day of his life a word of mere religious cant. One officer thrust a duel on him for his zeal in seeking to make peace between him and another comrade. Steele, as an officer, then, or soon afterwards, made a Captain of Fusiliers, could not refuse to fight, but stood on the defensive, yet in parrying thrust his sword pierced his antagonist, and the danger in which he lay quickened that abiding detestation of the practice of duelling, which caused Steele to attack it in his plays, in his Tatler, in his Spectator, with persistent energy.

Of the Christian Hero his companions felt, and he himself saw, that the book was too didactic. It was in deed plain truth out of Steele's heart, but an air of superiority, freely allowed only to the professional man teaching rules of his own art, belongs to a too didactic manner. Nothing is more repugnant to Steele's nature than the sense of this. He had defined the Christian as 'one who is always a benefactor, with the mean of a recreation.' And that was his own character, which was, to a fault, more ready to give than to receive more prompt to ascribe honour to others than to claim it for himself. To right himself, Steele wrote a light-hearted comedy, The Funeral, or Grief à la Mode, but at the core even of this lay the great earnestness of his censure against the mockery and mummery of grief that should be revered, and he blended with this, in the character of Lawyer Puzzle, a protest against mockery of truth and justice by the intricacies of the law. The liveliness of this comedy made Steele popular with the wits, and the inevitable touches of the author's patriotism brought on him also the notice of the Whigs. Party men might, perhaps, already feel something of the unbending independence that was in Steele himself, as in this play he made old Lord Brumpton teach it to his son

'But be thou honest, firm, impartial,

I let neither love, nor hate, nor faction move thee

Distinguish words from things, and men from crimes'

King William, perhaps, had he lived, could fairly have recognized in Steele the social form of that sound mind which in Defoe was solitary. In a later day it was to Steele a proud recollection that his name, to be provided for, 'was in the last table-book ever worn' by the glorious and immortal William III.

The Funeral, first acted with great success in 1702, was followed in the next year by The Tender Husband, to which Addison contributed some touches, for which Addison wrote a Prologue and which Steele dedicated to Addison, who would 'be surprised,' he said, 'in the midst of a dull and familiar conversation, with an address which bears so distant an air as a public dedication.' Addison and his friend were then thirty-one years old. Close friends when boys, they are close friends now in the prime of manhood. It was after they had blended wits over the writing of this comedy that Steele expressed his wish for a work, written by both, which should serve as THE MONUMENT to their most happy friendship When Addison and Steele were amused together with the writing of this comedy, Addison, having lost his immediate prospect of political employment, and his salary too, by King William's death in the preceding year, had come home from his travels On his way home he had received, at Amsterdam, news of his father's death As his father's eldest son, he had, on his return to England, family affairs to arrange, and probably some money to receive Though attached to a party that lost power at the accession of Queen Anne, and waiting for new employment, Addison,—who had declined the Duke of Somerset's over-condescending offer of a hundred a year and all expenses as travelling tutor to his son, the Marquis of Hertford—was able, while lodging in a garret in the Haymarket, to associate in London with the men by whose friendship he hoped to rise, and was, with Steele admitted into the select society of wits, and men of fashion who affected wit and took wits for their comrades, in the Kitcat Club When in 1704 Marlborough's victory at Blenheim revived the Whig influence, the suggestion of Halifax to Lord Treasurer Godolphin caused Addison to be applied to for his poem of the Campaign It was after the appearance of this poem that Steele's play was printed, with the dedication to his friend, in which he said, 'I look upon my intimacy with you as one of the most valuable enjoyments of my life At the same time I make the town no ill compliment for their kind acceptance of this comedy, in acknowledging that it has so far surpassed my opinion of it, as to make me think it no improper memorial of an inviolable Friendship I should not offer it to you as such, had I not been very careful to avoid every thing that might look ill-natured, immoral, or prejudicial to what the better part of mankind hold sacred and honourable'

This was the common ground between the friends Collier's Short View of the Profaneness and Immorality of the English Stage had been published in 1698, it attacked a real evil, if not always in the right way and Congreve's reply to it had been a failure Steele's comedies with all their gaiety and humour were wholly free from the garnish of oaths and unwholesome expletives which his contemporaries seemed to think essential to stage emphasis Each comedy of his was based on seriousness, as all sound English wit has been since there have been writers in England The gay manner did not conceal all the earnest thoughts that might jar with the humour of the town, and thus Steele was able to elum, by right of his third play, 'the honour of being the only English dramatist who had had a piece damned for its piety'

This was the Living Lover, produced in 1704, an adaptation from Corneille in which we must allow that Steele's earnestness in upholding truth and right did excuse him to spoil the comedy The play was afterwards re-adapted by Foote as the Liar, and in its last form, with another change or two, has been revived lately with great success It is worth while to note how Steele dealt with the story of this piece Its original is a play by Alarcon, which Corneille at first supposed to have been a play by Lope de Vega Alarcon, or, to give him his full style, Don Juan Ruiz de Alarcon y Mendoza, was a Mexican-born Spaniard of a noble family which had distinguished itself in Mexico from the time of the conquest, and took its name of Alarcon from a village in New Castile The poet was a humpbacked dwarf, a thorough, but rather laughty, Spanish gentleman, poet and wit, who wrote in an unusually pure Spanish style, a man of the world, too, who came to Spain in or about the year 1622, and held the very well-paid office of reporter to the Royal Council of the Indies When Alarcon, in 1634, was chosen by the Court to write a festival drama, and, at the same time, publishing the second part of his dramatic works, vehemently reclaimed plays for which, under disguised names, some of his contemporaries had taken credit to themselves, there was an angry combination against him in which Lope de Vega, Gongora, and Quevedo were found taking part All that Alarcon wrote was thoroughly his own, but editors of the 17th century boldly passed over his claims to honour, and distributed his best works among plays of other famous writers, chiefly those of Rojas and Lope de Vega This was what deceived Corneille, and caused him to believe and say that Alarcon's la Verdad sospechosa, on which, in 1642, he founded his Metteur, was a work of Lope de Vega's Afterwards Corneille learnt how there had been in this matter lying among editors He gave to Alarcon the honour due, and thenceforth it is chiefly by this play that Alarcon has been remembered out of Spain In Spain, when in 1852 Don Juan Hartzembusch edited Alarcon's comedies for the Biblioteca de Autores Españoles, he had to remark on the unjust neglect of that good author in Spain also, where the poets and men of letters had long wished in vain for a complete edition of his works. Lope de Vega, it may be added, was really the author of a sequel to la Verdad sospechosa, which Corneille adapted also as a sequel to his Menteur, but it was even poorer than such sequels usually are.

The Lying Lover in Alarcón's play is a Don García fresh from his studies in Salamanca, and Steele's Latine first appears there as a Tristan, the gracioso of old Spanish comedy. The two ladies are a Jacinta and Lucrecia. Alarcón has in his light and graceful play no less than three heavy fathers, of a Spanish type, one of whom, the father of Lucrecia, brings about Don García's punishment by threatening to kill him if he will not marry his daughter, and so the Liar is punished for his romancing by a marriage with the girl he does not care for, and not marrying the girl he loves.

Corneille was merciful, and in the fifth act bred in his Menteur a new fancy for Lucrecia, so that the marriage at cross purposes was rather agreeable to him.

Steele, in adapting the Menteur as his Lying Lover, altered the close in sharp accordance with that 'just regard to a reforming age' which caused him (adapting a line in his 'Procession then unprinted') to write in his Prologue to it, 'Pleasure must still have 'something that's severe.' Having translated Corneille's translations of García and Tristan (Dorante and Cliton) into Young Bookwit and Latine, he transformed the servant into a college friend, numming as servant because, since 'a prating servant is necessary in intrigues, the two had 'erst lots who should be the other's footman for the 'present expedition. Then he adapted the French couplets into pleasant prose comedy, giving with a light touch the romancing of fests of war and of an entertainment on the river, but at last he turned desperately serious, and sent his Young Bookwit to Newgate on a charge of killing the gentleman—here called Lovemore—who was at last to win the hand of the lady whom the Liar loved. In his last act, opening in Newgate, Steele started with blank verse, and although Lovemore of course was not dead, and Young Bookwit got at last more than a shadow of a promise of the other lady in reward for his repentance, the changes in construction of the play took it beyond the bounds of comedy, and were, in fact, excellent morality but not good art. And this is what Steele means when he says that he had his play damned for its piety.

With that strong regard for the drama which cannot well be wanting to the man who has an artist's vivid sense of life, Steele never withdrew his good will from the players, never neglected to praise a good play, and, I may add, took every fair occasion of suggesting to the town the subtlety of Shakespeare's genius. But he now ceased to write comedies, until towards the close of his life he produced with a remarkable success his other play, the Conscious Lovers. And of that, by the way, Fielding made his Parson Adams say that Cato and the Conscious Lovers were the only plays he ever heard of, fit for a Christian to read, 'and, I must own, in the latter there are some things almost solemn enough 'for a sermon.'

Perhaps it was about this time that Addison wrote his comedy of the Drummer, which had been long in his possession when Steele, who had become a partner in the management of Drury Lane Theatre, drew it from obscurity, suggested a few changes in it, and produced it—not openly as Addison's—upon the stage. The published edition of it was recommended also by a preface from Steele in which he says that he liked this author's play the better 'for the want of those studied similes and repetitions which we, who have 'writ before him, have thrown into our plays, to indulge and gain upon a false taste that 'has prevailed for many years in the British theatre. I believe the author would have 'condescended to fall into this way a little more than he has, had he before the writing of it been often present at theatrical representations. I was confirmed in my thoughts 'of the play by the opinion of better judges to whom it was communicated, who observed 'that the scenes were drawn after Molière's manner, and that an easy and natural vein of 'humour ran through the whole. I do not question but the reader will discover this, and 'see many beauties that escaped the audience, the touches being too delicate for every 'taste in a popular assembly. My brother-sharers (in the Drury Lane patent) 'were of 'opinion, at the first reading of it, that it was like a picture in which the strokes were not 'strong enough to appear at a distance. As it is not in the common way of writing, the 'approbation was at first doubtful, but has risen every time it has been acted, and has 'given an opportunity in several of its parts for as just and good actions as ever I saw on the 'stage Addison's comedy was not produced till 1715, the year after his unsuccessful attempt to revive the Spectator, which produced what is called the eighth volume of that work. The play, not known to be his, was so ill spoken of that he kept the authorship a secret to the last, and Tickell omitted it from the collection of his patron's works. But Steele knew what was due to his friend, and in 1722 manfully republished the piece as Addison's, with a dedication to Congreve and censure of Tickell for suppressing it. If it be true that the Drummer made no figure on the stage though excellently acted, 'when 'I observe this,' said Steele, 'I say a much harder thing of the stage than of the comedy. Addison's Drummer is a gentleman who, to forward his suit to a soldier's widow, masquerades as the drumbeating ghost of her husband in her country house, and terrifies a self-confident, free-thinking town exquisite, another suitor, who believes himself brought face to face with the spirit world, in which he professes that he don't believe. 'For my part, 'child, I have made myself easy in those points.' The character of the free-thinking exquisite is drawn from life without exaggeration, but with more than a touch of the bitter contempt Addison felt for the atheistic covecomb, with whom he was too ready to confound the sincere questioner of orthodox opinion. The only passages of his in the Spectator that border on intolerance are those in which he deals with the free-thinker, but it should not be forgotten that the commonest type of free-thinker in Queen Anne's time was not a thoughtful man who battled openly with doubt and made an independent search for truth, but an idler who repudiated thought and formed his character upon tradition of the court of Charles the Second. And throughout the Spectator we may find a Christian under-tone in Addison's intolerance of infidelity, which is entirely wanting when the moralist is Eustace Budgell. Two or three persons in the comedy of the Drummer give opportunity for good character-painting in the actor, and on a healthy stage before an audience able to discriminate light touches of humour and to enjoy unstrained although well-marked expression of varieties of character, the Drummer would not fail to be a welcome entertainment.

But our sketch now stands at the year 1705, when Steele had ceased for a time to write comedies. Addison's Campaign had brought him fame, and perhaps helped him to pay, as he now did, his College debts with interest. His Remarks on Italy, now published, were, as Tickell says 'at first but indifferently relished by the bulk of readers,' and his Drummer probably was written and locked in his desk. There were now such days of intercourse as Steele looked back to when with undying friendship he wrote in the preface to that edition of the Drummer produced by him after Addison's death. 'He was above 'all men in that talent we call humour, and enjoyed it in such perfection, that I have 'often reflected, after a night spent with him apart from all the world, that I had had the 'pleasure of conversing with an intimate acquaintance of Terence and Cæcilius, who 'had all their wit and nature, heightened with humour more exquisite and delightful than 'any other man ever possessed.' And again in the same Preface, Steele dwelt upon 'that smiling mirth, that delicate satire and genteel raillery, which appeared in Mr Addison when he was free from that remarkable bashfulness which is a cloak that hides and 'muffles merit, and his abilities were covered only by modesty, which doubles the beauties which are seen, and gives credit and esteem to all that are concealed. Addison had the self-consciousness of a sensitive and speculative mind. Thus, with a shy manner among those with whom he was not intimate, passed for cold self-assertion. The 'little 'senate' of his intimate friends was drawn to him by its knowledge of the real warmth of his nature. And his friendships, like his religion, influenced his judgment. His geniality that wore a philosophic cloak before the world, caused him to abandon himself in the Spectator, even more unreservedly than Steele would have done, to iterated efforts for the help of a friend like Ambrose Philips of whom Lord Macaulay has it that he gave his name to the class of literature called 'ramby-ramby. Addison's quietness with strangers was against a rapid widening of his circle of familiar friends, and must have made the great-hearted friendship of Steele as much to him as his could be to Steele. In very truth it 'doubled all his store. Steele's heart was open to enjoyment of all kindly intercourse with men. In after years as expression of thought in the literature of nations gained freedom and sincerity, two types of literature were formed from the types of mind which Addison and Steele may be said to have in some measure represented. Each sought advance towards a better light, one part by dwelling on the individual duties and responsibilities of man, and his relation to the infinite, the other by especial study of man's social ties and liberties, and his relation to the commonwealth of which he is a member. Goethe, for instance, inclined to one study, Schiller to the other, and every free mind will incline probably to one or other of these centres of opinion. Addison was a cold politician because he was most himself when analyzing principles of thought, and humours, passions, duties of the individual. Steele, on the contrary, braved rum for his convictions as a politician, because his social nature turned his earnestness into concern for the well-being of his country, and he lived in times when it was not yet certain that the newly-secured liberties were also finally secured. The party was strong that desired to re-establish ancient tyrannies, and the Queen herself was hardly on the side of freedom.

In 1706, the date of the union between England and Scotland, Whig influence had been strengthened by the elections of the preceding year, and Addison was, early in 1706, made Under Secretary of State to Sir Charles Hedges, a Tory, who was superseded before the end of the year by Marlborough's son-in-law, the Earl of Sunderland, a Whig under whom Addison, of course, remained in office and who was, thenceforth, his active patron. In the same year the opera of Rosamond was produced, with Addison's libretto. It was but the third, or indeed the second, year of operas in England, for we can hardly reckon as forming a year of opera the Italian intermezzi and interludes of singing and dancing, performed under Clayton's direction, at York Buildings, in 1703. In 1705, Clayton's Arsinoë, adapted and translated from the Italian, was produced at Drury Lane. Buononcini's Camilla was given at the house in the Haymarket, and sung in two languages, the heroine's part being in English and the hero's in Italian. Thomas Clayton, a second-rate musician, but a man with literary tastes, who had been introducer of the opera to London, argued that the words of an opera should be not only English, but the best of English, and that English music ought to illustrate good home-grown literature. Addison and Steele agreed heartily in this. Addison was persuaded to write words for an opera by Clayton—his Rosamond—and Steele was persuaded afterwards to speculate in some sort of partnership with Clayton's efforts to set English poetry to music in the entertainments at York Buildings, though his friend Hughes warned him candidly that Clayton was not much of a musician. Rosamond was a failure of Clayton's and not a success of Addison's. There is poor jesting got by the poet from a comie Sir Trusty, who keeps Rosamond's bower, and his scolding wife. But there is a happy compliment to Marlborough in giving to King Henry a vision at Woodstock of the glory to come for England, and in a scenic realization of it by the rising of Blenheim Palace, the nation's gift to Marlborough, upon the scene of the Fair Rosamond story. Indeed there can be no doubt that it was for the sake of the scene at Woodstock, and the opportunity thus to be made, that Rosamond was chosen for the subject of the opera. Addison made Queen Eleanor give Rosamond a narcotic instead of a poison, and thus he achieved the desired happy ending to an opera.

	Believe your Rosamond alive
King	O happy day! O pleasing view!
	My Queen forgives—
Queen	—My lord is true
King	No more I'll change
Queen	No more I'll grieve
Both	But ever thus united live

That is to say, for three days, the extent of the life of the opera. But the literary Under-Secretary had saved his political dignity with the stage tribute to Marlborough, which backed the eloquent praise in the Campaign.

In May, 1707, Steele received the office of Gazetteer, until then worth £60, but presently endowed by Harley with a salary of £300 a year. At about the same time he was made one of the gentlemen ushers to Queen Anne's husband, Prince George of Denmark. In the same year Steele married. Of his most private life before this date little is known. He had been married to a lady from Barbadoes, who died in a few months. From days referred to in the Christian Hero he derived a daughter of whom he took fatherly care. In 1707 Steele, aged about 35, married Miss (or, as ladies come of age were then called, Mrs.) Mary Scurlock, aged 29. It was a marriage of affection on both sides. Steele had from his first wife an estate in Barbadoes, which produced, after payment of the interest on its encumbrances, £670 a year. His appointment as Gazetteer, less the £45 tax on it, was worth £255 a year, and his appointment on the Prince Consort's household another hundred. Thus the income upon which Steele married was rather more than a thousand a year, and Miss Scurlock's mother had an estate of about £330 a year. Mary Scurlock had been a friend of Steele's first wife, for before marriage she recalls Steele to her mother's mind by saying, 'It is the survivor of the person to whose funeral I went in my illness.' 'Let us make our regards to each other,' Steele wrote just before marriage, 'mutual and unchangeable, that whilst the world around us is enchanted with the false satisfactions of arrogant desires, our persons may be shrines to each other, and sacred to conjugal faith, unreserved confidence, and heavenly society.'

There remains also a prayer written by Steele before first taking the sacrament with his wife, after marriage. There are also letters and little notes written by Steele to his wife, treasured by her love, and printed by a remorseless antiquary, blind to the sentence in one of the first of them. 'I beg of you to shew my letters to no one living, but let us be contented with one another's thoughts upon our words and actions, without the intervention of other people, who cannot judge of so delicate a circumstance as the commerce between man and wife. But they are printed, for the frivolous to laugh at and the wise to honour. They show that even in his most thoughtless or most anxious moments the social wit, the busy patriot, remembered his 'dear Prue,' and was her lover to the end. Soon after marriage, Steele took his wife to a boarding-school in the suburbs, where they saw a young lady for whom Steele showed an affection that caused Mrs Steele to ask whether she was not his daughter. He said that she was. 'Then, said Mrs Steele, 'I beg she may be mine too'. Thenceforth she lived in their home as Miss Ousley, and was treated as a daughter by Steele's wife. Surely this was a woman who deserved the love that never swerved from her. True husband and true friend, he playfully called Addison her rival. In the Spectator there is a paper of Steele's (No 142) representing some of his own love-letters as telling what a man said and should be able to say of his wife after forty years of marriage. Seven years after marriage he signs himself, 'Yours more than you can imagine or I express'. He dedicates to her a volume of the Lady's Library, and writes of her ministrations to him 'if there are such beings as guardian angels, thus are they employed. I will no more believe one of them more good in its inclinations than I can conceive it more charming in its form than my wife. In the year before her death he was signing his letters with 'God bless you!' and 'Dear Prue, eternally yours'. That Steele made it a duty of his literary life to contend against the frivolous and vicious ridicule of the ties of marriage common in his day, and to maintain their sacred honour and their happiness, readers of the Spectator cannot fail to find.

Steele, on his marriage in 1707, took a house in Bury Street, St James's, and in the following year went to a house at Hampton, which he called in jest the Hovel. Addison had lent him a thousand pounds for costs of furnishing and other immediate needs. This was repaid within a year, and when, at the same time, his wife's mother was proposing a settlement of her money beneficial to himself, Steele replied that he was far from desiring, if he should survive his wife, 'to turn the current of the estate out of the channel it would have been in had I never come into the family'. Liberal always of his own to others, he was sometimes without a guinea, and perplexed by debt. But he defrauded no man. When he followed his Prue to the grave he was in no man's debt, though he left all his countrymen his debtors, and he left more than their mother's fortune to his two surviving children. One died of consumption a year afterwards, the other married one of the Welsh Judges, afterwards Lord Trevor.

The friendship—equal friendship—between Steele and Addison was as unbroken as the love between Steele and his wife. Petty tales may have been invented or misread. In days of malicious personality Steele braved the worst of party spite, and little enough even slander found to throw against him. Nobody in their life-time doubted the equal strength and sincerity of the relationship between the two friends. Steele was no follower of Addison's. Throughout life he went his own way, leading rather than following, first as a playwright, first in conception and execution of the scheme of the Tatler, Spectator, and Guardian, following his own sense of duty against Addison's sense of expediency in passing from the Guardian to the Englishman, and so to energetic movement upon perilous paths as a political writer, whose whole heart was with what he took to be the people's cause.

When Swift had been writing to Addison that he thought Steele 'the vilest of mankind' in writing of this to Swift Steele complained that the Lacertine,—in which Swift had a busy hand,—and Addison had bridled him in point of politeness, adding, 'This was ill hinted both in relation to him and me. I know no party but the truth of the question is what I will support as well as I can, when any man I honour is attacked.' Mr John Forster whose keen insight into the essentials of literature has led him to write an essay upon each of the two great founders of the latest period of English literature Defoe and Steele, points out in his masterly essay upon Steele that Swift denies having spoken of Steele as hindered by his friend and does so in a way that frankly admits Steele's right to be jealous of the imputation. Mr Forster just adds that throughout Swift's intimate speech to Selkirk, 'whether his humour be sarcastic or polite the friendship of Steele and Addison is for ever suggesting some annoyance to himself, some mortification, so we regret, but never once the doubt that it was no intimate and sincere, or that into it entered anything inconsistent with a perfect equality. Six months after Addison's death Steele wrote (in No 12 of the Theatre, and I am again quoting facts cited by Mr Forster) 'that there never was a more strict friendship than between himself and Addison, nor had they ever any difference but what proceeded from their different way of pursuing the same thing, the one waited and stemmed the torrent while the other too often plunged into it, but though they thus lived for some years past shunning each other, they still preserved the most sincere concern for their mutual welfare, and when they met they were as unreserved as boys, and talked of the greatest affairs upon which they saw where they differed, without pressing (what they knew impossible) to convert each other. As to the substance or worth of what thus divided them Steele only adds the significant expression of his hope that, if his family is the worse, his country may be the better, for the mortification he has undergone.

Such, then was the friendship of which the Spectator is the abiding Monument. The Spectator was a modified continuation of the Tatler, and the Tatler was suggested by a portion of Defoe's Reliander. The Spectator belongs to the first days of a period when the people at large extend their reading power into departments of knowledge formerly unsought by them, and their favour is found generally to be more desirable than that of the most princely patron. This period should date from the day in 1703 when the key turned upon Defoe in Newgate the year of the production of Steele's Tender Husband; and the time when Addison is in Holland on the way home from his continental travels. Defoe was then forty-two years old, Addison and Steele being about eleven years younger.

In the following year, 1704, the year of blenheim—Defoe issued, on the 19th of February, No 1 of 'A Weekly Review of the Affairs of France. Purg'd from the Errors and Partiality of Non-Resisters and Petty-Statesmen, of all Sides, and in the introductory sketch of its plan said 'After our Serious Matters are over, we shall at the end of every Paper, Present you with a little Diversion, as anything occurs to make the World Merry, and whether Friend or Foe, one Party or another, if anything happens so scandalous as to require in open Reproof the World may meet with it there. Here is the first little Diversion, the germ of Tatlers and Spectators which in after years amused and edified the town.

Mercure Scandale

or,

ADVICE from the Scandalous CLUB

Translated out of French

This Society is a Corporation long since established in Paris, and we cannot comply with our Advices from Paris, without entertaining the World with every thing we meet with from that Country.

And, tho' Corresponding with the Queen's Enemies is prohibited, yet since the Matter

'will be so honest, as only to tell the World of what every body will own to be scandalous, we reckon we shall be welcome

'This Corporation has been set up some months, and open d their first Sessions about last Bartholomew Fair, but having not yet obtain d a Patent, they have never, till now, made their Resolves publick

'The Business of this Society is to censure the Actions of Men, not of Partics, and in particular, those Actions which are made publick so by their Authors, as to be, in their own Nature, an Appeal to the general Approbation

'They do not design to expose Persons but things, and of them, none but such as more than ordinarily deserve it, they who would not be censur d by this Assembly, are desir d to act with caution enough, not to fall under their Hands, for they resolve to treat Vice, and Villanous Actions, with the utmost Severity

'The First considerable Matter that came before this Society, was about Bartholomew Fair, but the Debates being long, they were at last adjourned to the next Fair, when we suppose it will be decided, so being not willing to trouble the World with anything twice over, we refer that to next August

'On the 10th of September last, there was a long Hearing, before the Club, of a Fellow that said he had kill d the Duke of Bavaria Now is David punish d the Man that said he had kill d King Saul, whether it was so or no, twas thought this Fellow ought to be delivered up to Justice, tho the Duke of Bavaria was alive

'Upon the whole, twas voted a scandalous Thing, that News-Writers should kill Kings and Princes, and bring them to life again at pleasure, and to make an Example of this Fellow, he was dismiss d, upon Condition he should go to the Queen's-bench once a Day, and bear Toller, his Brother of the Friendly, company two hours for fourteen Days together, which cruel Punishment was executed with the utmost Severity

'The Club has had a great deal of trouble about the News-Writers, who have been continually brought before them for their ridiculous Stories, and imposing upon Mankind, and tho the Proceedings have been pretty tedious, we must give you the trouble of a few of them in our next

The addition to the heading, 'Translated out of French, appears only in No 1, and the first title Mercurie Scandale (adopted from a French book published about 1681) having been much criticized for its grammar and on other grounds, is dropped in No 18 Thenceforth Defoe's pleasant comment upon passing folios appeared under the single head of 'Advice from the Scandalous Club Still the verbal Critics exercised their wits upon the title 'We have been so often on the Defence of our Title, says Defoe, in No 38, that the world begins to think Our Society wants Employment

'If Scandalous must signify nothing but Personal Scandal, respecting the Subject of which it is predicated, we desire those gentlemen to answer for us how Post-Man or Post-Boy can signify a News-Paper, the Post Man or Post Boy being in all my reading properly and strictly applicable, not to the Paper, but to the Person bringing or carrying the News? Mercury also is if I understand it, by a Transmutation of Meaning, from a God turned into a Book—From hence our Club thinks they have not fair Play, in being deny d the Privilege of making an Allegory as well as other People' In No 46 Defoe made in one change more, a whimsical half concession of a syllable, by putting a sign of contraction in its place, and thenceforth calling this part of his Review, Advice from the Scandal Club Nothing can be more evident than the family likeness between this forefather of the Tatler and Spectator and its more familiar descendants Here is a trick of voice common to all, and some papers of Defoe's might have been written for the Spectator The little allegory, for instance, in No 45, which tells of a desponding young Lady brought before the Society, as found by Rosamond's Pond in the Park in a strange condition, taken by the mob for a lunatic and whose clothes were all out of fashion, but whose face, when it was seen, astonished the whole society by its extraordinary sweetness and majesty She told how she had been brought to despair, and her name proved to be—Modesty In letters, questions, and comments also which might be taken from Defoe's Monthly Supplementury Journal to the Advice from the Scandal Club, we catch a likeness to the spirit of the Tatler and Spectator now and then exert Some censured Defoe for not confining himself to the weightier part of his purpose in establishing the Review He replied, in the Introduction to his first Monthly Supplement, that many men 'care but for a little reading at a time,' and said, 'thus we wheedle them in, if it may be allow'd that Expression, to the Knowledge of the World, who rather than take more Pains, would be content with their Ignorance, and search 'into nothing.'

Single-minded, quick-witted, and prompt to act on the first suggestion of a higher point of usefulness to which he might attain, Steele saw the mind of the people ready for a new sort of relation to its writers, and he followed the lead of Defoe.<sup>1</sup> But though he turned from the more frivolous temper of the enfeebled playhouse audience, to commune in free air with the country at large, he took fresh care for the restraint of his deep earnestness within the bounds of a cheerful, unpretending influence. Drop by drop it should fall, and its strength lie in its persistence. He would bring what wit he had out of the playhouse, and speak his mind, like Defoe, to the people themselves every post-day. But he would affect no pedantry of moralizing, he would appeal to no passions, he would profess himself only 'a Tattler.' Might he not use, he thought, modestly distrustful of the charm of his own mind some of the news obtained by virtue of the office of Gazetteer Hacky had given him, to bring weight and acceptance to that writing of his which he valued only for the use to which it could be put. For, as he himself truly says in the Tattler, 'wit, if a man had it, unless it be directed to some useful end, is but a wanton, frivolous quality, and that one should value himself upon in this kind is that he had some honourable intention in it.'

Swift, not then a deserter to the Tones, was a friend of Steele's, who, when the first Tattler appeared had been amusing the town at the expense of John Partridge, astrologer and almanac-maker, with 'Predictions for the year 1708, professing to be written by Isaac Bickerstaff Esq.' The first prediction was of the death of Partridge, 'on the 29th of March next, about eleven at night, of a rigging fever.' Swift answered himself, and also published in due time 'The Accomplishment of the first of Mr Bickerstaff's Predictions being an account of the death of Mr Partridge, the almanack-maker, upon the 29th instant.' Other wits kept up the joke, and, in his next year's almanac (that for 1709), Partridge advertised that, 'whereas it has been industriously given out by Isaac Bickerstaff, Esq. and others, to prevent the sale of this year's almanack, that John Partridge is dead, this may inform all his loving countrymen that he is still living, in health and they are knaves that reported it otherwise.' Steele gave additional lightness to the touch of his Tattler, which first appeared on the 12th of April, 1709, by writing in the name of Isaac Bickerstaff, and carrying on the jest, that was to his serious mind a blow dealt against prevailing superstition. Referring in his first Tattler to this advertisement of Partridge's, he said of it, 'I have in another place, and in a paper by itself, sufficiently convinced this man that he is dead, and if he has any shame, I do not doubt but that by this time he owns it to all his acquaintance. For though the legs and arms and whole body of that man may still appear and perform their animal functions, yet since, as I have elsewhere observed, his art is gone, the man is gone.' To Steele indeed, the truth was absolute, that a man is but what he can do.

In this spirit, then, Steele began the Tattler, simply considering that his paper was to be published 'for the use of the good people of England,' and professing at the outset that he was an author writing for the public, who expected from the public payment for his work, and that he preferred this course to gambling for the patronage of men in office. Having pleasantly shown the sordid spirit that underlies the mountebank's sublime professions of disinterestedness, 'we have a contempt,' he says, 'for such paltry bratterers, and have therefore all along informed the public that we intend to give them our advices for our own sakes, and are labouring to make our incubations come to some price in money, for our more convenient support in the service of the public. It is certain that many other schemes have been proposed to me, as a friend offered to show me in a treatise he had writ, which he called, "The whole Art of Life, or, The Introduction to <sup>1</sup> There is adopted here, and in some paragraphs of the preceding narrative, the account given in the Introduction to English Writers of the relation of the Spectator and of Steele and Addison to the period of popular influence on English literature. The purpose of that Introduction was only to explain the division of the whole work into periods but even in such a sketch the place of the Spectator is so important that there was much to be said that, when it has to be told by the same person, can only be repeated in an Introduction to the work itself.

'Great Men, illustrated in a Pack of Cards' But being a novice at all manner of play, 'I declined the offer'

Addison took these cards, and played an honest game with them successfully When, at the end of 1708, the Earl of Sunderland, Marlborough's son-in-law, lost his secretaryship, Addison lost his place as under-secretary, but he did not object to go to Ireland as chief secretary to Lord Wharton, the new Lord-lieutenant, an active party man, a leader on the turf with reputation for indulgence after business hours according to the fashion of the court of Charles II Lord Wharton took to Ireland Chayton to write him musical entertainments, and a train of parasites of quality He was a great borough-monger, and is said at one critical time to have returned thirty members He had no difficulty, therefore, in finding Addison a seat, and made him in that year, 1709, M P for Malmesbury Addison only once attempted to speak in the House of Commons, and then, embarrassed by encouraging applause that welcomed him, he stammered and sat down But when, having laid his political cards down for a time, and at ease in his own home, pen in hand, he brought his sound mind and quick humour to the aid of his friend Steele, he came with him into direct relation with the English people Addison never gave posterity a chance of knowing what was in him till, following Steele's lead, he wrote those papers in Tatler, Spectator, and Guardian, wherein alone his genius abides with us, and will abide with English readers to the end The Tatler, the Spectator, and the Guardian were, all of them, Steele's, begun and ended by him at his sole discretion In these three journals Steele was answerable for 510 papers, Addison for 369 Swift wrote two papers, and sent about a dozen fragments Congreve wrote one article in the Tatler Pope wrote three for the Spectator, and eight times for the Guardian Addison who was in Ireland when the Tatler first appeared, only guessed the authorship by an expression in an early number, and it was not until eight numbers had been issued, and the character of the new paper was formed and established, that Addison, on his return to London, joined the friend who, with his usual complete absence of the vanity of self-assertion, finally ascribed to the ally he dearly loved, the honours of success

It was the kind of success Steele had desired—a widely-diffused influence for good The Tatlers were penny papers published three times a week, and issued also for another halfpenny with a blank half-sheet for transmission by post, when any written scraps of the day's gossip that friend might send to friend could be included It was through these, and the dailies Spectators which succeeded them that the people of England really learnt to read The few leaves of sound reason and fancy were but a light tax on uncultivated powers of attention Exquisite grace and true kindness, here associated with familiar ways and common incidents of every-day life, gave many an honest man fresh sense of the best happiness that lies in common duties honestly performed and a fresh energy, free as Christianity itself from malice—for so both Steele and Addison meant that it should be—in opposing themselves to the frivolous and small frauds on the conscience by which manliness is undermined

There was high strife of faction, and there was real peril to the country by a possible turn of affairs after Queen Anne's death, that another Stuart restoration, in the name of divine right of kings, would leave the rights of the people to be reconquered in civil war The chiefs of either party were appealing to the people, and engaging all the wit they could secure to fight on their side in the war of pamphlets Steele's heart was in the momentous issue Both he and Addison had it in mind while they were blending their calm playfulness with all the clamour of the press The spirit in which these friends worked, young Pope must have felt, for after Addison had helped him in his first approach to fame by giving honour in the Spectator to his 'Essay on Criticism,' and when he was thankful for that service, he contributed to the Spectator his 'Messiah' Such offering clearly showed how Pope interpreted the labour of the essayists

In the fens of Lincolnshire the antiquary Maurice Johnson collected his neighbours of Spalding 'Taking care,' it is said, 'not to alarm the country gentlemen by any premature mention of antiquities, he endeavoured at first to allure them into the more flowery paths of literature In 1709 a few of them were brought together every post-day at the coffee-house in the Abbey Yard, and after one of the party had read aloud the last published number of the Tatler, they proceeded to talk over the subject among themselves'

Even in distant Perthshire 'the gentlemen met after church on Sunday to discuss the news of the week, the Spectators were read as regularly as the Journal. So the political draught of bitterness came sweetened with the wisdom of good-humour. The good-humour of the essayists touched with a light and kindly hand every form of affectation, and placed every-day life in the light in which it would be seen by a natural and honest man. A sense of the essentials of life was assumed everywhere for the reader, who was asked only to smile critically at its vanities. Steele looked through all shams to the natural heart of the Englishman, appealed to that, and found it easily enough, even under the disguise of the young gentleman cited in the 77th Letter, 'so ambitious to be thought worse than he is that in his degree of understanding he sets up for a free-thinker, and talks atheistically in coffee houses all day, though every morning and evening, it can be proved' upon him, he regularly at home says his prayers.

But as public events led nearer to the prospect of a Jacobite triumph that would have again brought Englishmen against each other sword to sword, there was no voice of warning more fearless than Richard Steele's. He changed the Spectator for the Guardian, that was to be in its plan, more free to guard the people's rights, and, standing forward more distinctly as a politician, he became member for Stockbridge. For the Guardian, which he had dropped when he felt the plan of that journal unequal to the right and full expression of his mind, Steele took for a periodical the name of Englishman, and under that name fought, with then unexampled abstinence from personality, against the principles upheld by Swift in his Examiner. Then, when the Perce of Utrecht alarmed English patriots, Steele in a bold pamphlet on 'The Crisis' expressed his dread of arbitrary power and a Jacobite succession with a boldness that cost him his seat in Parliament, as he had before sacrificed to plain speaking his place of Gazetteer.

Of the later history of Steele and Addison a few words will suffice. This is not an account of their lives, but an endeavour to show why Englishmen must always have a living interest in the Spectator, their joint production. Steele's Spectator ended with the seventh volume. The members of the Club were all disposed of, and the journal formally wound up, but by the suggestion of a future ceremony of opening the Spectator's mouth, a way was made for Addison, whenever he pleased, to connect with the famous series an attempt of his own for its revival. A year and a half later Addison made this attempt, producing his new journal with the old name and, as far as his contributions went, not less than the old wit and earnestness, three times a week instead of daily. But he kept it alive only until the completion of one volume. Addison had not Steele's popular tact as an editor. He preached, and he suffered drier men to preach, while in his jest he now and then wrote what he seems to have been unwilling to acknowledge. His eighth volume contains excellent matter, but the subjects are not always well chosen or varied judiciously, and one understands why the Spectator took a firmer hold upon society when the two friends in the full strength of their life, aged about forty, worked together and embraced between them a wide range of human thought and feeling.

In April, 1713, in the interval between the completion of the true Spectator and the appearance of the supplementary volume, Addison's tragedy of Cato, planned at College, begun during his foreign travels, retouched in England, and at last completed, was produced at Drury Lane. Addison had not considered it a stage play, but when it was urged that the time was proper for ministering to the public with the sentiments of Cato, he assented to its production. Apart from its real merit the play had the advantage of being applauded by the Whigs, who saw in it a Whig political ideal, and by the Tories, who desired to show that they were as warm friends of liberty as any Whig could be.

Upon the death of Queen Anne Addison acted for a short time as secretary to the Regency, and when George I. appointed Aildson's patron, the Earl of Sunderland, to the Lord-lieutenancy of Ireland, Sunderland took Addison with him as chief secretary. Sunderland resigned in ten months, and thus Addison's secretaryship came to an end in August, 1716. Addison was also employed to meet the Rebellion of 1715 by writing the Rehearsal. He wrote under this title fifty-five papers, which were published twice a week between December, 1715, and June, 1716, and he was rewarded with the post of Commissioner for Trade and Colonies. In August, 1716, he married the Countess Dowager of Warwick, mother to the young Earl of Warwick, of whose education he seems to have had some charge in 1708. Addison settled upon the Countess £4000 in lieu of an estate which she gave up for his sake. Henceforth he lived chiefly at Holland House. In April, 1717, Lord Sunderland became Secretary of State, and still mindful of Marlborough's illustrious supporter, he made Addison his colleague. Eleven months later, ill health obliged Addison to resign the seals, and his death followed, June 17, 1719, at the age of 47.

Steele's political difficulties ended at the death of Queen Anne. The return of the Whigs to power on the accession of George I. brought him the office of Surveyor of the Royal Stables at Hampton Court, he was also first in the Commission of the peace for Middlesex, and was made one of the deputy lieutenants of the county. At the request of the managers Steele's name was included in the new patent required at Drury Lane by the royal company of comedians upon the accession of a new sovereign. Steele also was returned as M.P. for Boroughbridge, in Yorkshire, was writer of the Address to the King presented by the Lord-lieutenant and the deputy lieutenants of Middlesex and being knighted on that occasion, with two other of the deputies, became in the spring of the year, 1714, Sir Richard Steele. Very few weeks after the death of his wife, in December, 1718, Sunderland, at a time when he had Addison for colleague, brought in a bill for preventing any future creations of peers, except when an existing peerage should become extinct. Steele, who looked upon this as an infringement alike of the privileges of the crown and of the rights of the subject, opposed the bill in Parliament, and started in March, 1719 a paper called the Plebeian, in which he argued against a measure tending, he said, to the formation of an oligarchy. Addison replied in the Old Whig, and this, which occurred within a year of the close of Addison's life, was the main subject of political difference between them. The bill, strongly opposed, was dropped for that session, and reintroduced (after Addison's death) in the December following, to be thrown out by the House of Commons.

Steele's action against the government brought on him the hostility of the Duke of Newcastle, then Lord Chamberlain, and it was partly to defend himself and his brother patentees against hostile action threatened by the Duke, that Steele, in January, 1720 started his paper called the Theatre. But he was dispossessed of his government of the theatre, to which a salary of £600 a year had been attached, and suffered by the persecution of the court until Walpole's return to power. Steele was then restored to his office, and in the following year 1722 produced his most successful comedy, The Conscious Lovers. After this time his health declined, his spirits were depressed. He left London for Bath. His only surviving son, Eugene, born while the Spectator was being issued, and to whom Prince Eugene had stood godfather, died at the age of eleven or twelve in November, 1723. The younger also of his two daughters was marked for death by consumption. He was broken in health and fortune when, in 1726, he had an attack of palsy which was the prelude to his death. He died Sept. 1, 1729, at Carmarthen, where he had been boarding with a mercer who was his agent and receiver of rents. There is a pleasant record that 'he retained his cheerful sweetness of temper to the last, and would often be 'carried out, of a summer's evening, where the country lads and lasses were assembled 'at their rural sports,—and, with his pencil, gave an order on his agent, the mercer, for a 'new gown to the best dancer.

Two editions of the Spectator, the tenth and eleventh, were published by Tonson in the year of Steele's death. These and the next edition, dated 1739 were without the translations of the mottoes, which appear, however in the edition of 1744. Notes were first added by Dr Percy, the editor of the Reliques of Ancient Poetry, and Dr Calder. Dr John Calder, a native of Aberdeen, bred to the dissenting ministry was for some time keeper of Dr Williams's Library in Redcross Street. He was a candidate for the office given to Dr Abraham Rees of editor and general superintendent of the new issue of Chambers's Cyclopædia, undertaken by the booksellers in 1776, and he supplied to it some new articles. The Duke of Northumberland warmly patronized Dr Calder, and made him his companion in London and at Alnwick. Castle as Private Literary Secretary. Dr Thomas Percy, who had constituted himself cousin and retainer to the Percy of Northumberland, obtained his bishopric of Dromore in 1782, in the following year lost his only son and suffered from that failure in eyesight, which resulted in a total blindness. Having become intimately acquainted with Dr Calder when at Northumberland House and Alnwick, Percy intrusted to him the notes he had collected for illustrating the Tatler, Spectator, and Guardian. These were afterwards used, with additions by Dr Calder, in the various editions of those works, especially in the six-volume edition of the Tatler, published by John Nichols in 1786, where Percy's notes have a P attached to them, and Dr Calder's are signed 'Annotator'. The Tatler was annotated fully, and the annotated Tatler has supplied some pieces of information given in the present edition of the Spectator. Percy actually edited two volumes for R. Tonson in 1764, but the work was stopped by the death of the bookseller, and the other six were added to them in 1789. They were slightly annotated, both as regards the number and the value of the notes, but Percy and Calder lived when Spectator traditions were yet fresh, and oral information was accessible as to points of personal allusion or as to the authorship of a few papers or letters which but for them might have remained anonymous. Their notes are those of which the substance has run through all subsequent editions. Little, if anything, was added to them by Bisset or Chalmers, the energies of those editors having been chiefly directed to the preserving or multiplying of corruptions of the text. Percy, when telling Tonson that he had completed two volumes of the Spectator, said that he had corrected 'innumerable corruptions' which had then crept in, and could have come only by misprint. Since that time not only have misprints been preserved and multiplied, but punctuation has been deliberately modernized, to the destruction of the freshness of the original style, and editors of another 'understanding age' have taken upon themselves by many a little touch to correct Addison's style or grammar.

This volume reprints for the first time in the present century the text of the Spectator as its authors left it. A good recent edition contains in the first 18 papers, which are a fair sample of the whole, 88 petty variations from the proper text (at that rate, in the whole work more than 3000) apart from the recasting of the punctuation, which is counted as a defect only in two instances, where it has changed the sense. Chalmers's text, of 1817, was hardly better, and about two-thirds of the whole number of corruptions had already appeared in Bisset's edition of 1793, from which they were transferred. Thus Bisset as well as Chalmers in the Dedication to Vol. I turned the 'polite parts of learning' into the 'polite arts of learning, and when the silent gentleman tells us that many to whom his person is well known speak of him 'very currently by Mr What-d-y-e-call him,' Bisset before Chalmers rounded the sentence into 'very correctly by the appellation of 'Mr What-d-y-e-call him'. But it seems to have been Chalmers who first undertook to correct, in the next paper, Addison's grammar, by turning 'have laughed to have seen' into 'have laughed to see, and transformed a treaty 'with London and Wise,'—a firm now of historical repute,—for the supply of flowers to the opera, into a treaty 'between London and Wise, which most people would take to be a very different matter. If the present edition has its own share of misprints and oversights, at least it inherits none, and it contains no wilful alteration of the text. The papers as they first appeared in the daily issue of a penny (and after the stamp was imposed two-penny) folio half-sheet, have been closely compared with the first issue in guinea octavos, for which they were revised, and with the last edition that appeared before the death of Steele. The original text is here given precisely as it was left after revision by its authors, and there is shown at the same time the amount and character of the revision. Sentences added in the reprint are placed between square brackets [ ], without any appended note. Sentences omitted, or words altered, are shown by bracketing the revised version, and giving the text as it stood in the original daily issue within corresponding brackets as a foot-note. Thus the reader has here both the original texts of the Spectator. The Essays, as revised by their authors for permanent use, form the main text of the present volume. But if the words or passages in brackets be omitted, the words or passages in corresponding foot-notes,—where there are such foot-notes,—being substituted for them, the text becomes throughout that of the Spectator as it first came wet from the press, to English breakfast-tables. As the few differences between good spelling in Queen Anne's time and good spelling now are never of a kind to obscure the sense of a word, or lessen the enjoyment of the reader, it has been thought better to make the reproduction perfect, and thus show not only what Steele and Addison wrote but how they spelt, while restoring to their style the proper harmony of their own methods of punctuating, and their way of sometimes getting emphasis by turning to account the use of capitals, which in their hands was not wholly conventional. Here also the capitals have another use. They are a help to the eye in reading columns of small type. It may be added that the two columns in a full page of this volume represent in miniature the two columns of an ordinary full page of the Spectator in its daily issue, with its usual number of lines in a column, and the same average of words in a line. The original folio numbers have been followed also in the use of italics, and other little details of the disposition of the type, for example, in the reproduction of those rows of single inverted commas which distinguish what a correspondent called the parts 'freed down the side with little c's.

The translation of the mottos and Latin quotations, which Steele and Addison deliberately abstained from giving, and which, as they were since added, impede and sometimes confound and contradict the text, are here placed in a body at the end, for those who want them. Again and again the essayists indulge in blather on the mystery of the Latin and Greek mottos, and what confusion must enter into the mind of the unwary reader who finds Pope's Homer quoted at the head of a Spectator long before Addison's word of applause to the young poet's 'Essay on Criticism'. The mottos then are placed in an Appendix. There is a short Appendix also of advertisements taken from the original number of the Spectator, and a few others, where they seem to illustrate some point in the text, will be found among the notes. In the large number of notes here added to a revision of those bequeathed to us by Percy and Calder,<sup>1</sup> the object has been to give information which may contribute to some nearer acquaintance with the writers of the book, and enjoyment of allusions to past manners and events. Finally, from the 'General Index to the Spectators, &c,' published as a separate volume in 1760, there has been taken what was serviceable, and additions have been made to it with a desire to secure for this edition of the Spectator the advantages of being handy for reference as well as true to the real text.

<sup>1</sup> The reader is requested to cancel note x upon col. 1 of p. 8, which has been transferred by oversight from a preceding edition. Not only is L a signature of Addison's, and attached to papers which are evidently not from materials found in the Letter box but Steele's change of R into T became permanent when but a fourth part of his work was done, so that R and I could not have been meant to distinguish between original and transcribed papers. Equally needless is a suggestion of Dr Calder's, which has also been copied and re-copied, that when Addison signed C he wrote at Chelsea, when L in London, when I in Ireland, and when O at the office. This notion was invented to dispose of an idea that there was unity in taking the name of a Muse as a word from which to get the four letters used to write the reader's over-certainty as to the authorship of papers. If Addison had wanted ten letters instead of four he might have had Bucephalus for a keyword, and then perhaps some editor would have thought it requisite to find a way of proving that he had not actually mounted on himself for a horse.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE

JOHN LORD SOMMERS,

BARON OF EYESHAM

My Lord,
I SHOULD not be the Part of an impartial Spectator, if I Dedicated the following Papers to

In 1665, when a student at Oxford, aged 23, Joseph Addison had dedicated 'to the Right Honourable Sir John Somers Lord Keeper of the Great Seal' a poem written in honour of King William III after his capture of Namur in sight of the whole French Army under Villeroi. This was Addison's first bid for success in Literature and the twenty-seven lines in which he then asked Somers to 'receive the present of a Muse unknown,' were honourably meant to be what Dr Johnson called 'a kind of rhyming introduction to Lord Somers.' If you, he said to Somers then—

'If you, well pleas'd shall smile upon my lays,
'Secure of fame, my voice I'll boldly raise,
'For next to what you write, is what you prize.'

Somers did smile, and at once held out to Addison his helping hand. Mindful of this, and of substantial friendship during the last seventeen years, Addison joined Steele in dedicating to his earliest patron the first volume of the Essays which include his best security of fame.

At that time, John Somers, aged 61, and retired from political life, was weak in health and high in honours earned by desert only. He was the son of an attorney at Worcester, rich enough to give him a liberal education at his City Grammar School and at Trinity College, Oxford, where he was entered as a Gentleman Commoner. He left the University, without taking a degree to practise law. Having a strong bent towards Literature as well as a keen, mainly interest in the vital questions which concerned the liberties of England under Charles the Second, he distinguished himself by political tracts which maintained constitutional rights. He rose at the bar to honour and popularity, especially after his pleading as junior counsel for Sincroft, Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Six Bishops, Lloyd, Turner, Lake, Ken, White, and Ireland, who signed the petition against the King's order for reading in all churches a Declaration for Liberty of Conscience, which they said 'was founded upon such a dispensing power as hath been often declared illegal in Parliament. Somers earned the gratitude of a people openly and loudly triumphing in the requital of the Seven Bishops. He was active also in co-operation with those who were planning the expulsion of the Stuarts and the bringing over of the Prince of Orange. During the Interregnum he, and at the same time also Charles Montague, afterwards Lord Halifax, first entered Parliament. He was at the conference with the one who is not of the most consummate and most acknowledged Merit None but a person of a finished Character can be

Lords upon the question of declaring the Throne vacant. As Chairman of the Committee appointed for the purpose, it was Somers who drew up the Declaration of Right, which, in placing the Prince and Princess of Orange on the throne, set forth the grounds of the Revolution and asserted against royal encroachment the ancient rights and liberties of England. For these services and for his rare ability as a constitutional lawyer, King William, in the first year of his reign, made Somers Solicitor General. In 1692 he became Attorney-General as Sir John Somers, and soon afterwards, in March 1692-3, the Great Seal, which had been four years in Commission, was delivered to his keeping, with a patent entitling him to a pension of £2000 a year from the day he quitted office. He was then also sworn in as Privy Councillor. In April 1697 Somers as Lord Keeper delivered up the Great Seal, and received it back with the higher title of Lord Chancellor. He was at the same time created Baron Somers of Eyesham, Crown property was also given to him to support his dignity. One use that he made of his influence was to procure young Addison a pension, that he might be forwarded in service of the State. Party spirit among his political opponents ran high against Somers. At the close of 1699 they had a majority in the Commons, and deprived him of office, but they failed before the Lords in an impeachment against him. In Queen Anne's reign, between 1705 and 1710, the constitutional statesman, long infirm of health, who had been in retirement serving Science as President of the Royal Society, was serving the State as President of the Council. But in 1712, when Addison addressed to him this Dedication of the first Volume of the first reprint of the Spectator, he had withdrawn from public life and four years afterwards he died of a stroke of apoplexy.

Of Somers as a patron Lord Macaulay wrote 'He had traversed the whole vast range of polite literature, ancient and modern. He was at once a munificent and a severely judicious patron of genius and learning. Locke owed opulence to Somers. By Somers Addison was drawn forth from a cell in a college. In distant countries the name of Somers was mentioned with respect and gratitude by great scholars and poets who had never seen his face. He was the benefactor of Leclerc. He was the friend of Filcaj. Neither political nor religious differences prevented him from extending his powerful protec-

the proper Patron of a Work, which endeavours to Cultivate and Polish Human Life, by promoting Virtue and Knowledge, and by recommending whatsoever may be either Useful or Ornamental to Society

I know that the Homage I now pay You, is offering a kind of Violence to one who is as solicitous to shun Applause, as he is assiduous to deserve it. But, my Lord, this is perhaps the only Particular in which your Prudence will be always disappointed

While Justice, Candour, Equity, and a Zeal for the Good of your Country, and the most persuasive Eloquence in bringing over others to it, are valuable Distinctions, You are not to expect that the Publick will so far comply with your Inclinations, as to forbear celebrating such extraordinary Qualities. It is in vain that You have endeavoured to conceal your Share of Merit, in the many National Services which You have effected. Do what You will, the present Age will be talking of your Virtues, tho' Posterity alone will do them Justice

Other Men pass through Oppositions and contending Interests in the ways of Ambition, but Your Great Abilities have been invited to Power, and importuned to accept of Advancement. Nor is it strange that this should happen to your Lordship, who could bring into the Service of Your Sovereign the Arts and Policies of Ancient Greece and Rome, as well as the most exact knowledge of our own Constitution in particular, and of the interests of Europe in general, to which I must also add, a certain Dignity in Yourself, that (to say the least of it) has been always equal to those great Honours which have been conferred upon You

It is very well known how much the Church owed to You in the most dangerous Day it ever saw, thro' the Arraignment of its Prelates, and how far the Civil Power in the late and present Reign, has been indebted to your Counsels and Wisdom

But to enumerate the great Advantages which the publick has received from your Administration, would be a more proper Work for an History, than an Address of this Nature

Your Lordship appears as great in your Private Life, as in the most Important Offices which You have born. I would therefore rather chuse to speak of the Pleasure You afford all who are admitted into your Conversation, of Your Elegant Taste in all the Polite Parts of Learning, of Your great Humanity and Complacency of Manners, and of the surprising Influence which is peculiar to You in making every one who converses with your Lordship prefer You to himself, without thinking the less meanly of his own Talents. But if I should take notice of all that might be observed in your Lordship, I should have nothing new to say upon any other Character of Distinction

I am,

My Lord,
Your Lordship's Most Obedient,
Most Devoted
Humble Servant,

I HAVE observed, that a Reader seldom peruses a Book with Pleasure till he knows whether the Writer of it be a black or a fair Man, of a mild or choleric Disposition, Married or a Bachelor, with other Particulars of the like nature, that conduce very much to the right Understanding of an Author. To gratify this Curiosity, which is so natural to a Reader, I design this Paper, and my next, is Prefatory Discourses to my following Writings, and shall give some Account in them of the several persons that are engaged in this Work. As the chief trouble of Compiling, Digesting, and

'tion to merit Hickes, the fiercest and most intolerant of all the non-jurors, obtained, by the influence of Somers, permission to study Teutonic antiquities in freedom and safety. Vertue, a strict Roman Catholic, was raised, by the discriminating and liberal patronage of Somers, from poverty and obscurity to the first rank among the engravers of the age'

Correcting will fall to my Share, I must do myself the Justice to open the Work with my own History

I was born to a small Hereditary Estate, which [according to the tradition of the village where it lies,<sup>1</sup>] was bounded by the same Hedges and Ditches in William the Conqueror's Time that it is at present, and has been delivered down from Father to Son whole and entire, without the Loss or Acquisition of a single Field or Meadow, during the Space of six hundred Years. Here [runs<sup>2</sup>] a Story in the Family, that when my Mother was gone with Child of me about three Months, she dreamt that she was brought to Bed of a Judge. Whether this might proceed from a Law suit which was then depending in the Family, or my Father's being a Justice of the Peace, I cannot determine, for I am not so vain as to think it presaged any Dignity that I should arrive at in my future Life though that was the Interpretation which the Neighbourhood put upon it. The Gravity of my Behaviour at my very first Appearance in the World, and all the Time that I sucked, seemed to favour my Mother's Dream

For, as she has often told me, I threw away my Rattle before I was two Months old, and would not make use of my Coral till they had taken away the Bells from it

As for the rest of my Infancy, there being nothing in it remarkable, I shall pass it over in Silence. I find that, during my Nonage, I had the reputation of a very sullen Youth, but was always a favourite of my School-master, who used to say, that my parts were solid, and would wear well. I had not been long at the University, before I distinguished myself by a most profound Silence. For, during the Space of eight Years, excepting in the publick Exercises of the College, I scarce uttered the Quantity of an hundred Words, and indeed do not remember that I ever spoke three Sentences together in my whole Life. Whilst I was in this Learned Body, I applied myself with so much Diligence to my Studies, that there are very few celebrated Books, either in the Learned or the Modern Tongues, which I am not acquainted with.

Upon the Death of my Father I was resolved to travel into Foreign Countries, and therefore left the University, with the Character of an odd unaccountable Fellow, that had a great deal of Learning, if I would but show it. An insatiable Thirst after Knowledge carried me into all the Countries of Europe, [in which] there was any thing new or strange to be seen; and, to such a Degree was my curiosity roused, that having read the controversies of some great Men concerning the Antiquities of Egypt, I made a Voyage to Grand Cairo, on purpose to take the Measure of a Pyramid, and, as soon as I had set my self right in that Particular, returned to my Native Country with great Satisfaction.

I have passed my latter Years in this City, where I am frequently seen in most publick Places, tho' there are not above half a dozen of my select Friends that know me, of whom my next Paper shall give a more particular Account. There is no place of [general] Resort wherein I do not often make my appearance, sometimes I am seen thrusting my Head into a Round of Politicians at Will's,<sup>1</sup> and listening with great Attention to the Narratives that are made in those little Circular Audiences. Sometimes I smook a Pipe at Child's,<sup>2</sup> and, while I seem attentive to nothing but the Post Man,<sup>3</sup> over-hear the Conversation of every Table in the Room. I appear on Sunday nights at St James's Coffee House,<sup>4</sup> and sometimes join the little Committee of Politicks in the Inner Room, as one who comes there to hear and improve. My Face is likewise very well known at

<sup>2</sup> This is said to allude to a description of the Pyramids of Egypt, by John Greaves, a Persian scholar and Savilian Professor of Astronomy at Oxford, who studied the principle of weights and measures in the Roman Foot and the Denarius, and whose visit to the Pyramids in 1638, by aid of his patron Laud, was described in his 'Pyramidographia.' That work had been published in 1646, sixty five years before the appearance of the Spectator, and Greaves died in 1652. But in 1706 appeared a tract, ascribed to him by its title page, and popular enough to have been reprinted in 1727 and 1745, entitled, 'The Origin and Antiquity of our English Weights and Measures discovered by their near agreement with such Standards that are now found in 'one of the Egyptian Pyramids'.' It based its arguments on measurements in the 'Pyramidographia,' and gave to Professor Greaves, in Addison's time, the same position with regard to Egypt that has been taken in our time by the Astronomer-Royal for Scotland, Professor Pirbright Smyth.

<sup>1</sup> The Grecian Coffee House was in Devereux Court, Strand, and named from a Greek, Constantine, who kept it. Close to the Temple, it was a place of resort for the lawyers. Constantine's Greek had tempted also Greek scholars to the house, learned Professors and Fellows of the Royal Society. Here, it is said, two friends quarrelled so bitterly over a Greek accent that they went out into Devereux Court and fought a duel, in which one was killed on the spot.

<sup>3</sup> Drury Lane had a theatre in Shakespeare's time, 'the Phoenix,' called also 'the Cockpit.' It was destroyed in 1617 by a Puritan mob, re-built, and occupied again till the stoppage of stage-plays in 1648. In that theatre Marlowe's 'Jew of Malta,' Massinger's 'New Way to Pay Old Debts,' and other pieces of good literature, were first produced. Its players under James I were 'the Queen's servants.' In 1656 Drury Lane broke through the restriction upon stage plays, and took actors and musicians to 'the Cockpit,' from Aldersgate Street. After the Restoration, Davenant having obtained a patent, occupied, in Portugal Row, the Lincoln's Inn Theatre, and afterwards one on the site of Dorset House, west of Whitefriars, the last theatre to which people went in boats. Sir William Davenant, under the patronage of the Duke of York, called his the Duke's Players. Thomas Killigrew then had 'the Cockpit' in Drury Lane, his company being that of the King's Players, and it was Killigrew who, dissatisfied with the old 'Cockpit,' opened, in 1653, the first Drury Lane Theatre, nearly upon the site now occupied by D L No 4. The original theatre, burnt in 1671-2, was re-built by Sir Christopher Wren, and opened in 1674 with a Prologue by Dryden. That (D L No 2) was the house visited by the Spectator. It required rebuilding in 1741 (D L No 3) and was burnt down, and again re-built, in 1809, as we now have it (D L No 4). There was no Covent Garden Theatre till after the Spectator's time, in 1733, when that house was first opened by Rich, the harlequin, under the patent granted to the Duke's Company.

In 1711 the other great house was the theatre in the Haymarket, recently built by Sir John Vanbrugh, author of 'The Provoked Wife,' and architect of Blenheim. This Haymarket Theatre, on the site of that known as 'Her Majesty's,' was designed and opened by Vanbrugh in 1706, thirty persons of quality having subscribed a hundred pounds each towards the cost of it. He and Congreve were to write the plays, and Betterton was to take charge of their performance. The speculation was a failure partly because the fields and meadows of the west end of the town cut off the poorer playgoers of the City, who could not afford coach hire, partly because the house was too large, and its architecture swallowed up the voices of the actors. Vanbrugh and Congreve opened their grand west end theatre with concession to the new taste of the fashionable for Italian Opera. They began with a translated opera set to Italian music, which ran only for three nights. Sir John Vanbrugh then produced his comedy of 'The Confederacy,' with less success than it deserved. In a few months Congreve abandoned his share in the undertaking. Vanbrugh proceeded to adapt for his new house three plays of Molière. Then Vanbrugh, still failing, let the Haymarket to Mr Owen Swiney, a trusted agent of the manager of Drury Lane, who was to allow him to draw what actors he pleased from Drury Lane and divide profits. The recruited actors in the Haymarket had better success. The secret league between the two theatres was broken. In 1707 the Haymarket was supported by a subscription headed by Lord Halifax. But presently a new joint patentee brought energy into the councils of Drury Lane. Amicable restoration was made to the Theatre Royal of the actors under Swiney at the Haymarket, and to compensate Swiney for his loss of profit, it was agreed that while Drury Lane confined itself to the acting of plays, he should profit by the new taste for Italian music, and devote the house in the Haymarket to opera. Swiney was content. The famous singer Nicolini had come over, and the town was impatient to hear him. This compact held for a short time. It was broken then by quarrels behind the scenes. In 1709 Wilks, Dogget, Cibber, and Mrs Oldfield treated with Swiney to be sharers with him in the Haymarket as heads of a dramatic company. They contracted the width of the theatre, brought down its enormously high ceiling, thus made the words of the plays audible, and had the town to themselves, till a lawyer, Mr William Collier, M P for Iruro, in spite of the counter attraction of the trial of Sacheverell, obtained a license to open Drury Lane, and produced an actress who drew money to Charles Shadwell's comedy, 'The Fair Quaker of Deal.' At the close of the season Collier agreed with Swiney and his actor-colleagues to give up to them Drury Lane with its actors, take in exchange the Haymarket with its singers, and be sole Director of the Opera: the actors to pay Collier two hundred a year for the use of his license, and to close their house on the Wednesdays when an opera was played.

This was the relative position of Drury Lane and the Haymarket theatres when the Spectator first appeared. Drury Lane had entered upon a long season of greater prosperity than it had enjoyed for thirty years before. Collier, not finding the Haymarket as prosperous as it was fashionable, was planning a change of place with Swiney, and he so contrived, by lawyer's wit and court influence, that in the winter following 1711 Collier was at Drury Lane with a new license for himself, Wilks, Dogget, and Cibber, while Swiney, transferred to the Opera, was suffering a ruin that caused him to go abroad, and be for twenty years afterwards an exile from his country.

pass for a Jew in the Assembly of Stock-Jobbers at Jonathan's.<sup>1</sup> In short, wherever I see a Cluster of People, I always mix with them, tho' I never open my Lips but in my own Club.

Thus I live in the World, rather as a Spectator of Mankind, than as one of the Species by which means I have made myself a Speculative Statesman, Soldier, Merchant, and Artizan, without ever meddling with any Practical Part in Life. I am very well versed in the Theory of an Husband or a Father, and can discern the Errors in the Economy Business, and Devotion of others, better than those who are engaged in them, as Standers-by discover Blots, which are apt to escape those who are in the Game. I never espoused any Party with Violence, and am resolved to observe an exact Neutrality between the Whigs and Tories, unless I shall be forced to declare myself by the Hostilities of either side. In short, I have acted in all the parts of my Life as a Looker on, which is the Character I intend to preserve in this Paper.

I have given the Reader just so much of my History and Character, as to let him see I am not altogether unqualified for the Business I have undertaken. As for other Particulars in my Life and Adventures, I shall insert them in following Papers, as I shall see occasion. In the mean time, when I consider how much I have seen, read, and heard, I begin to blame my own Taciturnity, and since I have neither Time nor Inclination to communicate the Fulness of my Heart in Speech, I am resolved to do it in Writing and to Print my self out, if possible, before I Die. I have been often told by my Friends that it is Pity so many useful Discoveries which I have made, should be in the Possession of a Silent Man. For this Reason therefore, I shall publish a Sheet full of Thoughts every Morning, for the Benefit of my Contemporaries, and if I can any way contribute to the Division or Improvement of the Country in which I live, I shall leave it, when I am summoned out of it, with the secret Satisfaction of thinking that I have not Lived in vain.

There are three very material Points which I have not spoken to in this Paper, and which, for several important Reasons, I must keep to myself, at least for some Time. I mean, in Account of my Name, my Age, and my Lodgings. I must confess I would grudge my Reader in any thing that is reasonable, but as for these three Particulars, though I am sensible they might tend very much to the Embellishment of my Paper, I cannot yet come to a Resolution of communicating them to the Publick. They would indeed draw me out of that Obscurity which I have enjoyed for many Years, and expose me in Publick Places to several Salutes and Civilities, which have been always very disagreeable to me for the greatest [pain] I can suffer, [is<sup>2</sup>] the being talked to, and being stared at. It is for this Reason likewise, that I keep my Complexion and Dress, as very great Secrets, tho' it is not impossible, but I may make Discoveries of both in the Progress of the Work I have undertaken.

After having been thus particular upon my self, I shall in to-morrow's Paper give an Account of those Gentlemen who are concerned with me in this Work. For, as I have before intimated, a Plan of it is laid and concerted (as all other Matters of Importance are) in a Club. However, as my Friends have engaged me to stand in the front, those who have a mind to correspond with me, may direct their Letters To the Spectator, at Mr Buckley's, in Little Britain.<sup>3</sup> For I must further acquaint the Reader, that tho' our Club meets only on Tuesdays and Thursdays, we have appointed a Committee to sit every Night, for the Inspection of all such Papers as may contribute to the Advancement of the Publick Weal. THE first of our Society is a Gentleman of Worcestershire, of ancient Descent, a Baronet, his Name Sir ROGER DE COVERLEY.<sup>3</sup> His great Grandfather was Inventor of that famous Country-Dance which is call'd after him. All who know that Shire are very well acquainted with the Parts and Merits of Sir ROGER. He is a Gentleman that is very singular in his Behaviour, but his Singularities proceed from his good Sense, and are Contradictions to the Manners of the World, only as he thinks the World is in the wrong. However, this Humour creates him no Enemies, for he does nothing with Sourness or Obstinacy, and his being unconfin'd to Modes and Forms, makes him but the reader and more capable to please and oblige all who know him. When he is in town he lives in Soho Square.<sup>4</sup> It is said, he keeps himself a Brachelour by reason

<sup>4</sup> Soho Square was then a new and most fashionable part of the town. It was built in 1681. The Duke of Monmouth lived in the centre house, facing the statue. Originally the square was called King Square. Pennant mentions, on Pegg's authority, a tradition that on the death of Monmouth, his admirers changed the name to Soho, the word of the day at the field of Sedg-

he was crossed in Love by a perverse beautiful Widow of the next County to him. Before this Disappointment, Sir ROGER was what you call a fine Gentleman, had often supped with my Lord Rochester<sup>1</sup> and Sir George Etherege,<sup>2</sup> fought a Duel upon his first coming to Town, and kick'd Bully Dawson<sup>3</sup> in a publick Coffee house for calling him Youngster. But being ill used by the above-mentioned Widow, he was very serious for a Year and a half, and tho' his Temper being naturally jovial he at last got over it, he grew careless of himself and never dressed afterwards, he continues to wear a Coat and Doublet of the same Cut that were in Fashion at the Time of his Repulse, which, in his merry Humours, he tells us, has been in and out twelve Times since he first wore it. 'Tis said Sir ROGER grew humble in his Desires after he had forgot this cruel Beauty, inasmuch that it is reported he has frequently offended in Point of Chastity with Beggars and Gypsies, but this is look'd upon by his Friends rather as Matter of Raillery than Truth. He is now in his Fifty-sixth Year, cheerful, gay, and hearty, keeps a good House in both Town and Country, a great Lover of Mankind, but there is such a mirthful Cast in his Behaviour, that he is rather beloved than esteemed. His Tenants grow rich, his Servants look satisfied, all the young Women profess Love to him, and the young Men are glad of his Company. When he comes into a House he calls the Servants by their Names, and talks all the way Up Stairs to a Visit. I must not omit that Sir ROGER is a Justice of the Quorum, that he fills the chair at a Quarter Session with great Abilities, and three Months ago, gained universal Applause by explaining a Passage in the Game-Act.

moor. But the ground upon which the Square stands was called Soho as early as the year 1632. 'So ho' was the old call in hunting when a hare was found.

<sup>3</sup> Bully Dawson, was a grinning sharper of Whitefriars, is said to have been sketched by Sladwell in the Captum Hecumum of his comedy called 'The Squire of Alsatia.'

The Gentleman next in Esteem and Authority among us, is another Batchelour, who is a Member of the Inner Temple. A Man of great Probity, Wit, and Understanding, but he has chosen his Place of Residence rather to obey the Direction of an old humoursome Father, than in pursuit of his own Inclinations. He was plac'd there to study the Laws of the Land, and is the most learned of any of the House in those of the Stage. Aristotle and Longinus are much better understood by him than Littleton or Cook. The Father sends up every Post Questions relating to Marriage-Articles, Legacies, and Legacies, in the Neighbourhood, all which Questions he agrees with an Attorney to answer and take care of in the Lump. He is studying the Passions themselves, when he should be inquiring into the Debates among Men which arise from them. He knows the Argument of each of the Orations of Demosthenes and Tully, but not one Case in the Reports of our own Courts. No one ever took him for a Fool, but none, except his intimate Friends, know he has a great deal of Wit. This Turn makes him at once both disinterested and agreeable. As few of his Thoughts are drawn from Business, they are most of them fit for Conversation. His Taste of Books is a little too just for the Age he lives in: he has read all, but approves of very few. His Familiarity with the Customs, Manners, Actions, and Wrangings of the Antients, makes him a very delicate Observer of what occurs to him in the present World. He is an excellent Critick, and the Time of the Play is his Hour of Business, exactly at five he passes through New Inn, crosses through Russel Court and takes a turn at Will's till the play begins: he has his shoes rubb'd and his Perriwig powder'd at the Barber's as you go into the Rose.<sup>2</sup> It is for the Good of the Audience when he is at a Play, for the Actors have an Ambition to please him.

The Person of next Consideration is Sir ANDREW FREEPORT, a Merchant of great Eminence in the City of London. A Person of indefatigable Industry, strong Reason, and great Experience. His Notions of Trade are noble and generous, and (as every rich Man has usually some sly Way of jesting, which would make no great Figure were he not a rich Man) he calls the Sea the British Common. He is acquainted with Commerce in all its Parts, and will tell you that it is a stupid and barbarous Way to extend Dominion by Arms for true Power is to be got by Arts and Industry. He will often argue, that if this Part of our Trade were well cultivated, we should gain from one Nation and if another, from another. I have heard him prove that Diligence makes more lasting Acquisitions than Valour, and that Sloth has ruin'd more Nations than the Sword. He bounds in several frugal Mansions, amongst which the greatest I mention is, 'A Penny saved is a Penny got.'

A General Trader of good Sense is pleasanter Company than a General Scholar; and Sir Andrew having a natural untaught Eloquence, the Perspicuity of his Discourse gives the same Pleasure that it would in another Man. He has made his Tortures himself and says that Fortune may be richer than all Kingdoms, by a plain Method as he himself is richer than all Men that at the same time I can say that of him that there is not a point in the Company but blows home a Ship in which he is an Owner.

Next to Sir Andrew in the Club-room sits Captain St. Paul, a Gentleman of great Courage, good Understanding, but invincible Modesty. He is one of those that deserve very well, but are very ignorant at putting their Talents within the Observation of such as should take notice of them. He was some Years a Captain and behaved himself with great Gallantry in several Engagements, and at several Sieges, but having a small Estate of his own, and being next Heir to Sir Roger, he has quitted a Way of Life in which no Man can rise suitably to his Merit who is not something of a Courtier, as well as a Soldier. I have heard him often lament, that in a Profession where Merit is placed in so conspicuous a View, Impudence should get the better of Modesty. When he has talked to this Purpose, I never heard him make a more expressive, but frankly confess that he left the House, because he was not fit for it. A strict Honesty and an even regular Behaviour, are in themselves Obstacles to him that must press through Crowds who endeavour at the same End with himself, the Favour of a Commander. He will, however, in this Way of Talk, excuse Generals, for not disposing according to Men's Desert, or enquiring into it. For, says he, that great Man who has a Mind to help me, has as many to break through to come at me, as I have to come to him. Therefore he will conclude, that the Men who would make a Figure, especially in a military Way, must get over all false Modesty, and resist his Patron against the Importunity of other Pretenders, by a proper Assurance in his own Vindication. He says it is a civil Covardice to be backward in asserting what you ought to expect, as it is a military Fear to be slow in attacking when it is your Duty. With this Candour does the Gentleman speak of himself and others. The same Frankness runs through all his Conversation. The military Part of his Life has furnished him with many Adventures, in the Relation of which he is very agreeable to the Company for he is never over bearing, though accustomed to command Men in the utmost Degree below him nor ever too obsequious, from an Habit of obeying Men highly above him.

But that our Society may not appear a Set of Humourists unacquainted with the Gallantries and Pleasures of the Age, we have among us the gallant WILL HONEYCOMB, a Gentleman who, according to his Years, should be in the Decline of his Life, but having ever been very careful of his Person, and thus had a very easy Fortune, Time has made but very little Impression, either by Wrinkles on his Forehead, or Traces in his Hair. His Person is well turned, and of a good Height. He is very ready at that sort of Discourse with which Men usually entertain Women. He has all his Life dressed very well, and remembers Habits as others do Men. He can smile when one speaks to him, and laughs easily. He knows the History of every Mode, and can inform you from which of the French Kings, Wives, or Daughters had this Manner of curling their Hair, that Way of placing their Hoods, whose Frills was covered by such a Sort of Petticoat, and whose Vanity to show her Foot made that Part of the Dress so short in such a Year. In a Word, all his Conversation and Knowledge has been in the female World. As other Men of his Age will take Notice to you what such a Minister said upon such and such an Occasion, he will tell you when the Duke of Monmouth dined at Court such a Woman was then smitten, another was taken with him at the Head of his Troop in the Park. In all these important Relations, he has ever about the same time received a kind Chance, or a Blow of a Fan, from some celebrated Beauty, Mother of the present Lord such a one. If you speak of a young Commoner that said a lively thing in the House, he starts up, 'He has good Blood in his Veins, Pompey begot him, the Rogue cheated me in that Affair that young Fellow's Mother used me more like a Dog than any Woman I ever made Advances to.' This Way of Talking of his, very much enlivens the Conversation among us of a more sedate Turn, and I find there is not one of the Company but myself, who rarely speak at all, but speaks of him as of that Sort of Man, who is usually called a well-bred fine Gentleman. To conclude his Character, where Women are not concerned, he is an honest worthy Man.

I cannot tell whether I am to account him whom I am next to speak of, as one of our Company for he visits us but seldom, but when he does, it adds to every Man else a new Enjoyment of himself. He is a Clergyman, a very philosophick Man, of general Learning great Sanctity of Life, and the most exact good Breeding. He has the Misfortune to be of a very weak Constitution, and consequently cannot accept of such Cares and Business as Preferences in his Function would oblige him to. He is therefore among Divines what a Chamber-Counsellor is among Lawyers. The Probity of his Mind, and the Integrity of his Life, create him Followers, as being eloquent or loud advances others. He seldom introduces the Subject he speaks upon but we are so far gone in Years, that he observes when he is among us, an Earnestness to have him fall on some divine

IN one of my late Rambles, or rather Speculations, I looked into the great Hall where the Bank<sup>2</sup> is kept, and was not a little pleased to see the Directors, Secretaries, and Clerks, with all the other Members of that wealthy Corporation, ranged in their several Stations, according to the Parts they act in that just and regular Oeconomy. This revived in my Memory the many Discourses which I had both read and heard, concerning the Decay of Publick Credit, with the Methods of restoring it, and which, in my Opinion, have always been defective, because they have always been made with an Eye to separate Interests and Party Principles.

The Thoughts of the Day give my Mind Employment for the whole Night, so that I fell insensibly into a kind of Methodical Dream, which disposed all my Contemplations into a Vision or Allegory, or what else the Reader shall please to call it.

Methought I returned to the Great Hall, where I had been the Morning before, but to my Surprise, instead of the Company that I left there, I saw, towards the Upper-end of the Hall, a beautiful Virgin seated on a Throne of Gold. Her Name (as they told me) was Publick Credit. The Walls, instead of being adorned with Pictures and Maps, were hung with many Acts of Parliament written in Golden Letters. At the Upper end of the Hall was the Magna

<sup>2</sup> The Act of Uniformity, passed May 19, 1662, withheld promotion in the Church from all who had not received episcopal ordination, and required of all clergy assent to the contents of the Prayer Book on pain of being deprived of their spiritual promotions. It forbade all changes in matters of belief otherwise than by the king in Parliament. While it barred the unconstitutional exercise of a dispensing power by the king, and kept the settlement of its faith out of the hands of the clergy and in those of the people, it was so contrived also according to the temper of the majority that it served as a test act for the English Hierarchy, and cast out of the Church, as Nonconformists, those best members of its Puritan clergy, about two thousand in number, whose faith was sincere enough to make them sacrifice their livings to their sense of truth.

<sup>2</sup> The Bank of England was then only 17 years old. It was founded in 1694, and grew out of a loan of £1,200,000 for the public service, for which the lenders—so low was the public credit—were to have 8 per cent. interest, four thousand a year for expense of management, and a charter for 30 years, afterwards renewed from time to time, as the Governor and Company of the Bank of England.

And for my own part I was so transported with Joy, that I awak'd, tho' I must confess I would fain have fallen asleep again to have closed my Vision, if I could have done it

— Egregi Mortalem atque silenti! — Hor

AN Author, when he first appears in the World, is very apt to believe it has nothing to think of but his Performances. With a good Share of this Vanity in my Heart, I made it my Business these three Days to listen after my own Fame; and, as I have sometimes met with Circumstances which did not displease me, I have been encountered by others which gave me much Mortification. It is incredible to think how empty I have in this Time observ'd some Part of the Species to be, what mere Blanks they are when they first come abroad in the Morning, how utterly they are at a Stand, until they are set a going by some Paragraph in a News-Paper. Such Persons are very acceptable to a young Author, for they desire no more [in anything] but to be new, to be agreeable. If I found Consolation among such, I was as much disquieted by the Incapacity of others. These are Mortals who have a certain Curiosity without Power of Reflection, and perused my Papers like Spectators rather than Readers. But there is so little Pleasure in Enquiries that so nearly concern our selves (it being the worst Way in the World to Fame, to be too anxious about it), that upon the whole I resolv'd for the future to go on in my ordinary Way and without too much Fear or Hope about the Business of Reputation, to be very careful of the Design of my Actions, but very negligent of the Consequences of them.

It is an endless and frivolous Pursuit to act by any other Rule than the Care of satisfying our own Minds in what we do. One would think a silent Man, who concern'd himself with no one breathing, should be very liable to Misinterpretations and yet I remember I was once taken up for a Jesuit, for no other reason but my profound Taciturnity. It is from this Misfortune, that to be out of Harm's Way, I have ever since affected Crowds. He who comes into Assemblies only to gratify his Curiosity, and not to make a Figure, enjoys the Pleasures of Retirement in a more exquisite Degree, than he possibly could in his Closet the Lover the Ambitious, and the Miser, are followed thither by a worse Crowd than any they can withdraw from. So be exempt from the Passions with which others are tormented, is the only pleasing Solitude. I can very justly say with the ancient Sage, I am never less alone than when alone. As I am insignificant to the Company in publick Places, and as it is visible I do not come thither as most do, to shew my self I gratify the Vanity of all who pretend to make an Appearance, and often have a kind Looks from well dressed Gentlemen and Ladies, as a Poet would bestow upon one of his Audience. There are so many Gratifications attend this publick sort of Obscurity, that some little Distastes I daily receive have lost their Anguish and I [did the other day,] without the least Displeasure overhear one say of me, That strange Fellow, and another answer, I have known the Fellow's Face for these twelve Years, and so must you, but believe you are the first ever asked who he was. I here are, I must confess, many to whom my Person is as well known as that of their nearest Relations, who give themselves no further Trouble about calling me by my Name or Quality, but speak of me very currently by Mr what d'ye call him.

To make up for these trivial Disadvantages, I have the high Satisfaction of beholding all Nature with an unprejudiced Eye and having nothing to do with Men's Passions or Interests, I can with the greater Sagacity consider their Talents, Manners, Failings, and Merits.

It is remarkable, that those who want any one Sense, possess the others with greater Force and Vivacity. Thus my Want of, or rather Resignation of Speech, gives me all the Advantages of a dumb Man. I have, methinks, a more than ordinary Penetration in Seeing and fixt my self that I have looked into the Highest and Lowest of Mankind, and make shrewd Guesses, without being admitted to their Conversation, at the inmost thoughts and Reflections of all whom I behold. It is from hence that good or ill Fortune has no manner of Force towards affecting my Judgment. I see Men flourishing in Courts, and languishing in Jails, without being prejudiced from their Circumstances to their Favour or Disadvantage but from their inward Manner of bearing their Condition, often pity the Prosperous and admire the Unhappy.

Those who converse with the Dumb, know from the Turn of their Eyes and the Changes of their Countenance their Sentiments of the Objects before them. I have indulg'd my Silence to such an Extravagance, that the few who are intimate with me, answer my Smiles with concurrent Sen-imposed for the purpose and invented (in 1696), to relieve the want of currency, the issue of Exchange bills. Public credit revived, the Bank capital increased, the currency sufficed, and, says Earl Russell in his Essay on the English Government and Constitution, 'from this time loans were made of a vast increasing amount with great facility, and generally at a low interest, by which the nation were enabled to resist their enemies.' The French wondered at the prodigious efforts that were made by so small a power, and the abundance with which money was poured into its treasury. Books were written, projects drawn up, edicts prepared, which were to give to France 'the same facilities as her rival every plan that fiscal ingenuity could strike out, every calculation that laborious arithmetic could form, was proposed, and tried, and found wanting and for this simple reason, that in all their projects drawn up in imitation of England, one little element was omitted, indolence, her free constitution. That is what Addison means by his allegory tences, and argue to the very Point I shal'd my Head at without my speaking. With this Discourse was very entertaining the other Night at a Play to a Gentleman who sat on his right Hand, while I was at his Left. The Gentleman believed Wit was talking to himself, when upon my looking, with great Approbation at a young thing in a Box before us, he said, 'I am quite of another Opinion. She has, I will allow, a very pleasing Aspect, but, methinks, that Simplicity in her Countenance is rather childish than innocent.' When I observed her a second time, he said, 'I grant her Dress is very becoming, but perhaps the Merit of Choice is owing to her Mother, for though, continued he, I allow a Beauty to be as much to be commended for the Elegance of her Dress, as a Wit for that of his Language: yet if she has stolen the Colour of her Ribbands from her Mother, or had Advice about her Trimmings, I shall not allow her the Praise of Dress, any more than I would call a Playwright an Author.' When I threw my Eye towards the next Woman to her, WILL spoke what I looked according to his romantic imagination, in the following Manner.

'Behold, you who dare that charming Virgin Behold the Beauty of her Person charmed by the Innocence of her Thoughts. Chastity, Good-Nature, and Affability, are the Graces that play in her Countenance. She knows she is handsome, but she knows she is good. Conscious Beauty, adorned with conscious Virtue! What a Spirit is there in those Eyes! What a Bloom in that Person! How is the whole Woman expressed in her Appearance! Her Air has the Beauty of Motion, and her Look the Force of Language.'

It was Prudence to turn away my Eyes from this Object, and therefore I turned them to the thoughtless Creatures, who make up the Lump of that Sex, and move a knowing Eye no more than the Portraiture of insignificant People by ordinary Painters, which are but Pictures of Pictures.

This the working of my own Mind, is the general Entertainment of my Life. I never enter into the Commerce of Discourse with any but my particular Friends, and not in Publick even with them. Such an Habit has perhaps risen in me uncommon Reflections, but this Effect I cannot communicate by my Writings. As my Pleasures are almost wholly confined to those of the Sight, I take it for a peculiar Happiness that I have always had an easy and familiar Admittance to the fair Sex. If I never praised or flattered, I never heeded or contradicted them. As these compose half the World, and are by the just Complaisance and Gallantry of our Nation the more powerful Part of our People, I shall dedicate a considerable Share of these my Speculations to their Service, and shall lead the young through all the becoming Duties of Virginitie, Marriage, and Widowhood. When it is a Woman's Day, in my Works, I shall endeavour at a Style and Air suitable to their Understanding. When I say this, I must be understood to mean, that I shall not lower but exalt the Subjects I treat upon. Discourse for their Entertainment, is not to be debased but refined. A Man may appear learned without talking Sentences as in his ordinary Gesture he discovers he can dance, tho' he does not cut Capers. In a Word, I shall take it for the greatest Glory of my Work, if among reasonable Women this Paper may furnish Sea-Table Talk. In order to it, I shall treat on Matters which relate to Females as they are concerned to approach or fly from the other Sex, or as they are tyed to them by Blood, Interest, or Affection. Upon this Occasion I think it but reasonable to declare, that whatever Skill I may have in Speculation, I shall never betray what the Eyes of Lovers say to each other in my Presence. At the same time I shall not think my self obliged by this Promise, to conceal any false Protestations which I observe made by Glances in publick Assemblies, but endeavour to make both Sexes appear in their Conduct what they are in their Hearts. By this Means Love, during the Time of my Speculations, shall be carried on with the same Sincerity as any other Affair of less Consideration. As this is the greatest Concern, Men shall be from henceforth liable to the greatest Reproach for Misbehaviour in it. Falschood in Love shall hereafter bear a thicker Aspect than Infidelity in Friendship or Villany in Business. For this great and good End, all Breaches against that noble Passion, the Cement of Society, shall be severely examined. But this and all other Matters loosely hinted at now and in my former Papers, shall have their proper Place in my following Discourses. The present writing is only to admonish the World, that they shall not find me an idle but a very busy Spectator.

Spectatum ad usum risum teneatis!—HOR

AN Opera may be allowed to be extravagantly lavish in its Decorations, as its only Design is to gratify the Senses, and keep up an indolent Attention in the Audience. Common Sense however requires that there should be nothing in the Scenes and Machines which may appear Childish and Absurd. How would the Wits of King Charles's time have laughed to have seen Nicomachi exposed to a Lempest in Robes of Ermin, and sailing in an open Boat upon a Sea of Paste-Board? What a Field of Rallery would they have been let into, had they been entertained with painted Dragons spitting Wild-fire, enchanted Chariots drawn by Handis Mares, and real Cascades in artificial Land-ships? A little Skill in Criticism would inform us that Shadows and Realities ought not to be mix'd together in the same Piece, and that Scenes, which are designed as the Representations of Nature, should be filled with Resemblances, and not with the Things themselves. If one would represent a wide Champain Country filled with Herds and Flocks, it would be ridiculous to draw the Country only upon the Scenes, and to crowd several Parts of the Stage with Sheep and Oxen. This is joining to rather Inconsistencies, and making the Decoration partly Real, and partly Imaginary. I would recommend what I have here said, to the Directors, as well as to the Admirers, of our Modern Opera.

As I was walking [in] the Streets about a Fortnight ago, I saw an ordinary Fellow carrying a Cage full of little Birds upon his Shoulder, and as I was wondering with my self what Use he would put them to, he was met very luckily by an Acquaintance, who had the same Curiosity. Upon his asking him what he had upon his Shoulder, he told him, that he had been buying Sparrows for the Opera. Sparrows for the Opera, says his Friend, licking his lips, what are they to be roasted? No, no, says the other, they are to enter towards the end of the first Act, and to fly about the Stage.

This strange Dialogue awakened my Curiosity so far that I immediately bought the Opera, by which means I perceived the Sparrows were to act the part of Singing Birds in a delightful Grove though, upon a nearer Enquiry I found the Sparrows put the same Trick upon the Audience, that Sir Martin Mar-all<sup>1</sup> practised upon his Mistress, for, though they flew in Sight, the Music proceeded from a Consort of Flagelets and Bird calls which was planted behind the Scenes. At the same time I made this Discovery, I found by the Discourse of the Actors, that there were great Designs on foot for the Improvement of the Opera, that it had been proposed to break down a part of the Wall, and to surprize the Audience with a Party of an hundred Horse, and that there was actually a Project of bringing the New River into the House, to be employed in Jetties and Water-works. This Project, as I have since heard, is post-poned 'till the Summer Season when it is thought the Coolness that proceeds from Fountains and Cascades will be more acceptable and refreshing to People of Quality. In the mean time, to find out a more agreeable Entertainment for the Winter-Season, the Opera of Rinaldo<sup>2</sup> is filled with Thunder and Lightning, Illuminations, and Fireworks which the Audience may look upon without catching Cold, and indeed without much Danger of being burnt, for there are several Engines filled with Water, and ready to play at a Minute's Warning, in case any such Accident should happen. However, as I have a very great Friendship for the Owner of this Theatre, I hope that he has been wise enough to insure his House before he would let this Opera be acted in it.

It is no wonder, that those Scenes should be very surprizing, which were contrived by two Poets of different Nations, and raised by two Magicians of different Sexes. Armida (as we are told in the Argument) was an Amazonian Enchantress, and poor Signior Cassano (as we learn from the Persons represented) a Christian Conjuror (Magico Cristiano). I must confess I am very much puzzled to find how an Amazon should be versed in the Black Art, or how a [good] Christian (for such is the part of the magician) should deal with the Devil.

To consider the Poets after the Conjurors, I shall give you a Taste of the Italian, from the first Lines of his Preface Le coti, lenici o Lettore, un Parto di poche Sere, che se ben nato di Noite, noi è però abortito d. Ienebre, mi si farà cooscere Figlio d Apollo con qualche Rugoso di Parrasso. Behold, gentle Reader, the Birth of a few Evenings, which, tho' it is the Offspring of the Night, is not the Aborigine of Darkness, but will make it self known to be the Son of Apollo, with a certain Ray of Parrassus. He afterwards proceeds to call Minster Heudel,<sup>3</sup> the Orphan of our Age, and to requirunt in, in the same Sublimity of Style, that he Composed this Opera in a fortnight. Such are the Wits, to whose Fates we so ambitiously conform our selves. The Truth of it is, the finest Writers among the Modern Italians express themselves in such a flood of Words, and such tedious Circumlocutions, as are used by none but Pedants in our own Country, and at the same time, fill their Writings with such poor Imaginations and Conceits, as our Youths are ashamed of, before they have been two Years at the University. Some may be apt to think that it is the difference of Genius which produces this difference in the Works of the two Nations but

1711, on the 24th of February, had a run of fifteen nights, and is accounted one of the best of the 35 operas composed by Handel for the English stage. Two airs in it, Cara sposa and Lascia ch'io pianga (the latter still admired as one of the purest expressions of his genius), made a great impression. In the same season the Haymarket produced 'Hamlet' as an opera by Grisparini, called Ambleto, with an overture that had four movements ending in a jig. But as was Grisparini so was Handel in the ears of Addison and Steele. They recognized in music only the sensual pleasure that it gave, and the words set to music for the opera, whatever the composer, were then, as they have since been, almost without exception, insults to the intellect.

to show there is nothing in this, if we look into the Writings of the old Italians, such as Cicero and Virgil, we shall find that the English Writers, in their way of thinking and expressing themselves resemble those Authors much more than the modern Italians pretend to do. And as for the Poet himself from whom the Dreams of this Opera are taken, I must entirely agree with Monsieur Boileau, that one Verse in Virgil is worth all the Chaucer or Tinsel of Tasso.

But to return to the Sparrows, there have been so many Flights of them let loose in this Opera, that it is feared the House will never get rid of them and that in other Plays, they may make their Entrance in very wrong and improper Scenes, so as to be seen flying in a Lady's Bed-Chamber, or perching upon a King's Throne, besides the Inconveniencies which the Heads of the Audience may sometimes suffer from them. I am credibly informed, that there was once a Design of casting into an Opera the Story of Whittington and his Cat, and that in order to it, there had been got together a great Quantity of Mice but Mr Rich, the Proprietor of the Play-House, very prudently considered that it would be impossible for the Cat to kill them all, and that consequently the Princes of his Stage might be as much infested with Mice, as the Prince of the Island was before the Cat's arrival upon it, for which Reason he would not permit it to be Acted in his House. And indeed I cannot blame him, for, as he said very well upon that Occasion, I do not hear that any of the Performers in our Opera, pretend to equal the famous Pied Piper, who made all the Mice of a great Town in Germany follow his Music, and by that means cleared the Prince of those little Noxious Animals.

Before I dismiss this Paper, I must inform my Reader, that I hear there is a Treaty on Foot with London and Wise<sup>2</sup> (who will be appointed Gardeners of the Play-House), to furnish the Opera of Rinaldo and Arnida with an Orange-Grove and that the next time it is Acted, the Singing Birds will be Personated by Linnets. The undertakers being resolved to spare neither Pains nor Money, for the Gratification of the Audience. C

The old story has been annexed to English literature by the genius of Robert Browning.

<sup>2</sup> Evelyn, in the preface to his translation of Quintiny's Complete Gardener 1701, says that the nursery of Messrs London and Wise far surpassed all the others in England put together. It exceeded 100 acres in extent. George London was chief gardener first to William and Mary, then to Queen Anne. London and Wise's nursery belonged at this time to a gardener named Swinhoe, but kept the name in which it had become famous.

*Credeant hoc grande Nefas, et Morte phandum,
Si Juvens Vexilo non assurrexerat* — Juv

I KNOW no Evil under the Sun so great as the Abuse of the Understanding, and yet there is no more Vice more common. It has diffus'd itself through both Sexes, and all Qualities of Mankind and there is hardly that Person to be found, who is not more concerned for the Reputation of Wit and Sense, than Honesty and Virtue. But this unhappy Affectation of being Wise rather than Honest, Witty than Good-natur'd, is the Source of most of the ill Habits of Life. Such false Impressions are owing to the abandon'd Writings of Men of Wit, and the backward Imitation of the rest of Mankind.

For this Reason, Sir ROGER was saying last Night, that he was of Opinion that none but Men of fine Parts deserve to be hanged. The Reflections of such Men are so delicate upon all Occurrences which they are concern'd in, that they should be expos'd to more than ordinary Infamy and Punishment, for offending against such quick Admonitions as their own Souls give them, and blunting the fine Edge of their Minds in such a Manner, that they are no more shock'd at Vice and Folly, than Men of slower Capacities. There is no greater Monster in Being, than a very ill Man of great Parts. He lives like a Man in a Palsy, with one Side of him dead. While perhaps he enjoys the Satisfaction of Luxury, of Wealth, of Ambition, he has lost the Taste of Good will, of Friendship, of Innocence. Scarecrow, the Beggar in Lucoli's-Inn Fields, who disabled himself in his Right Leg, and asks Alms all Day to get himself a warm Supper and a Trull at Night, is not half so despicable a Wretch as such a Man of Sense. The Beggar has no Relish above Sensations he finds Rest more agreeable than Motion and while he has a warm Fire and his Dog, never reflects that he deserves to be whipped. Every Man who terminates his Satisfaction and Enjoyments within the Supply of his own Necessities and Passions, is, says Sir ROGER, in my Eye as poor a Rogue as Scarecrow. But, continued he, for the loss of publick and private Virtue we are beholden to your Men of Parts forsooth it is with them no matter what is done, so it is done with an Air. But to me who am so whimsical in a corrupt Age as to act according to Nature and Reason, a selfish Man in the most shining Circumstance and Equipage, appears in the same Condition with the Fellow above mentioned, but more contemptible in Proportion to what more he robs the Publick of and enjoys above him. I lay it down therefore for a Rule, That the whole Man is to move together, that every Action of any Importance is to have a Prospect of publick Good and that the general Tendency of our indifferent Actions ought to be agreeable to the Dictates of Reason, of Religion, of good Breeding without this, a Man, as I have before hinted, is hopping instead of walking, he is not in his entire and proper Motion.

While the honest Knight was thus bewildering himself in good Starts, I look'd intently upon him, which made him I thought collect his Mind a little. What I am at, says he, is, to represent, I hat I am of Opinion to polish our Understandings and neglect our Manners is of all things the most inexcusable. Reason should govern Passion, but instead of that, you see, it is often subservient to it, and, as unaccountable as one would think it, a wise Man is not always a good Man. This Degeneracy is not only the Guilt of particular Persons, but also at some times of a whole People, and perhaps it may appear upon Examination, that the most polite Ages are the least virtuous. This may be attributed to the Folly of admitting Wit and Learning as Merit in themselves, without considering the Application of them. By this Means it becomes a Rule not so much to regard what we do, as how we do it. But this false Beauty will not pass upon Men of honest Minds and true Taste. Sir Richard Blackmore says, with as much good Sense as Virtue, It is a mighty Dishonour and Shame to employ excellent Faculties and abundance of Wit, to honour and please Men in their Vices and Follies. The great Enemy of Mankind, notwithstanding his Wit and Angelical Faculties, is the most odious Being in the whole Creation. He goes on soon after to say very generously, That he undertook the writing of his Poem to rescue the Muses out of the Hands of Ravishers, to restore them to their sweet and chaste Mansions, and to engage them in an Employment suitable to their Dignity. This certainly ought to be the Purpose of every man who appears in Publick, and whoever does not proceed upon that Foundation, injures his Country as far as he succeeds in his Studies. When Modesty ceases to be the chief Ornament of one Sex, and Integrity of the other, Society is upon a wrong Basis, and we shall be ever after without Rules to guide our Judgment in what is really becoming and ornamental. Nature and Reason direct one thing, Passion and Humour another. To follow the Dictates of the two latter, is going into a Road that is both endless and intricate when we pursue the other, our Passage is delightful, and what we aim at easily attainable.

I do not doubt but England is at present as polite a Nation as any in the World, but any Man who thinks can easily see, that the Affectation of being gay and in fashion has very near eaten up our good Sense and our Religion. Is there anything so just, as that Mode and Gallantry should be built upon exerting ourselves in what is proper and agreeable to the Institutions of Justice and Piety among us? And yet is there anything more common, than that we run in perfect Contradiction to them? All which is supported by no other Pretension, than that it is done with what we call a good Grace.

Nothing ought to be held laudable or becoming, but what Nature it self should prompt us to think so. Respect to all kind of Superiors is founded methinks upon Instinct, and yet what is so ridiculous as Age? I make this abrupt Transition to the Mention of this Vice more than any other, in order to introduce a little Story, which I think a pretty Instance that the most polite Age is in danger of being the most vicious.

It happen'd at Athens, during a publick Representation of some Play exhibited in honour of the Common-wealth that an old Gentleman came too late for a Place suitable to his Age and Quality. Many of the young Gentlemen who observed the Difficulty and Confusion he was in, made Signs to him that they would accommodate him if he came where they sat. The good Man bustled through the Crowd accordingly, but when he came to the Seats to which he was invited, the Jest was to sit close, and expose him, as he stood out of Countenance, to the whole Audience. The Frolic went round all the Athenian Benches. But on those Occasions there were also particular Places assigned for Foreigners. When the good Man skulked towards the Boxes appointed for the Lacedaemonians, that honest People, more virtuous than polite, rose up all to a Man, and with the greatest Respect received him among them. The Athenians being suddenly touched with a Sense of the Spartan Virtue, and their own Degeneracy, gave a Thunder of Applause and the old Man cry'd out, The Athenians understand what is good, but the Lacedaemonians practise it.

GOING Yesterday to Dine with an old Acquaintance, I had the Misfortune to find his whole Family very much dejected. Upon asking him the Occasion of it, he told me that his Wife had dreamt a strange Dream the Night before, which they were afraid portended some Misfortune to themselves or to their Children. At her coming into the Room, I observed a settled Melancholy in her Countenance, which I should have been troubled for, had I not heard from whence it proceeded. We were no sooner sat down, but, after having looked upon me a little while, My dear, says she, turning to her husband, you may now see the Stranger that was in the

Candle last Night Soon after this, as they began to talk of Family Affairs, a little Boy at the lower end of the Table told her, that he was to go into Join hand on Thursday Thursday, says she, no, Child, if it be as God, so I shall not begin upon Childermas day till your Writing Master that Friday will be soon enough I was reflecting with my self on the Oddness of her Fancy, and wondering that any body would establish it as a Rule to lose a Day in every Week. In the midst of these my Musings she desired me to reach her a little Salt upon the Point of my Knife, which I did in such a Trepidation and hurry of Obedience, that I let it drop by the way at which she immediately started, and said it fell towards her. Upon this I looked very blank and, observing the Concern of the whole Table, began to consider my self, with some Confusion, as a Person that had brought a Disaster upon the Family. The Lady how ever recovering her self, after a little space, said to her Husband with a Sigh, My Dear, Misfortunes never come Single My Friend, I found, voted but in under Part at his Table, and being a Man of more Good nature than Understanding, thinks himself obliged to fall in with all the Passions and Humours of his Yoke fellow. Do not you remember, Child, says she, that the Pigeon House fell the very Afternoon that our careless Wench, spilt the Salt upon the Table? Yes, says he, my Dear, and the next Post brought us an Account of the Battel of Almaraz.<sup>1</sup> The Reader may guess at the figure I made, after having done all this Mischief. I dispatched my Dinner as soon as I could, with my usual Tricuteny when, to my utter Confusion, the Lady seeing me [quitting<sup>2</sup>] my Knife and Fork, and lying them across one another upon my Plate, desired me that I should humour her so far as to take them out of that Figure, and place them side by side. What the Absurdity was which I had committed I did not know, but I suppose there was some traditionary Superstition in it and therefore, in obedience to the Lady of the House, I disposed of my Knife and Fork in two parallel Lines, which is the figure I shall always lay them in for the future, though I do not know any Reason for it.

It is not difficult for a Man to see that a Person has conceived an Aversion to him. For my own part, I quickly found, by the Lady's Looks, that she regarded me as a very odd kind of Fellow, with an unfortunate Aspect. For which Reason I took my leave immediately after Dinner, and withdrew to my own Lodgings. Upon my Return home, I fell into a profound Contemplation on the Evils that attend these superstitious Follies of Mankind how they subject us to imaginary Afflictions, and additional Sorrows, that do not properly come within our

Lot. As if the natural Calamities of Life were not sufficient for it, we turn the most indifferent Circumstances into Misfortunes, and suffer as much from trifling Accidents, as from real Evils. I have known the shooting of a Star spoil a Night's Rest and have seen a Man in Love grow pale and lose his Appetite, upon the plucking of a Merry-thought. A Screech-Owl at Midnight has alarmed a Family, more than a Band of Robbers nay, the Voice of a Cricket hath struck more Terror, than the Roaring of a Lion. There is nothing so inconsiderable [which<sup>3</sup>] may not appear dreadful to an Imagination that is filled with Omens and Prognosticks. A Rusty Nail, or a Crooked Pin, shoot up into Prodigious.

I remember I was once in a mixt Assembly, that was full of Noise and Mirth, when on a sudden an old Woman unluckily observed there were thirteen of us in Company. This Remark struck a panick Terror into several [who<sup>4</sup>] were present, inasmuch that one or two of the Ladies were going to leave the Room but a Friend of mine, taking notice that one of our female Companions was big with Child, affirm'd there were fourteen in the Room, and that instead of portending one of the Company should die, it plainly foretold one of them should be born. Had not my Friend found this Expedient to break the Omens, I question not but half the Women in the Company would have fallen sick that very Night.

An old Maid, that is troubled with the Vapours, produces infinite Disturbances of this kind among her Friends and Neighbours. I know a Maden Aunt, of a great Family, who is one of these Antiquated Sybils, that forebodes and prophesies from one end of the Year to the other. She is always seeing Apparitions, and hearing Death-Watches and was the other Day almost frighted out of her Wits by the great House-Dog, that howled in the Stable at a time when she lay ill of the Tooth-ach. Such an extravagant Crise of Mind engenders Multitudes of People, not only in impertinent Terrors, but in supernumerary Duties of Life, and arises from that Fear and Ignorance which are natural to the Soul of Man. The Horror with which we entertain the Thoughts of Death or indeed of any future Evil, and the Uncertainty of its Approach, fill a melancholy Mind with innumerable Apprehensions and Suspicions, and consequently dispose it to the Observation of such groundless Prodigious and Predictions. For as it is the chief Concern of Wise-Men, to retrench the Evils of Life by the Reasonings of Philosophy it is the Employment of Fools, to multiply them by the Sentiments of Superstition.

For my own part, I should be very much troubled were I endowed with this Dining Quality, though it should inform me truly of every thing that can befall me. I would not anticipate the Relish of any Happiness, nor feel the Weight of any Misery, before it actually arrives. I know but one way of fortifying my Soul against these gloomy Presages and Terrors of <sup>1</sup> Fought April 25 (O S 14), 1707, between the English, under Lord Galway, a Frenchman, with Portuguese, Dutch, and Spanish allies, and a superior force of French and Spaniards, under an Englishman, the Duke of Berwick, natural son of James II. Mind, and that is, by securing to my self the Friendship and Protection of that Being, who disposes of Events, and governs Futurity. He sees, at one View, the whole Thread of my Existence, not only that Part of it which I have already passed through, but that which runs forward into all the Depths of Eternity. When I lay me down to Sleep, I recommend my self to his Care: when I wake, I give my self up to his Direction. Amidst all the Evils that threaten me I will look up to him for Help, and question not but he will either avert them, or turn them to my Advantage. Though I know neither the Time nor the Manner of the Death I am to die, I am not at all solicitous about it, because I am sure that he knows them both, and that he will not fail to comfort and support me under them. *At Venus obscuro gradientes aere sepasit, Et multo Nebula circum Dea fudit amictu,

Cernere ne quis eos—Virg*

I SHALL here communicate to the World a couple of Letters, which I believe will give the Reader as good an Entertainment as any that I am able to furnish [him] with, and therefore shall make no Apology for them.

To the SPECTATOR, &c

SIR,

'I am one of the Directors of the Society for the Reformation of Manners, and therefore think myself a proper Person for your Correspondence. I have thoroughly examined the present State of Religion in Great Britain, and am able to acquaint you with the predominant Vice of every Market-Town in the whole Island. I can tell you the Progress that Virtue has made in all our Cities, Boroughs, and Corporations, and know as well the evil Practices that are committed in Berwick or Exeter, as what is done in my own Family. In a Word, Sir, I have my Correspondents in the remotest Parts of the Nation, who send me up punctual Accounts from time to time of all the little Irregularities that fall under their Notice in their several Districts and Divisions.

'I am no less acquainted with the particular Quarters and Regions of this great Town, than with the different Parts and Distributions of the whole Nation. I can describe every Parish by its Impieties, and can tell you in which of our Streets Lewdness prevails, which Gaming has taken the Possession of, and where Drunkenness has got the better of them both. When I am disposed to raise a Fine for the Poor, I know the Lanes and Allies that are inhabited by common Swearers. When I would encourage the Hospital of Bridewell, and improve the Hempen Manufacture, I am very well acquainted with all the Haunts and Resorts of Female Night-walkers.

'After this short Account of my self, I must let you know, that the Design of this Paper is to give you Information of a certain irregular Assembly which I think falls very properly under your Observation, especially since the Persons it is composed of are Criminals too considerable for the Amusements of our Society. I mean, Sir, the Midnight Masque, which has of late been frequently held in one of the most conspicuous Parts of the Town, and which I hear will be continued with Additions and Improvements. As all the Persons who compose this lawless Assembly are masked, we dare not attack any of them in our Way, lest we should send a Woman of Quality to Bridewell, or a Peer of Great-Britain to the Counter. Besides, that their Numbers are so very great, that I am afraid they would be able to rout our whole Fraternity, tho' we were accompanied with all our Guard of Constables. Both these Reasons which secure them from our Authority, make them obnoxious to yours, as both their Disguise and their Numbers will give no particular Person Reason to think himself affronted by you.

'If we are rightly inform'd, the Rules that are observed by this new Society are wonderfully contriv'd for the Advancement of Cuckoldom. The Women either come by themselves, or are introduced by Friends, who are obliged to quit them upon their first Entrance, to the Conversation of any Body that addresses himself to them. There are several Rooms where the Parties may retire, and, if they please, show their Faces by Consent. Whispers, Squeezes, Nods, and Embraces, are the innocent Freedoms of the Place. In short, the whole Design of this hideous Assembly seems to terminate in Assignations and Intrigues, and I hope you will take effectual Methods, by your publick Advice and Admonitions, to prevent such a promiscuous Multitude of both Sexes from meeting together in so clandestine a Manner.

I am,
Your humble Servant,
And Fellow Labourer,

I B

Not long after the Perusal of this Letter I received another upon the same Subject which by the Date and Style of it, I take to be written by some young Fopler.

Middle Temple, 1710-11

SIR,

'When a Man has been guilty of any Vice or Folly, I think the best Attonement he can make for it is to warn others not to fall into the like. In order to this I must acquaint you, I at some Time in February last I went to the Tuesday's Masquerade. Upon my first going in I was attacked by half a Dozen female Quakers, who seemed willing to adopt me for a Brother, but, upon a nearer Examination, I found they were a Sisterhood of Coquets, disguised in that precise Habit. I was soon after taken out to

'dance, and, as I fancied, by a Woman of the first Quality, for she was very tall, and moved gracefully. As soon as the Minuet was over, we agreed one another through our Masques, and as I am very well read in Il aller, I repeated to her the four following Verses out of his poem to Pauline

*The feeble Letter does not know
If Love Eyes they are, that round him so,
but confounded with thy Art, Figuress her Name that has his Heart*

'I pronounced these Words with such a penetrating Air, that I had some Reason to conclude I had made a Conquest. She told me that she hoped my Free was not akin to my Tongue, and looking upon her Watch, I accidentally discovered the Figure of a Coronet on the back. Part of it I was so transported with the Thought of such an Alliance, that I plied her from one Room to another with all the Gallantries I could invent, and at length brought things to so happy an Issue, that she gave me a private Meeting the next Day, without Paper or Footman, Coach or Equipage. My Heart danced in Raptures, but I had not lived in this golden Dream above three Days, before I found good Reason to wish that I had continued true to my Landress. I have since heard by a very great Accident, that this fine Lady does not live far from Covent Garden, and that I am not the first Cuck who has passed herself upon for a Countess.

'Thus, Sir, you see how I have mistaken a Cloud for a Juno, and if you can make any use of this Adventure for the Benefit of those who may possibly be as young Coxcombs as myself, I do most heartily give you Leave

I am,
Sir,
Your most humble admirer,

I design to visit the next Masquerade myself, in the same Habit I wore at Grand Canal, and till then shall suspend my Judgment of this Midnight Entertainment.

MAN is said to be a Sociable Animal, and, as an Instance of it we may observe, that we take all Occasions and Pretences of forming ourselves into those little Nocturnal Assemblies, which are commonly known by the name of Clubs. When a Set of Men find themselves agree in any Particular, tho' never so trivial, they establish themselves into a kind of Fraternity, and meet once or twice a Week, upon the Account of such a Particular Resemblance. I know a considerable Market town, in which there was a Club of 12

Men, that did not come together (as you may well suppose) to entertain one another with Sprightfulness and Wit, but to keep one another in Countenance. The Room, where the Club met, was something of the largest, and had two Entrances, the one by a Door of a moderate Size, and the other by a Pair of Folding-Doors. If a Candidate for this Corpulent Club could make his Entrance through the first he was looked upon as ungratified, but if he stuck in the Passage, and could not force his Way through it, the Folding-Doors were immediately thrown open for his Reception, and he was saluted as a Brother. I have heard that this Club, though it consisted but of fifteen Persons, weighed above three Tun.

In Opposition to this Society, there sprung up another composed of Scare-Crows and Skeletons, who being very meagre and envious, did all they could to thwart the Designs of their Bulky Brethren, whom they represented as Men of Dangerous Principles, till at length they worked them out of the Favour of the People, and consequently out of the Magistracy. These Factions tore the Corporation in Pieces for several Years, till at length they came to this Accommodation, that the two Bailiffs of the Town should be annually chosen out of the two Clubs, by which Means the principal Magistrates are at this Day coupled like Rabbits, one fat and one lean.

Every one has heard of the Club, or rather the Confederacy, of the Kings. This grand Alliance was formed a little after the Return of King Charles the Second, and admitted into it Men of all Qualities and Professions, provided they agreed in this Sir-name of King, which, as they imagined, sufficiently declared the Owners of it to be altogether untrainted with Republican and Anti-Monarchical Principles.

A Christian Name has likewise been often used as a Badge of Distinction, and made the Occasion of a Club. That of the Georges, which used to meet at the Sign of the George, on St George's day, and swear Before George, is still fresh in every one's Memory.

There are at present in several Parts of this City what they call Street Clubs, in which the chief Inhabitants of the Street converse together every Night. I remember, upon my enquiring after Lodgings in Ormond-Street, the Landlord, to recommend that Quarter of the Town, told me there was at that time a very good Club in it, he also told me, upon further Discourse with him, that two or three noisy Country Squires, who were settled there the Year before, had considerably sunk the Price of House-Rent, and that the Club (to prevent the like Inconveniences for the future) had thoughts of taking every House that became vacant into their own Hands, till they had found a Tenant for it, of a Sociable Nature and good Conversation.

The Hum Club, of which I was formerly an unworthy Member, was made up of very honest Gentlemen, of peaceable Dispositions, that used to sit together, smoke their Pipes, and say nothing till Mid-night. The Hum Club (as I am informed) is an Institution of the same Nature, and as great an Enemy to Noise.

After these two innocent Societies, I cannot forbear mentioning a very mischievous one, that was erected in the Reign of King Charles the Second I mean the Club of Duellists, in which none was to be admitted that had not fought his Mum. The President of it was said to have killed half a dozen in single Combat and as for the other Members, they took their Seats according to the number of their Slain. There was likewise a Side Table for such as had only drawn Blood, and shown a laudable Ambition of being the first Opportunity to qualify themselves for the first Table. This Club, consisting only of Men of Honour, did not continue long, most of the Members of it being put to the Sword, or hanged, a little after its Institution.

Our Modern celebrated Clubs are founded upon Eating and Drinking, which are Points wherein most Men agree, and in which the Learned and Illiterate, the Dull and the Airy, the Philosopher and the Buffoon, can all of them bear a Part. The Kit-Cat<sup>1</sup> itself is said to have taken its Original from a Mutton Pie. The Beef-Steak,<sup>2</sup> and October<sup>3</sup> Clubs, are neither of themaverse to Eating and Drinking, if we may form a Judgment of them from their respective Titles.

When Men are thus knit together, by Love of Society, not a Spirit of Faction, and do not meet to censure or annoy those that are absent, but to enjoy one another. When they are thus combined for their own Improvement, or for the Good of others, or at least to relax themselves from the Business of the Day, by an innocent and cheerful Conversation, there may be something very useful in these little Institutions and Establishments.

I cannot forbear concluding this Paper with a Scherme of Laws that I met with upon a Wall in a little ale house. How I came thither I may inform my Reader at a more convenient time. These Laws were enacted by a Knot of Artizans and Mechnicks, who used to meet every Night, and as there is something in them which gives us a pretty Picture of low Life, I shall transcribe them Word for Word.

RULES to be observed in the Two penny Club, erected in this Place, for the Preservation of Friendship and good Neighbourhood

I Every Member at his first coming in shall lay down his Two Pence

II Every Member shall fill his Pipe out of his own Box

III If any Member absents himself he shall forfeit a Penny for the Use of the Club, unless in case of Sickness or Imprisonment.

IV If any Member swears or curses, his Neighbour may give him a Kick upon the Shins

V If any Member tells Stories in the Club that are not true, he shall forfeit for every third Lie an Half-Penny

VI If any Member strikes another wrongfully, he shall pay his Club for him

VII If any Member brings his Wife into the Club, he shall pay for whatever she drinks or smokes

VIII If any Member's Wife comes to fetch him Home from the Club, she shall speak to him without the Door

IX If any Member calls another Cuck-old, he shall be turned out of the Club

X None shall be admitted into the Club that is of the same Trade with any Member of it

XI None of the Club shall have his Cloaths or Shoes made or mended, but by a Brother Member

XII No Non juror shall be capable of being a Member

The Morality of this little Club is guarded by such wholesome Laws and Penalties, that I question not but my Reader will be as well pleased with them, as he would have been with the Leges Convivales of Ben Jonson, the Regulations of an old Roman Club cited by Lysius, or the rules of a Symposium in an ancient Greek author. C

<sup>1</sup> The Kit-Cat Club met at a famous Mutton Pie house in Shire Lane, by Temple Bar. The house was kept by Christopher Cat, after whom his pies were called Kit Cats. The club originated in the hospitality of Jacob Tonson, the bookseller, who, once a week, was host at the house in Shire Lane to a gathering of writers. In an occasional poem on the Kit Cat Club, attributed to Sir Richard Blackmore, Jacob is read backwards into Bocaj, and we are told

*One Night in Seven at this convenient Seat Indulgent Bocaj did the Muses treat,
Their Drink was generous Wine and Kit Cat's Pies their Meat
Hence did the Assembly's Title first arise,
And Kit-Cat Wits spring first from Kit Cat's Pies*

About the year 1700 this gathering of wits produced a club in which the great Whig chiefs were associated with foremost Whig writers, Tonson being Secretary. It was as much literary as political, and its 'tosting glasses,' each inscribed with lines to a reigning beauty, caused Arbuthnot to derive its name from 'its pell mell pack of 'torsts'.

Of old Cats and young Kits

Tonson built a room for the Club at Barn Elms to which each member gave his portrait by Sir Godfrey Kneller, who was himself a member. The pictures were on a new sized canvas adapted to the height of the walls, whence the name 'kit cat' came to be applied generally to three quarter length portraits.

<sup>2</sup> The Beef Steak Club, founded in Queen Anne's time, first of its name, took a gridiron for badge, and had cheery Dick Esteourt the actor for its providore. It met at a tavern in the Old Jewry that had old repute for broiled steaks and 'the true British quintessence of malt and hops'.

portrait of Queen Anne that used to hang in its Club room is now in the Town Council-chamber at Salisbury.

IT is with much Satisfaction that I hear this great City inquiring Day by Day after these my Papers, and receiving my Morning Lectures with a becoming Seriousness and Attention. My Publisher tells me, that there are already Three Thousand of them distributed every Day. So that if I allow Twenty Readers to every Paper, which I look upon as a modest Computation, I may reckon about Threescore thousand Disciples in London and Westminster, who I hope will take care to distinguish themselves from the thoughtless Herd of their ignorant and inattentive brethren. Since I have refused to myself so great an Audience, I shall spare no Pains to make their Instruction agreeable, and their Diversion useful. For which Reasons I shall endeavour to enliven Morality with Wit, and to temper Wit with Morality, that my Readers may, if possible, both Ways find their account in the Speculation of the Day. And to the End that their Virtue and Discretion may not be short transient intermitting Starts of Thought, I have resolved to refresh their Memories from Day to Day, till I have recovered them out of that despicable State of Vice and Folly, into which the Age is fallen. The Mind that lies fallow but a single Day, sprouts up in Follies that are only to be killed by a constant and assiduous Culture. It was said of Socrates, that he brought Philosophy down from Heaven, to inhabit among Men and I shall be ambitious to have it said of me, that I have brought Philosophy out of Closets and Libraries, Schools and Colleges, to dwell in Clubs and Assemblies, at Tea-tables, and in Coffee-houses.

I would therefore in a very particular Manner recommend these my Speculations to all well-regulated Families, that set apart an Hour in every Morning for Tea and Bread and Butter and would earnestly advise them for their Good to order this Paper to be punctually served up, and to be looked upon as a Part of the Tea Equipage.

Sir Francis Bacon observes, that a well-written Book, compared with its Rivals and Antagonists, is like Moses's Serpent, that immediately swallowed up and devoured those of the Egyptians. I shall not be so vain as to think, that where the SPECTATOR appears, the other publick Prints will vanish; but shall leave it to my Readers Consideration, whether, Is it not much better to be let into the Knowledge of ones-self, than to hear what passes in Miscory, or Peland and to amuse our selves with such Writings as tend to the weiring out of Ignorance, Passion, and Prejudice, than such as naturally conduce to inflame Hatreds, and make Enmities irreconcilable.

In the next Place, I would recommend this Paper to the daily Perusal of those Gentlemen whom I cannot but consider as my good Brothers and Allies, I mean the Fraternity of Spectators who live in the World without having any thing to do in it and either by the Affluence of their Fortunes, or Laziness of their Dispositions, have no other Business with the rest of Mankind but to look upon them. Under this Class of Men are comprehended all contemplative Tradesmen, titular Physicians, Fellows of the Royal Society, Templers that are not given to be contentious, and Statesmen that are out of business. In short, every one that considers the World as a Theatre, and desires to form a right Judgment of those who are the Actors on it.

There is another Set of Men that I must likewise try a Clum to, whom I have lately called the Blanks of Society, as being altogether unfurnished with Ideas, till the Business and Conversation of the Day has supplied them. I have often considered these poor Souls with an Eye of great Commiseration, when I have heard them asking the first Man they have met with, whether there was any News stirring? and by that Means gathering together Materials for thinking. These needy Persons do not know what to talk of, till about twelve o'Clock in the Morning, for by that Time they are pretty good Judges of the Weather, know which Way the Wind sits, and whether the Dutch Mail be come in. As they lie at the Mercy of the first Man they meet, and are grave or impertinent all the Day long, according to the Notions which they have imbibed in the Morning, I would earnestly entreat them not to stir out of their Chambers till they have read this Paper, and do promise them that I will duly instil into them such sound and wholesome Sentiments, as shall have a good Effect on their Conversation for the ensuing twelve Hours.

But there are none to whom this Paper will be more useful than to the female World. I have often thought there has not been sufficient Pains taken in finding out proper Employments and Diversions for the Fair ones. Their Amusements seem contrived for them rather as they are Women, than as they are reasonable Creatures and are more adapted to the Sex, than to the Species. The Toilet is their great Scene of Business, and the right adjusting of their Hair the principal Employment of their Lives. The sorting of a Suit of Ribbons is reckoned a very good Morning's Work, and if they make an Excursion to a Mercers or a Toy-shop, so great a Fatigue makes them unfit for any thing else all the Day after. Their more serious Occupations are Sewing and Embroidery, and their greatest Drudgery the Preparation of Jellies and Sallets. This, I say, is the State of ordinary Women tho I know there are Multitudes of those of a more elevated Life and Conversation, that move in an exalted Sphere of Knowledge and Virtue, that join all the beauties of the Mind to the Ornaments of Dress, and inspire a kind of Awe and Respect, as well as Love, into their Male-Believers. I hope to increase the Number of these by publishing this daily Paper, which I shall always endeavour to make as innocent if not as improving Entertainment, and by that Means at least divert the Minds of my female Readers from greater Trifles. At the same Time, as I would fain give some finishing Touches to those which are already the most beautiful Pieces in humane Nature, I shall endeavour to point out all those Imperfections that are the Blemishes, as well as those Virtues which are the Embellishments, of the Sex. In the mean while I hope these my gentle Readers, who have so much Time on their Hands, will not grudge throwing away a Quarter of an Hour in a Day on this Paper, since they may do it without any Hindrance to Business.

I know several of my Friends and Well-wishers are in great Pain for me, lest I should not be able to keep up the Spirit of a Paper which I oblige myself to furnish every Day. But to make them easy, in this Particular, I will promise them faithfully to give it over as soon as I grow dull. This I know will be Mitter of great Raillery to the small Wits who will frequently put me in mind of my Promise, desire me to keep my Word, assure me that it is high Time to give over, with many other little Pleasantries of the like Nature, which men of a little smart Genius cannot forbear throwing out against their best Friends, when they have such a Hurdle given them of being witty. But let them remember, that I do hereby enter my Caveat against this Piece of Raillery.

Dat veniam corvis, vexat censura columbas
Juv.

ARIETTA is visited by all Persons of both Sexes, who may have any Pretence to Wit and Gallantry. She is in that time of Life which is neither affected with the Follies of Youth or Infirmities of Age and her Conversation is so mixed with Gravity and Prudence, that she is agreeable both to the Young and the Old. Her Behaviour is very frank, without being in the least blameable and as she is out of the Tract of any amorous or ambitious Pursuits of her own, her Visitants entertain her with Accounts of themselves very freely, whether they concern their Passions or their Interests. I made her a Visit this Afternoon, having been formerly introduced to the Honour of her Acquaintance, by my friend Will Honeycomb, who has prevailed upon her to admit me sometimes into her Assembly, as a civil, inoffensive Man. I found her accompanied with one Person only, a Common-Place Talker, who, upon my Entrance, rose, and after a very slight Civility sat down again then turning to Arietta, pursued his Discourse, which I found was upon the old Topick, of Constancy in Love. He went on with great Facility in repeating what he talks every Day of his Life and, with the Ornaments of insignificant Laughs and Gestures, enforced his Arguments by Quotations out of Plays and Songs, which allude to the Perjuries of the Fair, and the general Levity of Women. Methought he strove to shine more than ordinarily in his talkative Way, that he might insult my Silence, and distinguish himself before a Woman of Arietta's Taste and Understanding. She had often an Inclination to interrupt him, but could find no Opportunity, 'till the Larum ceased of its self, which it did not 'till he had repeated and murdered the celebrated Story of the Ephesian Matron.*

Arietta seemed to regard this Piece of Raillery as an Outrage done to her Sex as indeed I have always observed that Women, whether out of a nicer Regard to their Honour, or what other Reason I cannot tell, are more sensibly touched with those general Aspersions, which are cast upon their Sex, than Men are by what is said of theirs.

When she had a little recovered her self from the serious Anger she was in, she replied in the following manner.

Sir, when I consider, how perfectly new all you have said on this Subject is, and that the Story you have given us is not quite two thousand Years Old, I cannot but think it a Piece of Presumption to dispute with you. But your Quotations put me in Mind of the Fable of the Lion and the Man. The Man talking with that noble Animal, showed him, in the Ostentation of Humane Superiority, a Sign of a Man killing a Lion. Upon which the Lion said very justly, We Lions are none of us Painters, else we could show a hundred Men killed by Lions, for one Lion killed by a Man. You Men are Writers, and can represent us Women as Unbecoming as you please in your Works, while we are unable to return the Injury. You have twice or thrice observed in your Discourse, that Hypocrisy is the very Foundation of our Education, and that an Ability to dissemble our affections, is a professed Part of our Breeding. These, and such other Reflections, are sprinkled up and down the Writings of all Ages, by Authors, who leave behind them Memorials of their Resentment against the Scorn of particular Women, in Invectives against the whole Sex. Such a Writer, I doubt not, was the celebrated Petronius, who invented the pleasant Aggravations of the Frailty of the Ephesian Lady, but when we consider this Question between the Sexes, which has been either a Point of Dispute or Raillery ever since there were Men and Women, let us take Facts from plain People and from such as have not either Ambition or Capacity to embellish their Narrations with any Beauties of Imagination. I was the other Day amusing myself with Ligon's Account of Barbadoes and, in Answer to your well wrought Tale, I will give you (as it dwells upon my Memory) out him to commiserate her Condition, told him that she was with Child by him. But he only made use of that Information, to rise in his Demands upon the Purchaser.

I was so touch'd with this Story, (which I think should be always a Counterpart to the Ephesian Maeron) that I left the Room with Tears in my Eyes, which a Woman of Arctia's good Sense, did, I am sure, take for greater Applause, than any Compliments I could make her. R

—Veteres acrius tili de pulmone revello—Per

As I am coming to London, it was some time before I could settle myself in a House to my liking. I was forced to quit my first Lodgings, by reason of an officious Land-lady, that would be asking every Morning how I had slept. I then fell into an honest Family, and lived very happily for above a Week, when my Land-lord, who was a jolly good natur'd Man, took it into his head that I wanted Company, and therefore would frequently come into my Chamber to keep me from being alone. This I bore for two or three Days, but telling me one Day that he was afraid I was melancholy, I thought it was high time for me to be gone, and accordingly took new Lodgings that very Night. About a Week after, I found my jolly Land-lord, who, as I said before, was an honest hearty Man, had put me into an Advertisement of the Daily Courant, in the following Words: Whereas a melancholy Man left his Lodgings on Thursday last in the Afternoon, and is afterwards to be going towards Islington. If any one can give Notice of him to R. B. Fishmonger in the Strand, he shall be very well rewarded for his Pains. As I am the best Man in the World to keep my own Counsel, and my Land-lord the Fishmonger not knowing my Name, this Accident of my Life was never discovered to this very Day.

I am now settled with a Widow woman, who has a great many Children and complies with my Humour in everything. I do not remember that we have exchanged a Word together these five Years, my Coffee comes into my Chamber every Morning without asking for it. If I want Fire I point to my Chimney, if Water, to my Pason. Upon which my Land-lady nods, as much as to say she takes my Meaning and immediately obeys my Signals. She has like wise model'd her Family so well that when her little Boy offers to pull me by the Coat or prattle in my Face, his eldest Sister immediately calls him off and bids him not disturb the Gentleman. At my first entering into the Family, I was troubled with the Civility of coming up to me every time I came into the Room. But my Land-lady observing, that upon these Occasions I always cried Pish and went out again, his forbidden any such Ceremonies to be used in the House, so that at present I walk into the Kitchen or Parlour without being take notice of, or giving any Interruption to the Business or Discourse of the Family. The Maid will ask her Mistress (tho' I am by) whether the Gentleman is ready to go to Dinner, as the Mistress (who is indeed an excellent Housewife) scolds at the Servants as heartily before my Face as behind my Back. In short, I move up and down the House and enter into all Companies, with the same Liberty as a Cat or any other domestick Animal, and am as little suspected of telling any thing that I hear or see.

I remember last Winter there were several young Girls of the Neighbourhood sitting about the Fire with my Land-lady's Daughters, and telling Stories of Spirits and Apparitions. Upon my opening the Door the young Women broke off their Discourse, but my Land-lady's Daughters telling them that it was no Body, but the Gentleman (for that is the Name which I go by in the Neighbourhood as well as in the Family), they went on without minding me. I seated myself by the Candle that stood on a Table at one End of the Room and pretending to read a Book that I took out of my Pocket, heard several dreadful Stories of Ghosts as pale as Ashes that had stood at the Feet of a Bed, or walked over a Church-yard by Moon light. And of others that had been conjured into the Red-Sea, for disturbing People's Rest, and drawing their Curtains at Midnight, with many other old Women's Fables of the like Nature. As one Spirit rused another, I observed that at the End of every Story the whole Company closed their Rails and crowded about the Fire. I took Notice in particular of a little Boy, who was so attentive to every Story, that I am mistaken if he ventures to go to bed by himself this Month. Indeed they talked so long, that the Imaginations of the whole Assembly were manifestly crazed, and I am sure will be the worse for it as long as they live. I heard one of the Girls, that had looked upon me over her Shoulder, asking the Company how long I had been in the Room, and whether I did not look paler than I used to do. This put me under some Apprehensions that I should be forced to explain myself if I did not retire. For such Reason I took the Candle in my Hand, and went up into my Chamber, not without wondering at this unaccountable Weakness in reasonable Creatures, [that they should] love to astonish and terrify one another. Were I a Father, I should take a particular Care to preserve my Children from these little Horrors of Imagination, which they are apt to contract when they are young, and are not able to shake off when they are in Years. I have known a Soldier that has enter'd a Breach, affrighted at his own Shadow and look pale upon a little scratching at his Door, who the Day before had march'd up against a Battery of Cannon. There are Instances of Persons, who have been terrified, even to Distraction at the Figure of a Tree or the shrilling of a Bull rush. The Truth of it is, I look upon a sound Imagination as the greatest Blessing of Life, next to a clear Judgment and a good Conscience. In the mean Time, since there are very few whose Minds are not more or less subject to these dreadful Thoughts and Appre-ensions, we ought to arm our selves against them by the Dictates of Reason and Religion, to pull the old War out of our Hearts (as Persius expresses it in the Motto of my Paper), and extinguish those importunate Notions which we imbibed at a Time that we were not able to judge of their Absurdity. Or if we believe, as many wise and good Men have done, that there are such Phantoms and Apparitions as those I have been speaking of, let us endeavour to establish to our selves in Lutes, in Iron who holds the Reins of the whole Creation in his Hand, and moderates them after such a Manner, that it is impossible for one Being to bring loose upon another without his Knowledge and Permission.

For my own Part, I am apt to join in Opinion with those who believe that all the Regions of Nature swarm with Spirits and that we have Multitudes of Spectators on all our Actions, when we think our selves most alone. But instead of terrifying my self with such a Notion, I am wonderfully pleased to think that I am always engaged with such an innumerable Society in searching out the Wonders of the Creation, and joining in the same Convoy of Praise and Adoration.

Milton<sup>1</sup> has finely described this mixed Communion of Men and Spirits in Paradise and I need doubtless his Eye upon a Verse in old Hesiod,<sup>2</sup> which is almost Word for Word the same with his third Line in the following Passage

—Nor think, though Men were not,
That Heaven would want Spectators, God want praise
Millions of spiritual Creatures walk the Earth
Unseen, both when we wake and when we sleep
All these with ceaseless Praise his Works to hold Both Day and Night How often from the Steps
Of Song Hail or Thicket, have we heard
Celestial Voices to the winds t A r,
Sole, or responsive each to others Note,
Singing their great Creator Oft in bands, While they keep Watch, or nightly howling walk,
With heavenly Touch of instrumental Sounds,
In full harmonick Number join'd, their Songs Drive the Night, and lift our Thoughts to Heaven C

Dic mihi si fueris tu loquax eris?—MART

THERE is nothing that of late Years has afforded Matter of greater Amusement to the Town than Signior Nicolini's Combat with a Lion in the Hay Market,<sup>1</sup> which has been very often exhibited to the general Satisfaction of most of the Nobility and Gentry in the Kingdom of Great Britain. Upon the first Rumour of this intended Combat, it was confidently affirmed, and is still believed by many in both Galleries, that there would be a brave Lion sent from the Tower every Opera Night, in order to be killed by Hydaspe in his Report, tho' altogether groundless, so universally prevailed in the upper Regions of the Play-House, that some of the most refined Politicians in those Parts of the Audience, gave it out in Whisper, that the Lion was a Cousin-German of the Tyger who made his Appearance in King William's days, and that the Stage would be supplied with Lions at the public Expence, during the whole Session. Many likewise were the Conjectures of the Treatment which this Lion was to meet with from the hands of Signior Nicolini: some supposed that he was to Subdue him in Acetativo, as Orpheus used to serve the wild Beasts in his time, and afterwards to knock him on the head: some fancied that the Lion would not pretend to lay his Paws upon the Hero, by Reason of the received Opinion, that a Lion will not hurt a Virgin. Several, who pretended to have seen the Opera in Italy, had informed their Friends, that the Lion was to act a part in High Dutch, and roar twice or thrice to a thorough Brise, before he fell at the Feet of Hydaspe. To clear up a Matter that was so variously reported,

<sup>1</sup> The famous Neapolitan actor and singer, Cavalier Nicolino Grimaldi, commonly called Nicolini, had made his first appearance in an opera called 'Pyrrhus and Demetrius,' which was the last at which to combine English with Italian. His voice was a soprano, but afterwards descended into a fine contralto, and he seems to have been the finest actor of his day. Prices of seats at the opera were raised on his coming from 7s 6d to 10s for pit and boxes, and from 2s 6d to 12s for boxes on the stage. When this paper was written he had appeared also in a new opera on 'Almahide,' and proceeded to those encounters with the lion in the opera of Hydaspe, by a Roman composer, Francesco Mancini, first produced May 23, 1710, which the Spectator has made memorable. It had been performed 21 times in 1710, and was now reproduced and repeated four times. Nicolini, as Hydaspe in this opera, thrown naked into an amphitheatre to be devoured by a lion, is so inspired with courage by the presence of his mistress among the spectators that (says Mr Sutherland Edwards in his 'History of the Opera') 'after appealing to the monster in a minor key, and telling him that he may tear his bosom, but cannot touch his heart, he attacks him in the relative major, and strangles him.'

I have made it my Business to examine whether this pretended Lion is really the Savage he is represented to be, or only a Counterfeit

But before I communicate my Discoveries, I must acquaint the Reader, that upon my walking behind the Scenes last Winter, as I was thinking on something else, I accidentally jostled against a monstrous Animal that extremely startled me, and, upon my nearer Survey of it, appeared to be a Lion-Rampant. The Lion, seeing me very much surprized, told me, in a gentle Voice, that I might come by him if I pleased. For (says he) I do not intend to hurt anybody. I thanked him very kindly, and passed by him. And in a little time after saw him leap upon the Stage, and act his Part with very great Applause. It has been observed by several, that the Lion has changed his manner of Acting twice or thrice since his first Appearance, which will not seem strange, when I acquaint my Reader that the Lion has been changed upon the Audience three several times. The first Lion was a Candle-snuffer, who being a Fellow of a testy, choleric Temper over-did his Part, and would not suffer himself to be killed so easily as he ought to have done. Besides, it was observ'd of him, that he grew more surly every time he came out of the Lion, and having dropt some Words in ordinary Conversation, as if he had not fought his best, and that he suffered himself to be thrown upon his Back in the Scuffle, and that he would wrestle with Mr. Nicolini for what he pleased, out of his Lion's Skin, it was thought proper to discard him. And it is verily believed to this Day, that had he been brought upon the Stage another time, he would certainly have done Mischief. Besides, it was objected against the first Lion, that he reared himself so high upon his hinder Paws, and walked in so erect a Posture, that he looked more like an old Man than a Lion.

The second Lion was a Taylor by Trade, who belonged to the Play-House, and had the Character of a mild and peaceable Man in his Profession. If the former was too furious, this was too sheepish, for his Part. Inasmuch that after a short modest Walk upon the Stage, he would fall at the first Touch of Hydaspes, without grizzling with him, and giving him an Opportunity of showing his Variety of Italian Tripps. It is said, indeed, that he once gave him a Ripp in his flesh-colour Doublet, but this was only to make work for himself, in his private Character of a Taylor. I must not omit that it was this second Lion [who] treated me with so much Humanity behind the Scenes.

The Acting Lion at present is, as I am informed, a Country Gentleman, who does it for his Diversion, but desires his Name may be concealed. He says very handsomely in his own Excuse, that he does not Act for Gain, that he indulges an innocent Pleasure in it, and that it is better to pass away an Evening to this manœver, than in Gaming and Drizzling. But at the same time says, with a very agreeable Raillery upon himself, that if his name should be known, the ill-natured World might call him, The Ass in the Lion's skin.

This Gentleman's Temper is made out of such a happy Mixture of the Mild and the Choleric, that he out-does both his predecessors, and has drawn together greater Audiences than have been known in the Memory of Man.

I must not conclude my Narrative, without taking Notice of a groundless Report that has been rused, to a Gentleman's Disadvantage, of whom I must declare my self an Admirer, namely, that Signior Nicolini and the Lion have been seen sitting peaceably by one another, and smoking a Pipe together, behind the Scenes by which their common Enemies would insinuate, it is but a sham Combat which they represent upon the Stage. But upon Enquiry I find, that if any such Correspondence has passed between them, it was not till the Combat was over, when the Lion was to be looked upon as dead, according to the received Rules of the Drama. Besides, this is what is pretised every day in Westminster-Hall, where nothing is more usual than to see a Couple of Lawyers, who have been tearing each other to pieces in the Court, embracing one another as soon as they are out of it.

I would not be thought, in any part of this Relation, to reflect upon Signior Nicolini, who, in Acting this Part only complies with the wretched Taste of his Audience, he knows very well, that the Lion has many more Admirers than himself, as they say of the famous Equestrian Statue on the Pont-Neuf at Paris, that more People go to see the Horse, than the King who sits upon it. On the contrary, it gives me a just Indignation, to see a Person whose Action gives new Majesty to Kings, Resolution to Heroes, and Softness to Lovers, thus sinking from the Greatness of his Behaviour, and degraded into the Character of the London Prentice. I have often wished that our Irregadians would copy after this great Master in Action. Could they make the same use of their Arms and Legs, and inform their Faces with as significant Looks and Passions, how glorious would an English Tragedy appear with that Action which is capable of giving a Dignity to the forced Thoughts, cold Concepts, and unnatural Expressions of an Italian Opera. In the mean time, I have related this Combat of the Lion, to show what are at present the reigning Entertainments of the Politer Part of Great Britain.

Audiences have often been reproached by Writers for the Coarseness of their Taste, but our present Grievance does not seem to be the Want of a good Taste, but of Common Sense. C

— Tegne his, Infelix, exue non oustris —Ond

I WAS reflecting this Morning upon the Spirit and Humour of the publick Diversions five and twenty Years ago, and those of the present Time and lamented to my self, that though in those Days they neglected their Morality, they kept up their Good Sense, but that the beau

Now, at present, is only grown more childish, not more innocent than the former. While I was in this Town of I thought, in odd Fellow, whose Piece I have often seen at the Play house, gave me the following Letter with these words: Sir, The Lyon pretends to humble Service to you, and desires to go to this or to go to your House

From 13 Dec. 1741, the Ha.-market, March 15
SIR,

'I have read all your Papers, and have studied my Re-entment against your Restrictions upon Operas, till that of this Day, wherein you plainly insinuate, that Signior Grimaldi and my self have a Correspondence more friendly than is consistent with the Valour of his Character, or the Piece of mine. I desire you would, for your own Sake, forbear such Intimations for the future: and must say it is a great Piece of Ill-nature in you, to shew so great an Esteem for a Foreigner, and to discourage a Lyon that is your own Country man.

'I take notice of your Fable of the Lyon and Mary but am so equally concerned in that Matter, that I shall not be offended to which soever of the Animals the Superiority is given. You have misrepresented me, in saying that I am a Country-Gentleman, who act only for my Diversion; whereas, had I still the same Woods to range in which I once had when I was a Lover-hunter, I should not resign my Manhood for a Maintenance, and assure you, as low as my Circumstances are at present, I am so much a Man of Honour, that I would scorn to be any least for Bread but a Lyon.

Yours, &c

I had no sooner ended this, than one of my Land-lady's Children brought me in several others, of some of which I shall make up my present Paper, they all having a Tendency to the same Subject, viz. the Allegiance of our present Diversions.

Covent Garden, March 13

SIR,

'I Have been for twenty Years Under Sexton of this Parish of St Paul's, Covent-Garden, and have not missed tolling in to Prayers six times in all those Years which Office I have performed to my great Satisfaction, till this Fortnight last past, during which Time I find my Congregation take the Warning of my Bell, Morning and Evening, to go to a Puppet show set forth by one Porcell, under the Piazza. By this Means, I have not only lost my two Customers, whom I used to place for six Pence a Piece over against Mrs Rachel Eyebright, but Mrs Rachel herself is gone thither also. There now appears among us none but a few ordinary People, who come to Church only to say their Prayers, so that I have no Work worth speaking of but on Sundays. I have placed my Son at the Piazza, to requant the Ladies but the Bell rings for Church, and that it stands on the other side of the Garden, but they only laugh at the Child.

'I desire you would by this before all the World, that I may not be made such a Fool for the future, and that Punchinello may chuse Hours less canonical. As things are now, Mr

Porcell has a full Congregation, while we have a very thin House which if you can Remedy, you will very much oblige,

Sir,
Yours, &c

The following Epistle I find is from the Undertaker of the Masquerade.

SIR,

'I Have observed the Rules of my Masque so carefully (in not enquiring into Persons), that I cannot tell whether you were one of the Company or not last Tuesday, but if you were not and still design to come, I desire you would, for your own Entertainment, please to admonish the Town, that all Persons indifferently are not fit for this Sort of Diversion. I could wish, Sir, you could make them understand, that it is a kind of acting to go in Masquerade, and a Man should be able to say or do things proper for the Press in which he appears. We have now and then Rakes in the Habit of Roman Senators, and some Politicians in the Dress of Rakes. The Misfortune of the thing is, that People dress themselves in what they have a Mind to be, and not what they are fit for. There is not a Girl in the Town, but let her have her Will in going to a Masque, and she shall dress as a Shepherdess. But let me beg of them to read the Arctia, or some other good Romance, before they appear in any such Character at my House. The last Day we presented, every body was so rashly inhibited, that when they came to speak to each other, a Nymph with a Crook had not a Word to say but in the pert Style of the Pit Bawdry, and a Man in the Habit of a Philosopher was speechless, till an occasion offered of expressing himself

'Masquerades took rank as a leading pleasure of the town under the management of John James Heidegger, son of a Zurich clergyman, who came to England in 1708, at the age of 50, as a Swiss negotiator. He entered as a private in the Guards, and attached himself to the service of the fashionable world, which called him 'the Swiss Count,' and readily accepted him as leader. In 1709 he made five hundred guineas by furnishing the spectacle for Mottet's opera of Tomyris, Queen of Scythia. When these papers were written he was thriving upon the Masquerades, which he brought into fashion and made so much a rage of the town that moralists and satirists protested, and the clergy preached against them. A sermon preached against them by the Bishop of London, January 6th, 1724, led to an order that no more should take place than the six subscribed for at the beginning of the month. Nevertheless they held their ground afterwards by connivance of the government. In 1728, Heidegger was called in to nurse the Opera, which throve by his bold puffing. He died, in 1749, at the age of 90, claiming chief honour to the Swiss for ingenuity. 'I was born,' he said, 'a Swiss, and came to England without a farthing, where I have found means to gain £5000 a year, and to spend it. Now I defy the ablest Englishman to go to Switzerland and either gain that income or spend it there.'

'in the Refuse of the Tying Rooms We have a Judge that danced a Minuet, with a Quaker for his Partner, while half a dozen Harlequins stood by as Spectators. A Turk drank me off two Bottles of Wine, and a Jew cut me up half a Ham of Bacon. If I can bring my Desires to bear, and make the Maskers preserve their Characters in my Assemblies, I hope you will allow there is a Foundation laid for more elegant and improving Gallantries than any the Town at present affords, and consequently that you will give your Approbation to the Endeavours of,

Your most obedient humble servant

I am very glad the following Epistle obliges me to mention Mr Powell a second time in the same Paper for indeed there cannot be too great an encouragement given to his Skill in Motions, provided he is under proper Restrictions

SIR,

'The Opera at the Hay Market, and that under the little Piazza in Covent-Garden, being at present the Two leading Divisions of the Town, and Mr Powell professing in his Advertisements to set up Whittington and his Cat against Rinaldo and Arnuda, my Curiosity led me the Beginning of last Week to view both these Performances, and make my Observations upon them

First therefore, I cannot but observe that Mr Powell wisely forbearing to give his Company a Bill of Fare before hand, every Scene is new and unexpected, whereas it is certain, that the Undertakers of the Hay Market, having raised too great an Expectation in their printed Opera, very much disappointed their Audience on the Stage

The King of Jerusalem is obliged to come from the City on foot, instead of being drawn in a triumphant Chariot by white Horses, as my Opera-Book had promised me and thus, while I expected Arnuda's Dragons should rush forward towards Argantes, I found the Hero was obliged to go to Arnuda, and hand her out of her Coach. We had also but a very short Allowance of Thunder and Lightning, tho' I cannot in this Place omit doing Justice to the Boy who had the Direction of the Two painted Dragons, and made them spit Fire and Smoke. He flash'd out his Rosin in such just Proportions, and in such due Time, that I could not forbear conceiving Hopes of his being one Day a most excellent Player. I saw, indeed, but Two things wanting to renounce his whole Action completely, I mean the keeping his Head a little lower, and hiding his Candle

I observe that Mr Powell and the Undertakers had both the same Thought, and I think, much about the same time, of introducing Animals on their several Stages, though indeed with very different Success. The Sparrows and Chaffinches at the Hay Market fly as yet very irregularly over the Stage and instead of perching on the Trees and performing their Parts, these young Actors either get into the Galleries or put out the Candles whereas Mr Powell has so well disciplined his Pig, that in 'the first Scene he and Punch dance a Minuet together. I am informed however, that Mr Powell resolves to excite his Adversaries in their own Way and introduce Larks in his next Opera of Susanna, or Innocence betrayed, which will be exhibited next Week with a Pair of new Ladders

'The Moral of Mr Powell's Drama is violated. I confess by Punch's national Reflections on the French, and King Harry's laying his Leg upon his Queen's Hip in too ludicrous a manner before so great an Assembly

'As to the Mechanism and Scenery, every thing, indeed, was uniform, and of a Piece, and the Scenes were managed very dexterously which calls on me to take Notice, that at the

'The History of Susanna had been an established puppet play for more than two generations. An old copy of verses on Bartholomew Fair in the year 1665, describing the penny and two-penny puppet plays, or, as they had been called in and since Queen Elizabeth's time, 'motions,' says

Their Sights are so rich, is able to bewitch

The heart of a very fine man-a,

Here's 'Patient Grisel' here, and 'Fau Rosa'
mound' ther,

And 'the History of Susanna'

Pepys tells of the crowd waiting, in 1667, to see Lady Castlemaine come out from the puppet play of 'Patient Grisel'

The Powell mentioned in this essay was a deformed cripple whose Puppet Show, called Punch's Theatre, owed its pre-eminence to his own power of satire. Thus he delivered chiefly through Punch, the clown of the puppets, who appeared in all plays with so little respect to dramatic rule that Steele in the Tatler (for Mar 17, 1709) represents a correspondent at Bath, telling how, of two ladies, Prudentia and Florimel, who would lead the fashion, Prudentia caused 'I've in the Puppet Show of 'the Creation of the World' to be 'made the most like Florimel that ever was seen,' and 'when we came to North's Flood in the show, Punch and his wife were introduced dancing in the ark.' Of the fanatics called French Prophets, who used to assemble in Moorfields in Queen Anne's reign, Lord Chesterfield remembered that 'the then Ministry, who loved a little persecution well enough, was, however, so wise as not to disturb their madness, and only ordered one Powell, the master of a famous Puppet-Show, to make Punch turn Prophet which he did so well, that it soon put an end to the prophets and their prophecies. The obscure Dr Saunders fortune was made by a parliamentary prosecution' (from Feb 27 to March 23, 1709-10) 'much about the same time the French Prophets were totally extinguished by a Puppet-Show' (Misc. Works ed Maty, Vol II, p 523, 555)

This was the Powell who played in Covent Garden during the time of week day evening service, and who, taking up Addison's joke against the opera from No 5 of the Spectator, produced Whittington and his Cat as a rival to Rinaldo and Arnuda [See also a note to No 31]

very much cherishes this Natural Weakness of being taken with Outside and Appearance. Talk of a new married Couple, and you immediately hear whether they keep their Coach and six, or eat in Plate. Mention the Name of an absent Lady and it is ten to one but you learn something of her Gown and Petticoat. A Ball is a great Help to Discourse, and a Birth Day furnishes Conversation for a Twelve-month after. A Fur-below of precious Stones, an Hat buttoned with a Diamond, a Brocade Waistcoat or Petticoat, are standing Topics. In short, they consider only the Drapery of the Species, and never cast away a Thought on those Ornaments of the Mind, that make Persons Illustrious in themselves, and Useful to others. When Women are thus perpetually dazling one anothers Imaginations, and filling their Heads with nothing but Colours, it is no Wonder that they are more attentive to the superficial Parts of Life, than the solid and substantial Blessings of it. A Girl, who has been trained up in this kind of Conversation, is in danger of every Embroidered Coat that comes in her Way. A Pair of fringed Gloves may be her Ruin. In a word, Lace and Ribbons, Silver and Gold Garters, with the like glittering Gew-Gaws, are so many Lures to Women of weak Minds or low Educations, and, when artificially displayed, are able to fetch down the most airy Coquet from the wildest of her Flights and Rambles.

True Happiness is of a retired Nature, and an Enemy to Pomp and Noise, it arises, in the first place, from the Enjoyment of ones self and, in the next, from the Friendship and Conversation of a few select Companions. It loves Shade and Solitude, and naturally haunts Groves and Fountains, Fields and Meadows. In short, it feels every thing it wants within itself, and receives no Addition from Multitudes of Witnesses and Spectators. On the contrary, false Happiness loves to be in a Crowd, and to draw the Eyes of the World upon her. She does not receive any Satisfaction from the Applauses which she gives her self, but from the Admiration which she raises in others. She flourishes in Courts and Palaces, Theatres and Assemblies, and has no Existence but when she is looked upon.

Aurelia, tho' a Woman of Great Quality delights in the Privacy of a Country Life, and passes away a great part of her Time in her own Walks and Gardens. Her Husband, who is her Bosom Friend and Companion in her Solitudes, has been in Love with her ever since he knew her. They both abound with good Sense, consummate Virtue, and a mutual Esteem and are a perpetual Entertainment to one another. Their Family is under so regular an Oeconomy, in its Hours of Devotion and Repast, Employment and Diversion, that it looks like a little Common Wealth within it self. They often go into Company, that they may return with the greater Delight to one another and sometimes live in Town not to enjoy it so properly as to grow weary of it, that they may renew in themselves the Relish of a Country Life. By this means they are Happy in each other, beloved by their Children, adored by their Servants, and are become the Envy, or rather the Delight, of all that know them.

How different to this is the Life of Fulvia! she considers her Husband as her Steward, and looks upon Discretion and good House Wifery, as little domestick Virtues, unbecoming a Woman of Quality. She thinks Life lost in her own Family, and fancies herself out of the World, when she is not in the Ring, the Play-House, or the Drawing-Room. She lives in a perpetual Motion of Body and Restlessness of Thought, and is never ease in any one Place, when she thinks there is more Company in another. The missing of an Opera the first Night, would be more afflictive to her than the Death of a Child. She pities all the valuable Part of her own Sex, and calls every Woman of a prudent modest retired Life, a poor spirited, unpolished Creature. What a Mortification would it be to Fulvia, if she knew that her setting her self to View, is but exposing her self, and that she grows Contemptible by being Conspicuous.

I cannot conclude my Paper, without observing that Virgil has very finely touched upon this Female Passion for Dress and Show, in the Character of Camilla, who, tho' she seems to have shaken off all the other Weaknesses of her Sex, is still described as a Woman in this Particular. The Poet tells us, that, after having made a great Slughter of the Enemy, she unfortunately cast her Eye on a Trojan [who] wore an embroidered Tunic, a beautiful Coat of Mail, with a Mantle of the finest Purple. A Golden Belt, says he, hung upon his Shoulder, his Garment was buckled with a Golden Clasp, and his Head was covered with an Helmet of the same shining Mettle. The Achæan immediately singled out this well dressed Warrior, being seized with a Woman's Longing for the pretty Trappings that he was adorned with.

—*Tolunque incauta per agmen
Famine prædæ et spoliolum ardebat an ore*

This heedless Pursuit after these glittering Trifles, the Poet (by a nice concealed Moral) represents to have been the Destruction of his Female Hero.

I HAVE receiv'd a Letter, desiring me to be very satyrical upon the little Muff that is now in Fashion. Another informs me of a Pair of silver Garters buckled below the Knee, that have been lately seen at the Rainbow Coffee-house in Fleet street, a third sends me an heavy Complaint

<sup>2</sup> The Rainbow, near the Inner Temple Gate, in Fleet Street, was the second Coffee house opened in London. It was opened about 1656, by a barber named James Farr, part of the house still being occupied by the bookseller's shop which had been there for at least twenty years before Farr also, at first, combined his coffee against fringed Gloves So be brief, there is scarce an Ornament of either Sex which one or other of my Correspondents has not inveighed against with some Bitterness, and recommended to my Observation I must therefore, once for all inform my Readers, that it is not my Intention to sink the Dignity of this my Paper with Reflections upon Red heels or Top knots, but rather to enter into the Passions of Mankind, and to correct those depraved Sentiments that give Birth to all those little Extravagancies which appear in their outward Dress and Behaviour Foppish and fantastick Ornaments are only Indications of Vice, not criminal in themselves Extinguish Vanity in the Mind, and you naturally retrench the little Superfluities of Garniture and Equipage. The Blossoms will fall of themselves, when the Root that nourishes them is destroyed

I shall therefore, as I have said, apply my Remedies to the first Seeds and Principles of an affected Dress, without descending to the Dress it self though at the same time I must own, that I have Thoughts of creating an Officer under me to be entitled, The Censor of small Wares, and of allotting him one Day in a Week for the Execution of such his Office An Operator of this Nature might act under me with the same Regard as a Surgeon to a Physician, the one might be employ'd in healing those Blotches and Tumours which break out in the Body, while the other is sweetning the Blood and rectifying the Constitution To speak truly, the young People of both Sexes are so wonderfully apt to shoot out into long Swords, or sweeping Truns, bushy Head-dresses or full bottom'd Periwigs, with several other Ineumbrances of Dress, that they stand in need of being pruned very frequently [lest they should<sup>1</sup>] be oppressed with Ornaments, and over-run with the Luxuriency of their Habits I am much in doubt, whether I should give the Preference to a Quaker that is trimmed close and almost out to the Quiek, or to a Beau that is laden with such a Redundance of Excrecences I must therefore desire my Correspondents to let me know how they approve my Project, and whether they think the erecting of such a petty Censorship may not turn to the Emolument of the Publick for I would not do any thing of this Nature rashly and without Advice

There is another Set of Correspondents to whom I must address my self, in the second Place I mean such as fill their Letters with private Scandal, and black Accounts of particular Persons and Families The world is so full of Ill-nature, that I have Lampoons sent me by People [who<sup>2</sup>] cannot spell, and Satyrs compos'd by those who scarce know how to write By the last Post in particular I receiv'd a Packet of Scandal that is not legible and have a whole

In the next Place I must apply my self to my Party Correspondents, who are continually teasing me to take Notice of one anothers Proceedings How often am I asked by both Sides, if it is possible for me to be an unconcerned Spectator of the Rogueries that are committed by the Party which is opposite to him that writes the Letter About two Days since I was reproached with an old Greeian Law, that forbids any Man to stand as a Neuter or a Looker on in the Divisions of his Country However, as I am very sensible [my<sup>2</sup>] Paper would lose its whole Effect, should it run into the Outrages of a Party, I shall take Care to keep clear of every thing [which<sup>3</sup>] looks that Way If I can any way assuage private Inflammations, or allay publick Ferments, I shill apply my self to it with my utmost Endeavours, but will never let my Heart reproch me with having done

What I have said under the three foregoing Heads, will, I am afraid, very much retrench the Number of my Correspondents. I shall therefore acquaint my Reader, that if he has started any Hint which he is not able to pursue, if he has met with any surprising Story which he does not know how to tell, if he has discovered any epidemical Vice which has escaped my Observation, or has heard of any uncommon Virtue which he would desire to publish in short, if he has any Materials that can furnish out an innocent Diversion, I shall promise him my best Assistance in the working of them up for a publick Entertainment.

This Paper my Reader will find was intended for an answer to a Multitude of Correspondents, but I hope he will pardon me if I single out one of them in particular, who has made me so very humble a Request, that I cannot forbear complying with it.

SINCE our Persons are not of our own Making, when they are such as appear Defective or Uncomely, it is, methinks, in honest and laudible Fortune to dare to be Ugly, at least to keep our selves from being bashful with a Consciousness of Imperfections, which we cannot help, and in which there is no Guilt. I would not defend an haggard Beau, for passing away much time at a Glass, and giving Softnesses and Languishing Graces to Deformity. All I intend is, that we ought to be contented with our Countenance and Shape, so far, as never to give our selves an uneasy Reflection on that Subject. It is to the ordinary People, who are not accustomed to make very proper Remarks on any Occasion, matter of great Jest, if a Man enters with a prominent Pair of Shoulders into an Assembly, or is diminished by an Expansion of Mouth or Oblanguish of Aspect. It is happy for a Man, that his any of these Oddnesses about him, if he can be as merry upon himself, as others are apt to be upon that Occasion. When he can possess himself with such a Cheerfulness, Women and Children who were at first frighted at him, will afterwards be as much pleased with him. As it is hard on others to rally him for natural Defects, it is extremely agreeable when he can jest upon him self for them.

Madam Mautenon's first Husband was an Hero in this kind, and has shown many Pleasures from the largeness of his Shape, which he describes in a very much reverend Letter. He diverts himself likewise by representing to his Reader the Make of an Image and Polly, with which he used to take off his Hat. When these happens to be any thing ridiculous in a Vice, and the Owner of it think it in Aspect of Disgrace, he must be of very great Quality to be exempt from Laughter. The best I spend it therefore to be pleasant up in himself. Prince Harry and Talstaff, in Shakespear, have carried the Rich rule upon Fat and Lean as far as it will go. Talstaff is Hamour with called Barley, Beef, Mutton, and Hill of Flea. Harry a Starving, an Elbow, a Slouch, a burlesque, and a Tick. There is, in several incidents of the Conversation between them, the Jest still kept up upon the Person. Great Tenderness and Gentility in this Point is one of the greatest Weaknesses of Self-love, for my own part, I am a little unhappy in the Mold of my Face, which is not quite so long as it is broad. Whether this might not partly arise from my manner, my Mouth much seldom than other People, and by Consequence not so much lengthning the Fibres of my Face, I am not at leisure to determine. However it be, I have been often put out of Countenance by the Shortness of my Face, and was formerly at great Pains in concealing it by wearing a Periwig, with an high Foretop, and letting my Beard grow. But now I hate this roughly got over this Delicacy, and could be contented it were much shorter, provided it might qualify me for a Member of the Merry Club, which the following Letter gives me an Account of. I have received it from Oxford, and as it abounds with the Spirit of Mirth and good Humour which is natural to that Place, I shall set it down Word for Word as it came to me.

Most Prof. Sir,

Having been very well entertained, in the first of your Speculations that I have yet seen, by your Specimen upon Clubs, which I therefore hope you will continue, I shall take the Liberty to furnish you with a brief Account of such a one as perhaps you have not seen in all your Travels, unless it was your Fortune to touch upon some of the woody Parts of the African Continent, in your Voyage to or from Grand Cairo. There have arose in this University (long since you left it without seeing any thing) several of these inferior Hebdomadal Societies, as the Pinning Club, the Witty Club, and amongst the rest, the Hansem Club is a Barleque upon which, a certain merry Species, if it seem to have come into the World in Masquerade, for some Years last past have associated themselves to, either, and assumed the name of the Ugly Club. This ill favoured Fraternity consists of a President and twelve Fellows, the Choice of which is not confined by Punct to any particular Foundation (as St. John's Men would have the World believe, and have therefore erected a separate Society within themselves) but Liberty is left to elect from any School in Great Britain, provided the Candidates be within the Rules of the Club, as set forth in a Table entitled The Act of Deformity. A Clause or two of which I shall transmit to you.

I That no Person whatsoever shall be admitted without a visible Quantity in his Aspect, or peculiar Cast of Countenance, of which the President and Officers for the time being are to determine, and the President to give the casting Voice.

II That a singular Regard be had, upon Examination, to the Gibbosity of the Gentlemen that offer themselves, as Founders, Kinsmen, or to the Obliquity of their Figure, in what sort soever.

III That if the Quantity of any Man's Nose be eminently miscalculated, whether as to Length or Breadth, he shall have a just Pretence to be elected.

Lastly, That if there shall be two or more Competitors for the same Vicarage, ceteris paribus, he that has the thickest Skin to have the Preference.

Every fresh Member, upon his first Night, is to entertain the Company with a Dish of Cod-fish, and a Speech in praise of Aesop, whose <sup>1</sup> The Life of Aesop, ascribed to Planudes Maximus, a monk of Constantinople in the fourteenth century, and usually prefixed to the Fables, says that he was 'the most deformed of all men' of his age, for he had a pointed head, flat nose,

As they have always been profess'd Admirers of the other Sex, so they unanimously declare that they will give all possible Encouragement to such as will take the Benefit of the Statute, tho' none yet have appeared to do it.

The worthy President, who is their most devoted Champion, has lately shown me two Copies of Verses, compos'd by a Gentleman of his Society the first, a Congratulatory Ode inscrib'd to Mrs. Taichwood, upon the loss of her two foreteeth the other a Panegyrick upon Mrs. Andrew's left Shoulder. Mrs. Vi-sard (he says) since the Small Pox, is grown tolerably ugly, and a top Toast in the Club, but I never hear him so lavish of his fine things, 'trils, a short neck, thick lips, was black, pot-bellied, bow legged, and hump-backed, perhaps even uglier than Homer's Thersites.'

The most

foot he was lame, Forward before his narrow chest his hunched
shoulders ran,
Slanting and sharp his forehead rose, with shreds of meagre hair

Controversies between the Scotists and Thomists, followers of the teaching of Duns Scotus and Thomas Aquinas, caused a Thomist perversion of the name of Duns into its use as Dunce and tradition of the subtle Doctor's extreme personal ugliness. Doctor Subtilis was translated The Lath Doctor.

Scarrot we have just spoken of. Hudibras's outward gifts are described in Part I, Canto 1, lines 200-205 of the poem

His brand

A sudden view it would beguile
The upper part thereof was whey,
The nether, orange, mix'd with gray

The 'old Gentleman in Oldham' is Loyoh, as described in Oldham's third satire on the Jesuits, when

Shew'd together, all the officious band
The orders of their bedrid chiefs attend

Raised on his pillow he greets them, and, says Oldham,

Like Disphic Hag of old, by Friend possest,
He smells, a lid for zypharses a panting breast,
His bristling hairs stick up, his eyeballs glow,
And from his mouth long strokes of driv'el flow

IT is my Design in this Paper to deliver down to Posterity a faithful Account of the Italian Opera, and of the gradual Progress which it has made upon the English Stage For there is no Question but our great Grand-children will be very curious to know the Reason why their Forefathers used to sit together like an Audience of Foreigners in their own Country, and to hear whole Plays acted before them in a Tongue which they did not understand

11ste of Italian Music The great Success this Opera met with, produced some Attempts of forming Pieces upon Italian Plans, (which I should give a more natural and reasonable Entertainment than what can be met with in the elaborate Trilles of that Nation This almost the Poetasters and Jesters of the Loan, who were used to deal in a more ordinary Kind of Ware and therefore laid down in a tall hat Rule, which is recited as such to this Day 'That no Man is capable of being well set to Music, but is it necessary

Thus it was no sooner recited, but it immediately fell to ruin from the Italian Opera and is there was no great Danger of hurting the Sense of these extraordinary Pieces our Authors would often make Words of their own (which) were entirely foreign to the Meaning of the Pages (they) pretended to translate their chief Care being to make the Numbers of the English Verse answer to those of the Italian, that is of them might go to the same Tune Thus the famous Song in Carroll,

I shall not let it be, &c
Harshness Woman, ye, I have your Meaning, which expresses the Rejoicements of an army I never was translated into that English Translation—

First as a I overs the f s, &c
And it was plain and English to see the most refined Persons of the British Nation dying away and hanging to words that were filled with a Spirit of Rage and Indignation It happened so very frequently, where the Sense was slightly translated, the necessary Transposition of Words (which) were drawn out of the Phrase of one Tongue into that of another while the Music appeared very absurd in one Tongue that was very natural in the other I remember an Italian verse that ran thus in our Words,

And I would my Rage into I sty
which the English for him make translated,
And into Pity turned my Rage

By this Means the soft Notes that were adapted to Pity in the Italian fell upon the word Rage in the English and the angry Sounds that were turned to Rage in the Original were made to express Pity in the Translation It oftentimes happened likewise, that the finest Notes in the Air fell upon the most insignificant Words in the Sentence I have known the Word And pursued through the whole Gamut have been entertained with many a melodious See and have heard the most beautiful Greek Quavers and Divisions bestowed upon There, For, and From, to the eternal Honour of our English Part else and sung half in English half in Italian Mrs Tofts singing the part of the Amazonian heroine in English, and Valentini that of the hero in Italian

In money tables I is thousands roll
He, she, it, and, we, ye, they, fright the soul

The next Step to our Refinement, was the introducing of Italian Actors into our Opera, who sung their Parts in their own Language, at the same Time that our Country men perform'd theirs in our native Tongue. The King or Hero of the Play generally spoke in Italian, and his Slaves answered him in English. The Lover frequently made his Court, and graced the Heart of his Princess in a Language which she did not understand. One would have thought it very difficult to have carry'd on Dialogues after this Manner, without an Interpreter between the Persons that convers'd together, but this was the State of the English Stage for about three Years.

At length the Audience grew tir'd of understanding Half the Opera, and therefore to ease themselves Entirely of the Fatigue of Thinking, have so order'd it at Present that the whole Opera is performed in an unknown Tongue. We no longer understand the Language of our own Stage: in so much that I have often been afraid, when I have seen our Italian Performers chattering in the Vehemence of Action, that they have been calling us Names, and abusing us among themselves: but I hope since we do put such an entire Confidence in them, they will not talk against us before our Faces, though they may do it with the same Safety as if it were behind our Backs. In the mean Time I cannot forbear thinking how naturally an Historian, who writes Two or Three hundred Years hence, will make the following Reflection, In the Beginning of the Eighteenth Century, the Italian Tongue was so well understood in England that Operas were acted on the famous Stage at that Language.

One scarce knows how to be serious in the Confrontation of an Absurdity that shews itself at the first Sight. It does not want any great Measure of Sense to see the Ridicule of this monstrous Practice, but what makes it the more astonishing, it is not that I see of the Rabble, but of Persons of the greatest Politeness, which has established it.

If the Italians have a Genius for Musick above the English, the English have a Genius for other Performances of a much higher Nature, and capable of giving the Mind a much nobler Entertainment. Would one think it was possible (at a Time when an Author lived that was able to write the Phædra and Hippolitus*) for a People

* [was]

The Tragedy of Phædra and Hippolitus, acted without success in 1707, was the one play written by Mr Edmund Smith, a merchant's son who had been educated at Westminster School and Christ Church, Oxford, and who had ended a dissolute life at the age of 42 (in 1710), very shortly before this paper was written. Addison's regard for the play is warmed by friendship for the unhappy writer. He had, indeed, written the Prologue to it, and struck therein also his note of war against the follies of Italian Opera.

Had Valerius, musically coy, Skinn'd Phædra's Arms, and scorn'd the proffer'd Joy,

to be so stupidly fond of the Italian Opera, as scarce to give a Third Days Hearing to that admirable Tragedy? Musick is certainly a very agreeable Entertainment, but if it would take the entire Possession of our Ears, if it would make us incapable of hearing Sense, if it would exclude Arts that have a much greater Tendency to the Refinement of humane Nature. I must confess I would allow it no better Quarter than Plato has done, who banishes it out of his Common wealth.

At present, our Notions of Musick are so very uncertain, that we do not know what it is we like, only, in general, we are transported with any thing that is not English: so if it be of a foreign Growth, let it be Italian, French, or High Dutch, it is the same thing. In short, our English Musick is quite rooted out, and nothing yet planted in its stead.

When a Royal Palace is burnt to the Ground, every Man is at Liberty to present his Plan for a new one: and tho' it be but indifferently put together, it may furnish several Hints that may be of Use to a good Architect. I shall take the same Liberty in a following Paper, of giving my Opinion upon the Subject of Musick, which I shall lay down only in a problematical Manner to be considered by those who are Masters in the Art. OBSERVING one Person behold another, who was an utter Stranger to him, with a Cast of his Eye which, methought, express'd an Emotion of Heart very different from what could be rais'd by an Object so agreeable as the Gentleman he look'd at, I began to consider, not without some secret Sorrow, the Condition of an Envious Man. Some have fancied that Envy has a certain Magical Force in it, and that the Eyes of the Envious have by their Fascination blasted the Enjoyments of the Happy. Sir Francis Bacon says, "Some have been so curious as to

*It had I not of noted your Wonder to have seen An Ennuch's frow from an enamour'd Queen
How would it please, should she in English speak,
And could Hippolitus reply in Greek.*

The Epilogue to this play was by Prior. Edmund Smith's relation to Addison is shown by the fact that, in dedicating the printed edition of his Phædra and Hippolitus to Lord Halifax, he speaks of Addison's lines on the Peace of Ryswick as "the best Latin Poem since the Æneid."

We see likewise, the Scripture calleth Envy an Evil Eye. And the Astrologers call the evil influences of the stars, Evil Aspects, so that still there seemeth to be acknowledged, in the act of envy, an ejaculation or irradiation of the eye. Nay some have been so curious as to note that the times when the stroke or percussion of remark the Times and Seasons when the Stroke of an Envious Eye is most effectually pernicious, and have observed that it has been when the Person envied has been in any Circumstance of Glory and Triumph. At such a time the Mind of the Prosperous Man goes, as it were, abroad, among things without him, and is more exposed to the Malignity. But I shall not dwell upon Speculations so abstracted as this, or repeat the many excellent Things which one might collect out of Authors upon this miserable Affection: but keeping in the road of common Life, consider the Envious Man with relation to these three Heads, His Pains, His Reliefs, and His Happiness.

The Envious Man is in Pain upon all Occasions which ought to give him Pleasure. The Relish of his Life is inverted, and the Objects which administer the highest Satisfaction to those who are exempt from this Passion, give the quickest Pangs to Persons who are subject to it. All the Perfections of their Fellow-Creatures are odious to Youth, Beauty, Valour and Wisdom are Provocations of their Displeasure. What a Wretched and Apostate State is this! To be offended with Excellence, and to hate a Man because we Approve him! The Condition of the Envious Man is the most Emphatically miserable: he is not only incapable of rejoicing in another's Merit or Success, but lives in a World wherein all Mankind are in a Plot against his Quiet, by studying their own Happiness and Advantage. Will Proser is an honest Tale-bearer; he makes it his business to join in Conversation with Envious Men. He points to such an handsome Young Fellow, and whispers that he is secret, married to a Great Fortune. When they doubt, he adds Circumstances to prove it, and never fails to aggravate their Distress, by assuring 'em that to his knowledge he has an Uncle will leave him some Thousands. Will has many Arts of this kind to torture this sort of Temper, and delights in it. When he finds them change colour, and say faintly They wish such a Piece of News is true, he has the Malice to speak some good or other of every Man of their Acquaintance.

The Reliefs of the Envious Man are those little Blemishes and Imperfections, that discover themselves in an illustrious Character. It is matter of great Consolation to an Envious Person, when a Man of known Honour does a thing unworthy himself. Or when any Action which was well executed, upon better Information appears so altered in its Circumstances, that the Fame of it is divided among many, instead of being attributed to One. This is a secret Satisfaction to these Malignants for the Person whom they never could not but admire, they fancy is nearer their own Condition as soon as his Merit is shared among others. I remember some Years ago there came out an Excellent Poem, without the Name of the Author. The little Wits, who were incapable of Writing it, began to pull in Pieces the supposed Writer. When that would not do, they took great Pains to suppress the Opinion that it was his. That again failed. The next Refuge was to say it was overlooked by one Man, and many Pages wholly written by another. An honest Fellow, who sat among a Cluster of them in debate on this Subject, cried out, Gentlemen, if you are sure none of you yourselfes had an hand in it, you are but where you were, & however writ it! But the most usual Succour to the Envious, in cases of nameless Merit in this kind, is to keep the Property, if possible, unfixed, and by that means to hinder the Reputation of it from falling upon any particular Person. You see an Envious Man clear up his Countenance, if in the Relation of any Man's Great Happiness in one Point, you mention his Uneasiness in another. When he hears such a one is very rich he turns Pale, but recovers when you add that he has many Children. In a Word, the only sure Way to an Envious Man's Favour, is not to deserve it.

But if we consider the Envious Man in Delight, it is like reading the Seat of a Giant in a Romance, the Magnificence of his House consists in the many Limbs of Men whom he has slain. If any who promised themselves Success in any uncommon Undertaking miscarry in the Attempt, or he that aimed at what would have been useful and laudable, meets with Contempt and Derision, the Envious Man, under the Colour of hating Vainglory, can smile with an inward Wantonness of Heart at the ill Effect it may have upon an honest Ambition for the future.

Having thoroughly considered the Nature of this Passion I have made it my Study how to avoid the Envy that may arise to me from these my Speculations: and if I am not mistaken in my self, I think I have a Genius to escape it. Upon hearing in a Coffee-house one of my Papers commended, I immediately apprehended the Envy that would spring from that Applause: and therefore gave a Description of my Piece the next Day, being resolved as I grow in Reputation for Wit, to resign my Pretensions to Beauty. This I hope, may give some Ease to those unhappy Gentlemen, who do me the Honour to torment themselves upon the Account of this my Paper. As their Case is very deplorable, and deserves Compassion, I shall sometimes be dull, in Pity to them, and will from time to time administer Consolations to them by further Discoveries of my Person. In the meanwhile, if any one says the Spectator has Wit, it may be some Relief to them, to think that he does not show it in Company. And if any one praises his Morality, they may comfort themselves by considering that his Face is none of the longest. R.

—Κυρος ὑμῶν ἐχὼν— —Hom

A MONG the other hardy Undertakings which I have proposed to myself, that of the Correction of Impudence is what I have very much at Heart. This in a particular Manner is my Province as SPECTATOR for it is generally an Offence committed by the Eyes, and that against such as the Offenders would perhaps never have an Opportunity of injuring any other Way. The following Letter is a Complaint of a young Lady, who sets forth a Treachery of this Kind with that Command of herself as befits Beauty and Innocence, and yet with so much Spirit as sufficiently expresses her Indignation. The whole Transgression is performed with the Eyes, and the Crime is no less than employing them in such a Manner, as to divert the Eyes of others from the best use they can make of them, even looking up to Heaven.

SIR,

There never was (I believe) an acceptable Man, but had some unkind Imitators. Ever since the SPECTATOR appeared have I remarked a kind of Men, whom I choose to call Stares, that without any regard to Time, Place, or Modesty, disturb a large Company with their impertinent Eyes. Spectators make up a proper Assembly for a Puppet-Show or a Bear Garden, but devout Suppliants and attentive Hearers, are the Audience one ought to expect in Church. As I am, Sir, Member of a small pious congregation near one of the North Gates of this City much the greater Part of us indeed are I males, and need to behave our selves in a regular attentive Manner, till very lately one whole Isle has been disturbed with one of these monstrous Stares. He's the Head taller than any one in the Church, but for the greater Advantage of exposing himself, and upon a Hassock, and commands the whole Congregation to the great Annoyance of the devoutest part of the Auditory for who with Blushing, Confusion and Vexation, we can neither mind the Preacher nor Sermon. Your Annihilation upon this Intolerance would be a great favour to,

SIR,

Your most humble servant, S C

I have frequently seen of this Sort of Fellows and do not think there can be a greater Aggravation of an Offence, than that it is committed where the Criminal is protected by the Sacredness of the Place which he violates. Many Reflections of this Sort might be very justly made upon this Kind of Behaviour, but a Stare is not usually a Person to be convinced by the Reason of the thing and a Fellow that is capable of showing an impudent Front before a whole Congregation, and can bear being a public Spectacle, is not so easily reluked as to amend by Admonitions. If therefore my Correspondent does not inform me, that within Seven Days after this Date the Brehann does not at least stand upon his own Legs only, without an Eminence, my friend WILL PHOSPHORUS has promised to take an Hassock opposite to him and stare against him in Defence of the Ladies. I have given him Directions, according to the most exact Rules of Opticks, to place himself in such a Manner that he shall meet his Eyes wherever he throws them. I have Hopes that when WILL confronts him, and all the Ladies, in whose Behalf he engages him, cast kind Looks and Wishes of Success at their Champion, he will have some Shame, and feel a little of the Pun he has so often put others to, of being out of Countenance.

It has indeed been Time out of Mind generally remarked, and is often lamented, that this Family of Stares have infested publick Assemblies. And I know no other Way to obviate so great an Evil, except, in the Case of fixing their Eyes upon Women, son of a Mile Friend will take the Part of such as are under the Oppression of Impudence, and encounter the Eyes of the Stares wherever they meet them. While we suffer our Women to be thus unpudently attacked, they have no Defence, but in the End to erst yielding Glances at the Stares. And in this Case, a Man who has no Sense of Shame has the same Advantage over his Mistress, as he who has no regard for his own Life has over his Adversary. While the Generality of the World are fettered by Rules, and moe by proper and just Methods, he who has no Respect to any of them, carries away the Reward due to that Propriety of Behaviour, with no other Merit but that of having neglected it.

I take an impudent I allow to be a sort of Outlaw in Good Breeding, and therefore what is said of him no Nation or Person can be concerned for. For this Reason one may be free upon him. I here put myself to great Pains in considering this prevailing Quality which we call Impudence, and have taken Notice that it exerts itself in a different Manner according to the different Sexes, whereof such Subjects of these Dominions are Masters. Of it were born Impudence in an Irishman is sulky and insolent, in a Scotchman it is untractable and suspicious, in an Englishman it is unrelenting and ungenerous. As the Course of the World now runs the impudent Englishman behaves like a surly Landlord, the Scot, like an ill received Guest, and the Irishman like a stranger who knows he is not welcome. There is seldom anything entertaining either in the Impudence of a South or North Briton but that of an Irishman is always comick. A true and genuine Impudence is ever the Effect of Ignorance, without the least Sense of it. The best and most successful Stares now in this Town are of that Nation. They have usually the Advantage of the Statute mentioned in the above Letter of my Correspondent, and generally take their Stands in the Eye of Women of Fortune, so much that I have known one of them, three Months after he came from Plough, with a tolerable good Air lend out a Woman from a Play, which one of our own Breed, after four years at Oxford and two at the Temple, would have been afraid to look at.

I cannot tell how to account for it, but these People have usually the Preference to our own fools, in the Opinion of the sillier Part of Woman-kind. Perhaps it is that an English Coxcomb is seldom so obsequious as an Irish one and when the Design of pleasing is visible, an Absurdity in the Way toward it is easily forgiven.

But those who are downright impudent, and go on without Reflection that they are such, are more to be tolerated, than a Set of Fellows among us who profess Impudence with an Air of Humour, and think to carry off the most inexcusable of all Faults in the World, with no other Apology than saying in a gay Tone, I put an impudent Face upon the Matter. No, no Man shall be allowed the Advantages of Impudence, who is conscious that he is such. If he knows he is impudent, he may as well be otherwise, and it shall be expected that he blush, when he sees he makes another do it. For nothing can atone for the want of Modesty, without which Beauty is ungraceful, and Wit detestable. R.

—Locus est et pluribus Unbris—Hor

I AM sometimes very much troubled, when I reflect upon the three great Professions of Divinity, Law and Physick, how they are each of them overburdened with Pretensions, and filled with Multitudes of Ingenious Gentlemen that stare one another.

We may divide the Clergy into Generals, Field Officers, and Subalterns. Among the first we may reckon Bishops, Deans, and Arch-Deacons. Among the second are Doctors of Divinity, Prebendaries, and all that wear Scarfs. The rest are comprehended under the Subalterns. As for the first Class, our Constitution preserves it from any Redundancy of Incumbents, notwithstanding Competitors are numberless. Upon a strict Calculation, it is found that there has been a great Exceeding of late Years in the Second Division, several Brechts having been granted for the converting of Subalterns into Scarf Officers, inasmuch that within my Memory the price of Lute-string is raised above two Pence in a Yard. As for the Subalterns, they are not to be numbered. Should our Clergy once enter into the corrupt Practice of the Laity, by the splitting of their Freeholds, they would be able to carry most of the Elections in England.

The Body of the Law is no less encumbered with superfluous Members, than are Virgil's Army, which he tells us was so crowded, many of them had not Room to use their Weapons. This prodigious Society of Men may be divided into the Litigious and Peaceable. Under the first are comprehended all those who are carried down in Coach fulls to Westminster Hall every Morning in Term-time. Martial's description of this Species of Lawyers is full of Humour.

Iras et verba locant

Men that hire out their Words and Anger that are more or less passionate according as they are paid for it, and allow their Client a quantity of Wrath proportionable to the Fee which they receive from him. I must, however, observe to the Reader, that above three Parts of those whom I reckon among the Litigious, are such as are only quarrelsome in their Hearts, and have no Opportunity of showing their Passion at the Bar. Nevertheless, as they do not know what Stiffes may arise, they appear at the Hall every Day, that they may show themselves in a Readiness to enter the Lists, whenever there shall be Occasion for them.

The Peaceable Lawyers are, in the first place, many of the Benchers of the several Inns of Court, who seem to be the Dignitaries of the Law, and are endowed with those Qualifications of Mind that accomplish a Man rather for a Ruler, than a Pleader. These Men live peaceably in their Habitations, sitting once a Day, and Dancing once a Year, for the Honour of their Respective Societies.

Another numberless Branch of Peaceable Lawyers, are those young Men who being placed at the Inns of Court in order to study the Laws of their Country, frequent the Play-House more than Westminster Hall, and are seen in all public Assemblies, except in a Court of Justice. I shall say nothing of those Silent and Busy Multitudes that are employed within Doors in the drawing up of Writings and Conveyances, nor of those greater Number, that practise their want of

<sup>2</sup> In Dugdale's, 'Origines Juridicæ' we read how in the Middle Temple, on All Saints' Day, when the judges and sergeants who had belonged to the Inn were feasted, 'the music being begun, the Master of the Revels was twice called. At the second call the Reader with the white staff advanced, and began to read the measures, followed by the barristers and students in order, and when one measure was ended, the Reader at the cupboard called for another.'

<sup>3</sup> At this time, and until the establishment of New Style, from 1751, the legal year began in England on the 25th of March, while legally in Scotland, and by common usage throughout the whole Kingdom, the customary year began on the 1st of January. The Spectator dated its years, according to custom from the 1st of January, and so wrote its first date March 1, 1711. But we have seen letters inserted in a way often adopted to avoid confusion (1710-11) which gave both the legal and the customary reckoning. March 24 being the last day of the legal year 1710, in the following papers, until December 31, the year is 1711 both by law and custom. Then again until March 24, while usage will be recognizing a new year, 1712, it will be still for England (but not for Scotland) 1711 to the lawyers. The reform initiated by Pope Gregory XIII in 1582 and not accepted for England and Ireland until 1751, had been adopted by Scotland from the 1st of January, 1600.

If in the third place we look into the Profession of Physick, we shall find a most formidable Body of Men. The Sight of them is enough to make a Man serious, for we may lay it down as a Maxim, that When a Nation abounds in Physicians, it grows thin of People. Sir Isaac Newton is very much puzzled to find a Reason why the Northern Hive, as he calls it, does not send out such prodigious Swarms, and over-run the World with Gells and Parasites as it did formerly; but had that Excellent Author observed that there were no Students in Physick among the Subjects of Ther and Eden, and that this Science very much flourishes in the North at present he might have found a better Solution for this Difficulty, than any of those he has made use of. This Body of Men, in our own Country, may be described like the British Army in Cæsar's time. Some of them shew in Chariots, and some on Foot. If the Infantry do less Execution than the Charioteers, it is, because they cannot be carried so soon into all Quarters of the Town and dispatch so much Business in so short a Time. Besides this Body of Regular Troops, there are Stragglers, who, without being duly listed and enrolled, do infinite Mischief to those who are so unlucky as to fall into their Hands.

There are besides the above mentioned, innumerable Returners to Physick, who, for want of other Patients amuse themselves with the stifling of Cats in an Air Pump cutting up Dogs alive, or impaling of Insects upon the point of a Needle for Microscopical Observations. Besides those that are employed in the gathering of Weeds, and the Chase of Butterflies. Not to mention the Cockle-shell Merchants and Spider-catchers.

When I consider how each of these Professions are crowded with Multitudes that seek their Livelihood in them, and how many Men of Merit there are in each of them, who may be rather said to be of the Science, than the Profession. I very much wonder at the Humour of Parents, who will not rather chuse to place their Sons in a way of Life where an honest Industry cannot but thrive, than in Stations where the greatest Probity, Learning and Good Sense may miscarry. How many Men are Country Curates that might have made themselves Aldermen of London by a right Improvement of a smaller Sum of Money than what is usually laid out upon a learned Education? A sober, frugal Person, of slender Parts and a slow Apprehension, might have thrived in Trade though he starves upon Physick, as a Man would be well enough pleased to buy Silks of one, whom he would not venture to feel his Pulse. Vagelli is careful, studious and obliging, but without a little thiel & ull'd, he has not a single Client, but might have had abundance of Customers. The Misfortune is, that Parents take a Liking to a particular Profession, and therefore desire their Sons may be of it. Whereas, in so great an Affair of Life, they should consider the Genius and Abilities of their Children, more than their own Inclinations.

It is the great Advantage of a trading Nation, that there are very few in it so dull and heavy, who may not be placed in Stations of Life which may give them an Opportunity of making their Fortunes. A well regulated Commerce is not, like Lay Physick or Divinity, to be overstocked with Hands, but, on the contrary, flourishes by Multitudes, and gives Employment to all its Professors. Fleets of Merchants are so many Squadrons of floating Shops, that send our Wares and Manufactures in all the Markets of the World and find out Chapmen under both the Tropicks.

<sup>1</sup> See Sir W Temple's Essay on Heroic Virtue Section 4. 'This part of Scythia, in its whole Northern extent, I take to have been the vast Hive out of which is issued so many mighty swarms of barbarous nations,' &c. And again, 'Each of these countries was like a mighty hive, which, by the vigour of propagation and health of climate, grew too full of people than it could contain; some new swarm at certain periods of time, that took wing and sought out some new abode, expelling or subduing the old inhabitants, and settling themselves in their rooms, if they liked the conditions of place and commodities of life they met with; if not, going on till they found some other wing agreeable to their present humours and dispositions.' He attributes their successes and their rapid propagation to the greater vigour of life in the northern climates, and the only reason he gives for the absence of like effects during the continued presence of like causes is, that Christianity abated their enthusiasm and allayed 'the restless humour of perpetual wars and contentions.'

THE word Spectator being most usually understood is one of the Audience at Publick Representations in our Theatres, I seldom fail of many Letters relating to Plays and Operas. But, indeed, there are such monstrous things done in both, that if one had not been an Eye witness of them, one could not believe that such Matters had really been exhibited. There is very little which concerns human Life, or is a Picture of Nature, that is regarded by the greater Part of the Company. The Understanding is dismissed from our Entertainments. Our Mirth is the Laughter of Fools, and our Admiration the Wonder of Idiots; else such improbable, monstrous, and incoherent Dreams could not go off as they do, not only without the utmost Scorn and Contempt, but even with the loudest Applause and Approbation. But the Letter of my Correspondents will represent this Affair in a more lively Manner than any Discourse of my own, I [shall therefore] give them to my Reader

It would have been but a natural Step for me to have personated that noble Creature, after having behaved myself to Satisfaction in the Part above mention'd. But that of a Lion, is too great a Character for one that never trod the Stage before but upon two Legs. As for the little Resistance which I

Katherine Tofts, the daughter of a person in the family of Bishop Burnet, had great natural charms of voice, person, and manner. Playing with Nicolini, singing English to his Italian, she was the first of our france donne in Italian Opera. Mrs Tofts had made much money when in 1709 she quitted the stage with disordered intellect her voice being then unbroken, and her beauty in the height of its bloom. Having recovered health, she married Mr Joseph Smith, a rich patron of arts and collector of books and engravings, with whom she went to Venice, when he was sent thither as English Consul. Her madness afterwards returned, she lived, therefore, says Sir J Hawkins, 'sequestered from the world in a remote part of the house, and had a large garden to range in, in which she would frequently walk, singing and giving way to that innocent frenzy which had seized her in the earlier part of her life.' She identified herself with the great princesses whose loves and sorrows she had represented in her youth, and died about the year 1760

I am,

Sir,

Your most humble Servant,
Thomas Prone

Mr SPECTATOR,

'This is to let you understand, that the Play House is a Representation of the World in nothing so much as in this Particular, that no one rises in it according to his Merit. I have acted several Parts of Household stuff with great Applause for many Years. I am one of the Men in the Hangings in the Emperour of the Moon,<sup>1</sup> I have twice performed the third Chair in an English Opera and have relieved the Pump in the Fortune Hunters.<sup>2</sup> I am now grown old, and hope you will recommend me so effectually, as that I may say something before

<sup>1</sup> The Emperour of the Moon is a farce, from the French, by Mrs Aphra Behn, first acted in London in 1687. It was originally Italian, and had run 80 nights in Paris as Harlequin l'Emperour dans le Monde de la Lune. In Act II sc 3 'The Front of the Scene is only a Curtain or Hangings to be drawn up at Pleasure.' Various gay masqueraders, interrupted by return of the Doctor, are earned by Scaramouch behind the curtain. The Doctor enters in wrath, vowing he has heard fiddles. Presently the curtain is drawn up and discovers where Scaramouch has 'plac'd them all in the Hanging in which they make the Figures, where they stand without Motion in Posti res' Scaramouch professes that the noise was made by putting up this piece of Tapestry, 'the best in Italy for the Rareness of the Figures, sir.' While the Doctor is admiring the new tapestry, said to have been sent him as a gift, Harlequin, who is 'plac'd on a Tree in the Hangings' hits him on 'the Head with his Truncheon.' The place of a particular figure in the picture, with a hand on a tree, is that supposed to be aspired to by the Spectator's next correspondent

<sup>2</sup> 'The Fortune Hunters, or Two Fools Well Met, a Comedy first produced in 1685, was the only work of James Carle, a player who quitted the stage to serve King William III in the Irish Wars, and was killed at the battle of Agbrin. The crowning joke of the second Act of the Fortune Hunters is the return at night of Mr Spruce, an Exchange man, drunk and musical to the garden door of his house, when Mrs Spruce is just taking leave of young Wealthy. Wealthy hides behind the pump. The drunken husband, who has been in a gutter, goes to the pump to clean himself, and seizes a man's arm instead of a pump handle. He works it as a pump handle, and complains that 'the pump's dry' upon which young Wealthy empties a bottle of orange-flower water into his face

'I go off the Stage In which you will do a great
'Act of Charity to

Your most humble servant,
William Serene

MR SPECTATOR,
'Understanding that Mr Serene has writ to 'you, and desired to be raised from dumb and 'still Parts, I desire, if you give him Motion or 'Speech, that you would advance me in my Way,
'and let me keep on in what I humbly presume I 'am a Master, to wit, in representing human and 'still Life together. I have several times acted
'one of the finest Flower pots in the same Opera
'wherein Mr Serene is a Chair, therefore, upon 'his promotion, request that I may succeed him
'in the Hangings, with my Hand in the Orange-'Trees

Your humble servant,

Drury Lane, March 24, 1710 11

SIR,

'I saw your Friend the Templar this Evening
'in the Pit, and thought he looked very little
'pleased with the Representation of the mad
'Scene of the Pilgrim. I wish, Sir, you would 'do us the favour to advert frequently upon
'the false Taste the Town is in, with Relation to 'Plays as well as Operas. It certainly requires a 'Degree of Understanding to play justly, but 'such is our Condition, that we are to suspend
'our Reason to perform our Parts. As to Scenes 'of Madness, you know, Sir, there are noble In'stances of this kind in Shakspear, but then it 'is the Disturbance of a noble Mind, from gener'ous and humane Resentments. It is like that 'Grief which we have for the decease of our 'Friends. It is no Diminution, but a Recom'mendation of humane Nature, that in such In'cident Passion gets the better of Reason, and
'all we can think to comfort ourselves, is impotent
'against half what we feel. I will not mention 'that we had an Idiot in the Scene, and all the 'Sense is represented to have, is that of Lust.
'As for my self, who have long taken Pleasure in 'personating the Passions, I have to Night acted
'only an Appetite. The part I play'd is I trust,
'but it is represented as written rather by a Dry
'man than a Poet. I come in with a Lubb about 'me, that lubbing with Quart-pots with a full 'Gallon at my Mouth. I am ashamed to tell 'you that I pleased very much, and this was 'introduced as a Madness but sure it was not

'humane Madness, for a Mule or an ass may 'have been as dry as ever I was in my Life

I am,
Sir,
Your most obedient
And humble servant

From the Savoy in the Strand

MR SPECTATOR,

'If you can read it with dry Eyes, I give you
'this trouble to request you, that I am the un'fortunate King Latunus, and believe I am the 'first Prince that dated from this Palace since
'John of Gaunt. Such is the Uncertainty of all 'human Greatness, that I who lately never moved
'without a Guard, am now pressed as a common
'Soldier, and am to sail with the first fair Wind
'against my Brother Lewis of France. It is a 'very hard thing to put off a Character which one
'has appeared in with Applause. This I experi'enced since the Loss of my Diadem, for, upon 'quarrelling with another Recruit, I spoke my 'Indignation out of my Part in recitative

—Most audacious Slave,
Dar'st thou an angry Monarch's Fury brave?

'The Words were no sooner out of my Mouth,
'when a Sergeant knock'd me down, and ask'd me
'if I had a Mind to Mummy, in telling things no 'Body understood. You see, Sir, my unhappy 'Circumstances, and if by your Mediation you can 'procure a Subsidy for a Prince (who never failed 'to make all that beheld him merry at his Appear'ance) you will merit the Thanks of

THERE is nothing that more betrays a base, ungenerous Spirit, than the giving of secret Stabs to a Man's Reputation. Lampoons and Satyrs, that are written with Wit and Spirit, are like poison'd Darts, which not only inflict a Wound, but make it incurable. For this Reason I am very much troubled when I see the Talents of Humour and Ridicule in the Possession of an ill natured Man. There cannot be a greater Gratification to a barbarous and inhuman Wit, than to stir up Sorrow in the Heart of a private Person, to rouse Uneasiness among near Relations, and to expose whole Families to Derision, at the same time that he remains unseen and undiscovered. If, besides the Accomplishments of being Witty and Ill natured, a Man is vicious into the bargain, he is one of the most mischievous Creatures that can enter into a Civil Society. His Satyr will then chiefly fall upon those who ought to be the most exempt from it. Virtue, Merit, and every thing that is Praise worthy, will be made the Subject of Ridicule and Buffoonry. It is impossible to enumerate the Evils which arise from these Arrows that fly in the dark, and I know no other Excuse that is or can be made for them, than that the Wounds they give are only Imaginary, and produce nothing more than a secret Shame or Sorrow in the Mind of the suffering Person. It must indeed be confessed, that a Lampoon or a Satyr do not carry in them Robbery or Murder, but at the same time, how many are there that would not rather lose a considerable Sum of Money, or even Life it self, than be set up as a Mark of Infamy and Derision? And in this Case a Man should consider, that an Injury is not to be measured by the Notions of him that gives, but of him that receives it.

Those who can put the best Countenance upon the Outrages of this nature which are offered them, are not without their secret Anguish. I have often observed a Passage in Socrates's Behaviour at his Death, in a Light wherein none of the Critics have considered it. That excellent Man, entertaining his Friends a little before he drank the Bowl of Poison with a Discourse on the Immortality of the Soul, at his entering upon it says, that he does not believe any the most Comic Genius can censure him for talking upon such a Subject at such a Time. This passage, I think, evidently glances upon Aristophanes, who writ a Comedy on purpose to ridicule the Discourses of that Divine Philosopher.<sup>2</sup> It has been observed by many Writers, that Socrates was so little moved at this piece of Buffoonry, that he was several times present at its being recited upon the Stage, and never expressed the least Resentment of it. But, with Submission, I think the Remark I have here made shows us, that this unworthy Treatment made an impression upon his Mind, though he had been too wise to discover it.

When Julius Cæsar was lampoon'd by Catullus, he invited him to a Supper, and treated him with such a generous Civility, that he made the Poet his friend ever after.<sup>3</sup> Cardinal Mazarine gave the same kind of Treatment to the leamed

Quillet, who had reflected upon his Luminance in a famous Latin Poem. The Cardinal sent for him, and after some kind Expostulations upon what he had written, assured him of his Esteem, and dismissed him with a Promise of the next good Abbot that should fall, which he accordingly conferred upon him in a few Months after. This had so good an Effect upon the Author, that he dedicated the second Edition of his Book to the Cardinal, after having expunged the Passages which had given him Offence.

Sextus Quintus was not of so generous and forgiving a Temper. Upon his being made Pope, the statue of Pasquin was one Night dressed in a very dirty Shirt, with an Epitaph written under it, that he was forced to wear for his Linnen because his Luminance was made a Princess. This was a Reflection upon the Pope's Sister, who, before the Promotion of her Brother, was in those mean Circumstances that Pasquin represented her. As this Pasquinade made a great noise in Rome, the Pope offered a Considerable Sum of Money to any Person that should discover the Author of it. The Author, relying upon his Holiness's Generosity as also on some private Overtures which he had received from him, made the Discovery himself upon which the Pope gave him the Reward he had promised, but at the same time, to disable the Subject for the future, ordered his Tongue to be cut out and both his Hands to be chopped off. Actus is too true an instance

Every one knows that all the Kings of Europe were his tributaries. Nay, there is a Letter of his extant in which he makes his Boasts that he had laid the Sophi of Persia under Contribution.

Though in the various Examples which I have here drawn together, these several great Men behaved themselves very differently towards the Wits of the Age who had reproached them, they all of them plainly showed that they were very sensible of their Reproaches, and consequently that they received them as very great Injuries. For my own part, I could never trust a Man that I thought was capable of giving these secret Wounds, and cannot but think that he would hurt the Person, whose Reputation he thus assaults, in his Body or in his Fortune, could he do it with the same Security. There is indeed something very barbarous and inhuman in the ordinary Scribbles of Lampoons. An innocent young Lady shall be exposed, for an unhappy Feature. A Father of a Family turned to Ridicule, for some domestick Calamity. A Wife be made uneasy all her Life, for a misinterpreted Word or Action. Nay, a good, a temperate, and a just Man, shall be put out of Countenance, by the Representation of those Qualities that should do him Honour. So pernicious a thing is Wit, when it is not tempered with Virtue and Humanity.

I have indeed heard of heedless, inconsiderate Writers, that without any Malice have sacrificed the Reputation of their Friends and Acquaintance to a certain Liberty of Temper, and a silly Ambition of distinguishing themselves by a Spirit of Railery and Scurrility. As if it were not infinitely more honourable to be a Good natured Man than a Wit. Where there is this little petulant Humour in an Author, he is often very mischievous without designing to be so. For which Reason I always lay it down as a Rule, that an unsecret called Marforno — perhaps because it had been brought from the Forum of Mars — with which the statue of Pasquin used to hold witty conversation. questions affixed to one receiving some afterwards called answers on the other. It was in answer to Marforno's question, Why he wore a dirty shirt? that Pasquin's statue gave the answer cited in the text, when, in 1585, Pope Sixtus V. had brought to Rome, and lodged there in great state, his sister Camilla, who had been a handmaid and was married to a carpenter. The Pope's bait for catching the offender was promise of life and a thousand doubloons if he declared himself, death on the gallows if his name were discovered by another.

The statue Pietro d'Arczzo (Aretino), the most famous among twenty of the name, was in his youth banished from Arezzo for satire of the Indulgence trade of Leo XI. But he threw instead of suffering by his audacity of bitterness, and rose to honour as the Scourge of Princes, Il Flagello de' Principi. Under Clement VII. he was at Rome in the Pope's service. Francis I. of France gave him a gold chain. Emperor Charles V. gave him a pension of 200 scudi. He died in 1557, aged 66, called by himself and his contemporaries, though his wit often was berstly, Arcitino 'the divine'.

Mazzini though born at Rome, was of Sicilian family. In the second edition, published at Paris in 1856, dedicated to the cardinal Mazzini, the passages complained of were omitted for the reason and with the result told in the text, the poet getting 'une jolie Abbaye de 400 pistoles,' which he enjoyed until his death (aged 59) in 1861.

Man is more hurtful than an ill-natured one, for as the former will only attack his Enemies, and those he wishes ill to, the other injures indifferently both Friends and Foes. I cannot forbear, on this occasion, transcribing a Fable out of Sir Roger l'Estrange,<sup>1</sup> which accidentally lies before me. 'A Company of Waggish Boys were witting of Frogs at the side of a Pond, and still as any of 'em put up their Heads, they'd be pelting them down again with Stones. Children (says one of the Frogs), you never consider that though this may be Play to you, 'tis Death to us'.

As this Week is in a manner set apart and dedicated to Serious Thoughts,<sup>2</sup> I shall indulge myself in such Speculations as may not be altogether unsuitable to the Season and in the mean time, as the settling in our selves a Charitable Frame of Mind is a Work very proper for the Time, I have in this Paper endeavoured to expose that particular Breach of Charity which has been generally overlooked by Divines, because they are but few who can be guilty of it. THERE are in this Town a great Number of insignificant People, who are by no means fit for the better sort of Conversation, and yet have an impertinent Audition of appearing with those to whom they are not welcome. If you walk in the Parl, one of them will certainly join with you, though you are in Company with Ladies: if you drink a Bottle, they will find your Haunts. What makes [such Fellows] the more burdensome is, that they neither offend nor please so far as to be taken Notice of for either. It is, I presume, for this Reason that my Correspondents are willing by my Means to be rid of them. The two following Letters are writ by Persons who suffer by such Impertinence. A worthy old Batchelour, who sets in for his Dose of Claret every Night at such an Hour, is teased by a Swarm of them who because they are sure of Room and good Fire, have taken it in their Heads to keep a sort of Club in his Company, tho' the sober Gentleman himself is an utter Enemy to such Meetings.

<sup>1</sup> From the 'Fables of Æsop and other eminent Mythologists, with Morals and Reflections. By 'Sir Roger l'Estrange.' The vol. contains Fables of Æsop, Barlandus, Anrinus, Abstemius, Poggio the Florentine, Miscellany from a Common School Book, and a Supplement of Fables out of several authors, in which last section is that of the Boys and Frogs, which Addison has copied out verbatim. Sir R. l'Estrange had died in 1704, aged 88.

Mr SPECTATOR,

'The Aversion I for some Years have had to Clubs in general, gave me a perfect Relish for your Speculation on that Subject: but I have since been extremely mortified, by the malicious World's ranking me amongst the Supporters of such impertinent Assemblies. I beg Leave to state my Case fairly, and that done, I shall expect Redress from your judicious Pen.

I am, Sir, a Batchelour of some standing, and a Traveller in my Business, to consult my own Humour, which I gratify without controuling other People's. I have a Room and a whole Bed to myself, and I have a Dog, a Liddle, and a Gun they please me, and injure no Creature alive. My chief Meal is a Supper, which I eat at a Tavern. I am constant to an Hour, and not ill-humour'd for which Reasons, tho' I invite no Body, I have no sooner supped, than I have a Crowd about me of that sort of good Company that know not whither else to go. It is true every Man pays his Share, yet as they are Intruders, I have an undoubted Right to be the only Speaker, or at least the loudest, which I maintain, and that to the great Ennuiement of my Audience. I sometimes tell them their own in pretty free Language and sometimes divert them with merry Tales, according as I am in Humour. I am one of those who live in a great Age, by a sort of regular Intemperance, I never go to Bed drunk, but always flustered. I wear away very gently, am apt to be peevish, but never angry. Mr SPECTATOR, if you have kept various Company, you know there is in every Tavern in Town some old Humourist or other, who is Master of the House as much as he that keeps it. The Drawers are all in awe of him and all the Customers who frequent his Company, yield him a sort of comical Obedience. I do not know but I may be such a Fellow as this myself. But I appeal to you, whether this is to be called a Club, because so many Impertinents will break in upon me and come without Appointment? Clinch of Barnet has a nightly Meeting, and shows to every one that will come in and pay but then he is the only Actor. Why should People miscall things? If his is allowed to be a Consort, why mayn't mine be a Lecture? However, Sir, I submit it to you, and am,

Sir,
Your most obedient, &c
Tho Kimbow

Good Sir,
'You and I were press'd against each other last Winter in a Crowd, in which uneasy Posture we staid together for almost Half an Hour. I thank you for all your Civilities ever since, in

'solved to direct my self by a Scheme of Rules, which I had collected from his Observations. The Learned World are very well acquainted with that Gentleman's Invention who, for the better carrying on of his Experiments, contrived a certain Mathematical Chair, which was so Artificially hung upon Springs, that it would weigh any thing as well as a Pair of Scales. By this means he discovered how many Ounces of his Food passed by Perspiration what quantity of it was turned into Nourishment, and how much went away by the other Channels and Distributions of Nature.

'Having provided myself with this Chair, I used to Study, Eat, Drink, and Sleep in it in so much that I may be said, for these three last Years, to have lived in a Pair of Scales. I compute my self, when I am in full Health, to be precisely Two Hundred Weight, filling short of it about a Pound after a Day's Fast, and exceeding it as much after a very full Meal, so that it is my continual Employment, to trim the Balance between these two Volatile Pounds in my Constitution. In my ordinary Meals I fetch my self up to two Hundred Weight and [a half pound] and if after having dined I find my self fall short of it, I drink just so much Small Beer, or eat such a quantity of Bread, as is sufficient to make me weight. In my greatest Excesses I do not transgress more than the other half Pound which, for my Health's sake, I do the first Monday in every Month. As soon as I find my self duly poised after Dinner I walk till I have perspired five Ounces and four Scruples, and when I discover, by my Chair, that I am so far reduced, I fall to my Books, and Study away three Ounces more. As for the remaining Parts of the Pound, I keep no account of them. I do not dine and sup by the Clock, but by my Chair, for when that informs me my Pound of Food is exhausted I conclude my self to be hungry, and by in another with all Diligence. In my Days of Abstinence I lose a Pound and an half, and on solemn Fasts am two Pound lighter than on other Days in the Year.

'I allow my self, one Night with another, a Quarter of a Pound of Sleep within a few Grains more or less, and if upon my rising I find that I have not consumed my whole quantity, I take out the rest in my Chair. Upon an exact Calculation of what I expended and received the last Year which I always register in a Book, I find the Medium to be two hundred and eight, so that I cannot discover that I am unpured one Ounce in my Health during a whole Twelve-month. And yet, Sir, notwithstanding this my great care to ballast my self equally every Day, and to keep my Body in its proper Poise, so it is 'that I find my self in a sick and languishing Condition. My Complexion is grown very sallow, my Pulse low, and my Body Hydropical. Let me therefore beg you, Sir, to consider me as your Patient and to give me more certain Rules to walk by than those I have already observed, and you will very much oblige.

Your Humble Servant

This Letter puts me in mind of an Italian Epitaph written on the Monument of a Valetudinarian. Stat-o ben, e e per star Mallo sto qui Which it is impossible to translate. He I fear of Death often proves mortal, and sets People on Methods to save their Lives, which infallibly destroy them. This is a Reflection made by some Historians, upon observing that there are many more thousands killed in a Night than in a Battle, and may be applied to those Multitudes of many very Sick Persons that break their Constitutions by Physick, and throw themselves into the Arms of Death, by endeavouring to escape. This Method is not only dangerous, but below the Practice of a Reasonable Creature. To consult the Preservation of Life is the only End of it, To make our Health our Business. To engage in Action that is not part of a Regimen, or course of Physick are Purposes so object, so mean, so unworthy human Nature, that a generous Soul could rather die than submit to them. Besides that a continual Anxiety for Life vitiates all the Relishes of it, and casts a Gloom over the whole Race of Nature, as it is impossible we should take Delight in any thing that we are every Moment afraid of losing.

I do not mean, by what I have here said, that I think any one to blame for taking due Care of their Health. On the contrary, as Cheerfulness of Mind, and Capacity for Business, are in a great measure the Effects of a well tempered Constitution, a Man cannot be so too much Pains to cultivate and preserve it. But this Care, which we are prompted to, not only by common Sense, but by Duty and Instinct, should never engage us in groundless Fears, melancholly Apprehensions and imaginary Distempers, which are natural to every Man who is more anxious to live than how to live. In short, the Preservation of Life should be only a secondary Concern, and the Direction of it our Principal. If we have this Frame of Mind, we shall take the best Means to preserve Life, without being over solicitous about the Event, and shall arrive at that Point of Health which Martial has mentioned as the Perfection of Happiness, of neither fearing nor wishing for Death.

In answer to the Gentleman, who tempers his Health by Ounces and by Scruples, and instead of complying with those natural Solicitations of Hunger and Thirst, Drowsiness or Love of Exercise, governs himself by the Prescriptions of his Chair, I shall tell him a short fable. Jupiter, says the Mythologist, to reward the Piety of a certain Country man, promised to give him whatever he would ask. The Country man desired that he might have the Management of the his Ars de Staticâ Medicinâ, and led to the increased use of Sudorifics. A translation of Synonymus by Dr John Quincy appeared in 1722 the year after the publication of this essay. The 'Art of Static Medicine' was also translated into French by M. Le Breton, in 1722. Dr John Quincy became well known as the author of a Complete Dispensatory (1719 &c.)

is represented on his Tomb by the Figure of a Beau, dress'd in a long Perriwig, and reposing himself upon Velvet Cushions under a Canopy of State. The Inscription is admirable as the Monument, for, instead of celebrating the many remarkable Actions he had performed in the Service of his Country, it acquaints us only with the Manner of his Death, in which it was impossible for him to reap any Honour. The Ditch, whom we are apt to despise for want of Genius, shew an infinitely greater Taste of Antiquity and Politeness in their Buildings and Works of this Nature, than what we meet with in those of our own Country. The Monuments of their Admirals, which have been erected at the publick Expence, represent them like themselves, and are adorned with rostr'd Crowns and naval Ornaments, with beautiful Testoons of [Seaweed], Shells, and Coral.

But to return to our Subject. I have left the Repository of our English Kings for the Contemplation of another Day, when I shall find my Mind disposed for so serious an Amusement. I know that Entertainments of this Nature, are apt to raise dark and dismal Thoughts in timorous Minds and gloomy Imaginations: but for my own Part, though I am always serious, I do not know what it is to be melancholy: and can, therefore, take a View of Nature in her deep and solemn Scenes, with the same Pleasure as in her most gay and delightful ones. By this Means I can improve myself with those Objects, which others consider with Terror. When I look upon the Tombs of the Great, every Emotion of Envy dies in me: when I read the Epitaphs of the Perishable, every inordinate Desire goes out: when I meet with the Grief of Parents upon a Tomb-stone, my Heart melts with Compassion: when I see the Tomb of the Parents themselves, I consider the Vanity of grieving for those whom we must quickly follow. When I see Kings lying by those who deposed them, when I consider rival Princes placed Side by Side, or the holy Men that divided the World with their Contests and Disputes, I reflect with Sorrow and Astonishment on the little Contention, Facts and Debates, of this World. When I read the several Dates of the Tomb of some that dy'd yesterday, and some six hundred Years ago, I consider that great Day, when we shall all of us be contemporaries, and in our Appearance to each other.

on the Sabbath as he was returning from an unsuccessful attack on London. His body was cast on the shore, robbed of a ring by some fishermen, and buried in the sand. The ring discovering his quality he was disinterred, and brought home for burial in Westminster Abbey.

THOMAS is scarce a thinking Man in the World, who is involved in the Business of it, but lies under a secret Impatience of the Hurry and Fatigue he suffers, and has formed a Resolution to fix himself, one time or other, in such a State as is suitable to the End of his Being. You hear Men every Day in Conversation profess, that all the Honour, Power, and Riches which they propose to themselves, cannot give Satisfaction enough to reward them for half the Anxiety they undergo in the Pursuit, or Possession of them. While Men are in this Temper (which happens very frequently) how inconsistent are they with their else? They are wearied with the Toil they bear, but cannot find in their Hearts to relinquish it. Petriest is what they want, but they cannot break themselves to it. While they pant after Shade and Covert, they still affect to appear in the most glittering Scenes of Life. But sure this is but just as reasonable as if a Man should call for more Light, when he has a mind to go to Sleep.

Since then it is certain that our own Hearts deceive us in the Love of the World, and that we cannot command our selves enough to resign it, tho' we every Day wish our selves disengaged from its Allurements: let us not stand upon a formal talking of it, but let us wear our selves from them, while we are in the midst of them.

It is certainly the general Intention of the greater Part of Mankind to accomplish this Work, and he according to their own Appropriation as such is the possible, can. But since the Duration of Life is so uncertain, and that has been a common Topick of Discourse ever since there was man a thing, as Life it self, how is it possible that we should defer a Moment the beginning to live according to the Rules of Reason?

The Man of Business is his ever some one Point to carry, and then he tells himself he'll add adieu to all the Vain, of Ambition. The Man of Pleasure resolves to take his leave at least, and part civilly with his Mistress. But the Ambitious Man is entangled every Moment in a first Pursuit, and the Lover sees new Charms in the Object he loves, and he could abandon it is, therefore, a fantastical way, of thinking, when we promise our selves an Alteration in our Conduct from change of Place, and difference of Circumstances, the same Passions will attend us where ever we are, till they are Conquered, and we can never live to our Satisfaction in the deepest Retirement, unless we are capable of living so in some measure amidst the Noise and Business of the World.

I have ever thought Men were better known, by what could be observed of them from a Perusal of their private Letters, than any other way. My Friend, the Clergyman, the other Day, upon serious Discourse with him concerning the Danger of Procrastination, gave me the following Letters from Perso is with whom he lives in great Friendship and Intimacy, according to the good Breeding and good Sense of his Character. The first is from a Man of Business, who is his Convert. The second from one of whom he conceives good Hopes. The third from one who is in no State at all, but carried one way and another by starts.

SIR,

I know not with what Words to express to you the Sense I have of the high Obligation you have laid upon me, in the Penance you enjoined me of doing some Good or other, to a Person of Worth, every Day I live. The Station I am in furnishes me with daily Opportunities of this kind, and the Noble Principle with which you have inspired me, of Benevolence to all I have to deal with, quickens my Application in every thing I undertake. When I relieve Mankind from Distress, when I assist a Friendless Person, when I produce concern'd Worth, I am pleas'd with myself, for having design'd to leave the World in order to be virtuous. I am sorry you decline the Occasions which the Condition I am in might afford me of enlarging your Fortunes, but know I contribute more to your Satisfaction, when I acknowledge I am the better Man, from the Influence and Authority you have over,

SIR,

Your most Oblig'd and Most Humble Servant,
R O

SIR,

I am intirely convinced of the Truth of what you were pleas'd to say to me, when I was last with you alone. You told me then of the silly way I was in, but you told me so, as I saw you lov'd me, otherwise I could not obey your Commands in letting you know my Thoughts so sincerely as I do at present. I know the Credit for whom I resign so much of my Character is all that you said of her. Is it then the Inferior something in her so undesigning and harmless, that it her Guilt in one kind disappears by the Comparison of her Innocence in another? Will you, virtuous Men, allow no alteration of Offences? Must Dear [Chloe] be called by the hard Name you pious People give to common Women? I keep the solemn Promise I made you, in writing to you the State of my Mind, after your last Admonition, and will endeavour to get the better of this Fondness, which makes me so much her humble Servant, that I am almost inclin'd to Subscribe my self Yours,

T D

SIR,

There is no State of Life so Anxious as that of a Man who does not live according to the Dictates of his own Reason. It will seem odd to you, when I assure you that my Love of Retirement first of all brought me to Court, but this will be 'no Riddle, when I recount you that I plac'd my self here with a Design of getting so much Money as might enable me to Purchase a handsome Retreat in the Country. At present my Circumstances enslave me, and my Duty prompts me, to pass away the remaining Part of my Life in such a Retirement as I at first propos'd to my self, but to my great Misfortune I have intirely lost the Relish of it, and shou'd now return to the Country with greater Reluctance than I at first came to Court. I am so unhappy, as to know that what I am fond of are Trifles, and that what I neglect is of the greatest Importance. In short, I find a Contest in my own Mind between Reason and Fashion. I remember you once told me, that I might live in the World, and out of it, at the same time. Let me beg of you to explain this Paradox more at large to me, that I may conform my Life, if possible, both to my Duty and my Inclination.

Your most humble Servant,

I SHALL here present my Reader with a Letter from a Projector, concerning a new Office which he thinks may very much contribute to the Embellishment of the City, and to the driving Barbarity out of our Streets. [I consider it as a Satyr upon Projectors in general, and a lively Picture of the whole Art of Modern Criticism.]

SIR,

Observing that you have Thoughts of creating certain Officers under you for the Inspection of several petty Enormities which you your self cannot attend to, and finding daily Absurdities hung out upon the Sign-Posts of this City, to the great Scandal of Forcigners, as well as those of our own Country, who are curious Spectators of the same. I do humbly propose, that you would be pleas'd to make me your Superintendent of all such Figures and Devices, as are or shall be made use of on this Occasion, with full Powers to rectify or expunge whatever I shall find irregular or defective. For want of such an Officer, there is nothing like sound Literature and good Sense to be met with in these Objects, that are everywhere thrusting themselves out to the Eye, and endeavouring to become visible. Our streets are fill'd with blue Boats, black Swans, and red Lions, not to men-

'non flying Pigs, and Hogs in Armour, with many other Creatures more extraordinary than any in the desarts of Africa. Strange! that one who has all the Birds and Beasts in Nature to chuse out of, should live at the Sign of an Ens Rationis!

'My first Task, therefore, should be like that of Hercules, to clear the City from Monsters. In the second Place, I would forbid, that Creatures of jarring and incongruous Natures should be joined together in the same Sign, such as the Bell and the Neats tongue, the Dog and Grid-iron. The Fox and Goose may be supposed to have met, but what has the Fox and the Seven Stars to do together? and when did the [Lamb] and Dolphin ever meet except upon a Sign Post? As for the Cat and Fiddle, there is a Conceit in it, and therefore, I do not intend that anything I have here said should affect it. I must however observe to you upon this Subject, that it is usual for a young Tradesman at his first setting up, to add to his own Sign that of the Master whom he serv'd as the Husband, after Marriage, gives a Place to his Mistress's Arms in his own Coat. This I take to have given Rise to many of those Absurdities which are committed over our Heads, and as I am inform'd, first occasioned the three Nuns and a Hare, which we see so frequently joined together. I would, therefore establish certain Rules, for determining how far one Tradesman may give the Sign of another, and in what Cases he may be allowed to quarter it with his own.

'In the third place, I would enjoin every Shop to make use of a Sign which bears some Affinity to the Wares in which it deals. What can be more inconsistent, than to see a Brewer at the Sign of the Angel, or a Faylor at the Lion? A Cook should not live at the Boot nor a Shoemaker at the roasted Pig and yet, for want of this Regulation I have seen a Goat set up before the Door of a Perfumer, and the French King's Head at a Sword Cutlers.

An ingenious Foreigner observes, that several of those Gentlemen who value themselves upon their Families and overlook such as are bred to Trade, bear the Tools of their Forefathers in their Coats of Arms. I will not examine how true this is in Fact. But though it may not be necessary for Posterity thus to set up the Sign of their Forefathers I think it highly proper for those who rectly profess the Trade, to shew some such Marks of it before their Doors.

'When the Name gives an Occasion for an ingenious Sign post, I would likewise advise the Owner to take that Opportunity of letting the World know who he is. It would have been ridiculous for the ingenious Mrs Salmon<sup>2</sup> to have lived at the Sign of the Trout for which Reason she has erected before her House the Figure of the Fish that is her Name sake. Mr

Bell has likewise distinguished himself by a Device of the same Nature. And here, Sir, I must beg Leave to observe to you, that this particular Figure of a Bell has given Occasion to several Pieces of Wit in this Kind. A Man of your Reading must know, that Abel Druggier gained great Applause by it in the Time of Ben Jonson<sup>2</sup>. Our Apocryphal Heathen God<sup>3</sup> is also represented by this Figure which, in conjunction with the Dragon, make a very hand some picture in several of our Streets. As for the Bell Savage, which is the Sign of a savage Man standing by a Bell, I was formerly very much puzzled upon the Conceit of it, till I accidentally fell into the reading of an old Romance translated out of the French which gives an Account of a very beautiful Woman who was found in a Wilderness, and is called in the French la belle Sauvage, and is everywhere translated by our Countrymen the Bell Savage. This Piece of Philology will, I hope, convince you that I have made Sign posts my Study, and consequently qualified myself for the Employment which I solicit at your Hands. But before I conclude my Letter, I must communicate to you another Remark, which I have made upon the Subject with which I am now entertaining you, namely, that I can give a shrewd Guess at the Humour of the Inhabitant by the Sign that hangs before his Door. A surly choleric fellow generally makes Choice of a Bear as Men of milder Dispositions, frequently live at the Lamb. Seeing a Punch Bowl painted upon a Sign near Charing Cross, and very curiously garnished with a couple of Angels hovering over it and squeezing a Lemon into it, I had the Curiosity to ask after the Master of the House and found upon Inquiry, as I had guessed by the little Apocryphal ens upon his Sign, that he was a Frenchman. I now, Sir it is not requisite for me to enlarge upon these Hints to a Gentleman of your great Abilities so humbly recommend ing my self to your Favour and Patronage.

I remain, &c

I shall add to the foregoing Letter, another which came to me by the same Penny-Post.

Regard to the Accent of his own Language, as those Persons had to theirs whom he professes to imitate. It is observed, that several of the singing Birds of our own Country learn to imitate the Voices, and mellow the Harshness of their natural Notes, by practising under those that come from warmer Climates. In the same manner, I would allow the Italian Opera to lend our English Musick as much as may grace and soften it, but never entirely to annihilate and destroy it. Let the Infusion be as strong as you please, but still let the Subject Matter of it be English.

A Composer should fit his Musick to the Genius of the People, and consider that the Delicacy of Hearing, and Taste of Harmony, has been formed upon those Sounds which every Country abounds with. In short, that Musick is of a Relative Nature, and what is Harmony to one Ear, may be Dissonance to another.

The same Observations which I have made upon the Recitative part of Musick, may be applied to all our Songs and Airs in general.

Signior Baptist Lully<sup>1</sup> acted like a Man of Sense in this Particular. He found the French Musick extremely defective, and very often barbarous. However, knowing the Genius of the People, the Humour of their Language, and the prejudiced Ears [he<sup>2</sup>] had to deal with he did not pretend to extirpate the French Musick, and plant the Italian in its stead, but only to Cultivate and Civilize it with innumerable Graces and Modulations which he borrow'd from the Italian. By this means the French Musick is now perfect in its kind, and when you say it is not so good as the Italian, you only mean that it does not please you so well for there is scarce<sup>3</sup> a Frenchman who would not wonder to hear you give the Italian such a Preference. The Musick of the French is indeed very properly adapted to their Pronunciation and Accent, as their whole Opera wonderfully favours the Genius of such a gay airy People. The Chorus in which that Opera abounds, gives the Parterre frequent Opportunities of joining in Consort with the Stage. This Inclination of the Audience to sing along with the Actors, so prevails with them, that I have sometimes known the Performer on the Stage do no more in a Celebrated Song, than the Clerk of a Parish Church, who serves only to raise the Psalm, and is afterwards drown'd in the Musick of the Congregation. Every Actor that comes on the Stage is a Beau. The Queens and Heroines are so Painted, that they appear as Ruddy and Cherry-cheek'd as Milk-maids. The Shepherds are all Embroider'd, and acquit themselves in a Ball better than our English Dancing Masters. I have seen a couple of Rivers appear in red Stockings and Alpheus, instead of having his Head covered with Sedge and Bull-Rushes, making Love in a fur full-bottomed Perriwig, and a Plume of Feathers but with a Voice so full of Shakes and Quavers that I should have thought the Murmurs of a Country Brook the much more agreeable Musick.

I remember the last Opera I saw in that merry Nation was the Rape of Proserpine, where Pluto, to make the more tempting Figure, puts himself in a French Equipage and brings Ascalaphus along with him as his Valet de Chambre. This is what we call Folly and Imperunerce, but what the French look upon as Gay and Polite.

I shall add no more to what I have here offer'd, than that Musick, Architecture, and Painting, as well as Poetry, and Oratory, are to deduce their Laws and Rules from the general Sense and Taste of Mankind, and not from the Principles of those Arts themselves, or, in other Words, the Taste is not to conform to the Art, but the Art to the Taste. Music is not design'd to please only Chromatick Ears, but all that are capable of distinguishing harsh from disagreeable Notes. A Man of an ordinary Ear is a Judge whether a Passion is express'd in proper Sounds, and whether the Melody of those Sounds be more or less pleasing. C

ONE common Calamity makes Men extremely affect each other, tho' they differ in every other Particular. The Passion of Love is the most general Concern among Men and I am glad to hear by my last Advices from Oxford, that there are a Set of Sighers in that University, who have erected themselves into a Society in Favour of that tender Passion. These Gentlemen are of that Sort of Inamoratos, who are no so very much lost to common Sense, but that they understand the Folly they are guilty of, and for that Reason separate themselves from all other Company, because they will enjoy the Pleasure of talking incoherently, without being ridiculous to any but each other. When a Man comes into the Club, he is no obliged to make any Introduction to his Discourse, but at once, as he is seating himself in his Chair, speaks in the Thread of his own Thoughts, 'She gave me a very obliging Glance, She Never look'd so well in her Life as this Evening,' or the like Reflection, without Regard to any other Members of the Society, for in this Assembly they do not meet to talk to each other, but every Man claims the full Liberty of talking to himself. Instead of Snuff-boxes and Canes, which are the usual Helps to Discourse with other young Fellows, these have each some Piece of Ribbon, a broken Fan, or an old Girdle, which they play with while they talk of the fair Person remember'd by each respective Token. According to the Representation of the Matter from my Letters, the Company appear like so many Players rehearsing behind the Scenes, one is sighing and lamenting his Destiny in beseeching Terms, another declaring he will break his Chain, and another in dumb Show, striving to express his Passion by his Gesture. It is very ordinary in the Assembly for one of a sudden to rise and make a Discourse concerning his Passion in general, and describe the Temper of his Mind in such a Manner, as that the whole Company shall join in the Description, and feel the Force of it. In this Case, if any Man has declared the Violence of his Flame in more pathetick Terms, he is made President for that Night, out of respect to his superiour Passion.

We had some Years ago in this Town a Set of People who met and dress'd like Lovers, and were distinguished by the Name of the Fringe-Glaze Club, but they were Persons of such moderate Intellecks even before they were impaired by their Passion, that their Irregularities could not furnish sufficient Variety of Folly to afford daily new Impertinencies by which Means that Institution dropp'd. These Fellows could express their Passion in nothing but their Dress, but the Ornaments are frustrious now they are Lovers, in proportion to their Learning and Understanding before they became such. The Thoughts of the ancient Poets on this agreeable Phrenzy, are translated in honour of some modern Beauty, and Chloris is won to Dry, by the same Compliment that was made to Lesbia a thousand Years ago. But as far as I can learn, the Patron of the Club is the renowned Don Quixote. The Adventures of that gentle Knight are frequently mention'd in the Society, under the colour of Laughing at the Passion and themselves. But at the same Time, tho' they are sensible of the Extravagancies of that unhappy Warrior, they do not observe, that to turn all the Reading of the best and wisest Writings into Rhapsodies of Love, is a Phrenzy no less diverting than that of the foresaid recomplish'd Spaniard. A Gentleman who, I hope, will continue his Correspondence, is lately admitted into the Fraternity, and sent me the following Letter

SIR,

'Since I find you take Notice of Clubs, I beg Leave to give you an Account of one in Oxford, which you have no where mention'd, and perhaps never heard of. We distinguish our selves by the title of the Amorous Club, are all Votaries of Chapel, and Admirers of the Fair Sex. The Reason that we are so little known in the World,

'is the Secrecy which we are obliged to live under in the University. Our Constitution runs counter to that of the Place wherein we live. For in Love there are no Doctors, and we all profess so high Passion, that we admit of no Graduates in it. Our Presidentship is bestow'd according to the Dignity of Passion, our Number is unlimited, and our Statutes are like those of the Druids, recorded in our own Breasts only, and explained by the Majority of the Company. A Mistress, and a Poem in her Praise, will introduce any Candidate. Without the latter no one can be admitted, for he that is not in love enough to rhyme, is unqualified for our Society. To speak disrespectfully of any Woman, is Expulsion from our gentle Society. As we are to present all of us Gown-men, instead of duelling when we are Rivals, we drink together the Health of our Mistress. The Manner of doing this sometimes indeed creates Debates, on such Occasions we have Recourse to the Rules of Love among the Antients.

Narcissus & Cynthia, septem Justina babatur

'This Method of a Glass to every Letter of her Name, occasioned the other Night a Dispute of some Warmth. A young Student, who is in Love with Mrs. Elizabeth Dimple, was so unreasonable as to begin her Health under the Name of Elizabetha, which so exasperated the Club, that by common Consent we retreated to Be'ty. We look upon a Man as no Company, that does not sigh five times in a Quarter of an Hour, and look upon a Member as very absurd, that is so much himself as to make a direct Answer to a Question. In fine, the whole Assembly is made up of absent Men, that is, of such Persons as have lost their Locality, and whose Minds and Bodies never keep Company with one another. As I am an unfortunate Member of this distracted Society, you cannot expect a very regular Account of it, for which Reason, I hope you will pardon me that I so abruptly subscribe myself,

Sit mihi fas audita loqui — Vir

LAST Night, upon my going into a Coffee-House not far from the Hay-Market Theatre, I diverted myself for above half an Hour with overhearing the Discourse of one, who, by the Shabbiness of his Dress, the Extravagance of his Conceptions, and the Hurry of his Speech, I discovered to be of that Species who are generally distinguished by the title of Projectors. This Gentleman, for I found he was treated as such by his Audience, was entertaining a whole Table of Lastners with the Project of an Opera, which he told us had not cost him above two or three Mornings in the Contrivance, and which he was ready to put in Execution, provided he might find his Account in it. He said, that he had observed the great Trouble and Inconvenience which Ladies were at, in travelling up and down to the several Shows that are exhibited in different Quarters of the Town. The dancing Monks are in one place, the Puppet-Show in another, the Opera in a third, not to mention the Lions, that are almost a whole Day's Journey from the Politer Part of the Town. By this means People of Figure are forced to lose half the Winter after their coming to Town, before they have seen all the strange Sights about it. In order to remedy this great Inconvenience, our Projector drew out of his Pocket the Scheme of an Opera, Entitled, The Expedition of Alexander the Great, in which he had disposed of all the remarkable Shows about Town, among the Scenes and Decorations of his Piece. The Thought, he confessed, was not originally his own, but that he had taken the Hint of it from several Performances which he had seen upon our Stage. In one of which there was a Rary Show in another, a Ladder dance and in others a Posture-man, a moving Picture, with many Curiosities of the like nature.

This Expedition of Alexander opens with his consulting the oracle at Delphos, in which the dumb Conjuror, who has been visited by so many Persons of Quality of late Years, is to be introduced as telling him his Fortune. At the same time Clutch of Barnet is represented in another Corner of the Temple, as ringing the Bells of Delphos, for joy of his arrival. The Tent of Darius is to be Peopled by the Ingenious Mrs Salmon,<sup>1</sup> where Alexander is to fall in Love with a Piece of Wax-Work, that represents the beautiful Statira. When Alexander comes into that Country, in which Quintus Curtius tells us the Dogs were so exceeding fierce that they would not loose their hold, tho' they were cut to pieces Limb by Limb, and that they would hang upon their Prey by their Teeth when they had nothing but a Mouth left, there is to be a scene of Hockley in the Hole,<sup>2</sup> in which is to be represented all the Diversions of that Place, the Bull baiting only excepted, which cannot possibly be exhibited in the Theatre, by Reason of the Lowness of the Roof. The several Woods in Asia, which Alexander must be supposed to pass through, will give the Audience a Sight of Monks dancing upon Ropes, with many other Pleasantries of that ludicrous Species. At the same time, if there chance to be any Strange Animals in Town, whether Birds or Beasts, they may be either let loose among the Woods, or driven across the Stage by some of the Country People of Asia. In the last great Battle, Pinkethman<sup>3</sup> is to personate King Porus upon an Elephant, and is to be encountered by Powell,<sup>2</sup> representing Alexander the Great upon a Dromedary, which nevertheless Mr Powell is desired to call by the Name of Bucephalus. Upon the Close of this great decisive Battle, when the two Kings are thoroughly reconciled, to shew the mutual Friendship and good Correspondence that reigns between them, they both of them go together to a Puppet-Show, in which the ingenious Mr Powell junior,<sup>3</sup> may have an Op-

In Hockley Hole, dealers in rags and old iron congregated. This gave it the name of Rag Street, euphonized into Ray Street since 1774. In the Spectator's time its Pear Garden, upon the site of which there are now metal works, was a famous resort of the lowest classes. 'You must go to Hockley-in-the-Hole, child, to 'learn valour,' says Mrs Peachum to Filch in the Beggars Opera.

William Pinkethman was a low comedian dear to the gallery at Drury Lane as 'Pinkie,' very popular also as a Booth Manager at Bartholomew Fair. Though a sour critic described him as 'the Flower of Bartholomew Fair and the 'Idol of the Rabble' a fellow that overdoes everything and spoils many a Part with his own Stuff, the Spectator has in another paper given honourable fume to his skill as a comedian. Here there is but the whimsical suggestion of a favourite showman and low comedian mounted on an elephant to play King Porus.

George Powell, who in 1711 and 1712 appeared in such characters as Falstaff, Lear, and Cortez in 'the Indian Emperor,' now and then also played the part of the favourite stage hero, Alexander the Great in Lee's Great Queen. He was a good actor, spoilt by intemperance, who came on the stage sometimes warm with Nutt brandy, and courted his heroines so furiously that Sir John Vanbrugh said they were almost in danger of being conquered on the spot. His last new part of any note was in 1713, Porus in Addison's Cato. He lived on for a few wretched years, lost to the public, but much sought by sheriff's officers.

'Powell junior' of the Puppet Show (see note on p. 26) was a more prosperous man than his namesake of Drury Lane. In De Foe's 'Gleanings of Great Britain,' published in 1813, we read 'I was the other Day at a Coffee-House when the following Advertisement was thrown in—At 'Punch's Theatre in the Little Piazza, Covent-Garden, this present Evening will be performed 'an Entertainment, called, The History of Sir

portunity of displaying his whole Art of Machinery, for the Diversion of the two Monarchs. Some at the Table urged that a Puppet-Show was not a suitable Entertainment for Alexander the Great, and that it might be introduced more properly, if we suppose the Conqueror touched upon that part of India which is said to be inhabited by the Pigmies. But this Objection was looked upon as frivolous, and the Proposal immediately over-ruled. Our Projector further added, that after the Reconciliation of these two Kings they might invite one another to Dinner, and either of them entertain his Guest with the German Artist, Mr Pinkethman's Heathen Gods,<sup>1</sup> or any of the like Diversions, which shall then chance to be in vogue.

This Project was receiv'd with very great Applause by the whole Table. Upon which the Undertaker told us, that he had not yet communicated to us above half his Design, for that Alexander being a Greek, it was his Intention that the whole Opera should be acted in that Language, which was a Tongue he was sure would wonderfully please the Ladies, especially when it was a little raised and rounded by the Ionick Dialect, and could not but be [acceptable<sup>2</sup>] to the whole Audience, because there are fewer of them who understand Greek than Italian. The only Difficulty that remained, was, how to get Performers, unless we could persuade some Gentlemen of the Universities to learn to sing, in order to qualify themselves for the Stage, but this Objection soon vanished, when the Projector informed us that the Greeks were at present the only Musicians in the Turkish Empire, and that it would be very easy for our Factory at Smirna to furnish us every Year with a Colony of Musicians, by the Opportunity of the Turkey Fleet, besides, says he, if we want any single Voice for any lower Part in the Opera, Lawrence can learn to speak Greek, as well as he does Italian, in a Fortnight's time.

The Projector having thus settled Matters, to the good liking of all that heard him, he left his Seat at the Table, and planted himself before the Fire, where I had unluckily taken my Stand for the Convenience of over-hearing what he said. Whether he had observed me to be more attentive than ordinary, I cannot tell, but he had not stood by me above a Quarter of a Minute, but he turned short upon me on a sudden, and catching me by a Button of my Coat, attacked me very abruptly after the following manner. Besides, Sir, I have heard of a very extraordinary Genius for Musick that lives in Switzerland, who has so strong a Spring in his Fingers, that he can make the Board of an Organ sound like a Drum, and if I could but procure a Subscription of about Ten Thousand Pound every Winter, I would undertake to fetch him over, and oblige him by Articles to set every thing that should be sung upon the English Stage. After this he looked full in my Face, expecting I would make an Answer, when by good Luck, a Gentleman that had entered the Coffee house since the Projector applied himself to me, hearing him talk of his Swiss Compositions, cry'd out with a kind of Laugh, Is our Musick then to receive further Improvements from Switzerland? This alarmed the Projector, who immediately let go my Button and turned about to answer him. I took the Opportunity of the Diversion, which seemed to be made in favour of me, and laying down my Penny upon the Bar, retired with some Precipitation. C.

Note, No money to be returned after the Entertainment is begun. Boxes, 2s Pit, 1s. Vreat Regua.

<sup>2</sup> On enquiring into the Matter, I find this has long been a noble Diversion of our Quality and Gentry, and that Mr Powell, by Subscriptions and full Houses, has gathered such Wealth as is ten times sufficient to buy all the Poets in England, that he seldom goes out without his Chair, and thrives on this incredible Folly to that degree, that, were he a Freeman, he might hope that some future Puppet-Show might celebrate his being Lord Mayor, as he has done Sir R Whittington.

It is no small Satisfaction, that I have given Occasion for the President's shewing both his Invention and Reading to such Advantage as my Correspondent reports he did. But it is not to be doubted there were many very proper Hums and Pauses in his Harangue, which lose their Ugliness in the Narration, and which my Correspondent (begging his Pardon) has no very good Talent at representing. I very much approve of the Contempt the Society has of Beauty. Nothing ought to be laudable in a Man, in which his Will is not concerned, therefore our Society can follow Nature, and where she has thought fit, as it were, to mock herself, we can do so too, and be merry upon the Occasion.

MR SPECTATOR,

Your making publick the late Trouble I gave you, you will find to have been the Occasion of this. Who should I meet at the Coffee house Door tother Night, but my old Friend Mr President? I saw somewhat had pleased him, and as soon as he had cast his Eye upon me, "Oho, Doctor, rare News from London", (says he) the SPECTATOR has made honourable Mention of the Club (Man) and published to the World his sincere Desire to be a Member, with a recommendatory Description of his Phiz. And tho' our Constitution has made no particular Provision for short Faces, yet, his being an extraordinary Case, I believe we shall find an Hole for him to creep in at, for I assure you he is not against the Canon and his Sides are as compact as his Joles, he need not disguise himself to make one of us. I presently called for the Paper to see how you looked in Print and after we had regaled our selves a while upon the pleasant Image of our Proselite, Mr President told me I should be his Stranger at the next Night's Club. Where we were no sooner come, and Pipes brought, but Mr President began an Harangue upon your Introduction to my Epistle setting forth with no less Volubility of Speech than Strength of Reason, "That a Speculation of this Nature was what had been long and much wanted, and that he doubted not but it would be of inestimable Value to the Publick, in reconciling even of Bodies and Souls in composing and quieting the Minds of Men under all corporal Redundancies, Deficiencies, and Irregularities whatsoever and making every one sit down content in his own Carcase, though it were not perhaps so mathematically put together as he could wish." And again, "How that for want of a due Consideration of what you first advance, viz that our Faces are not of our own choosing, People had been transported beyond all good Breeding, and hurried themselves into unaccountable and fatal Extravagancies. As, how many impartial Looking-Glasses had been censured and calumniated, nay, and sometimes shivered into ten thousand Splinters, only for a fair Representation of the Truth? How many Headstrangs and Carters had been made accessory, and actually forfeited, only because Folks must needs quarrel with their own Shadows? And who (continues he) but is deeply sensible, that one great Source of

"the Uneasiness and Misery of human Life, especially amongst those of Distinction, arises from nothing in the World else, but too severe a Contemplation of an indefeasible Contexture of our external Parts, or certain natural and invincible Disposition to be fat or lean? When a little more of Mr SPECTATOR's Philosophy would take off all this, and in the mean time let them observe, that there's not one of their Grievances of this Sort, but perhaps in some Ages of the World has been highly in vogue, and may be so again, nay, in some Country or other ten to one is so at this Day. My Lady Ample is the most miserable Woman in the World, purely of her own making. She even grudges her self Meat and Drink, for fear she should thrive by them, and is constantly crying out, In a Quarter of a Year more I shall be quite out of all manner of Shape! Now [the] Lady's Misfortune seems to be only this, that she is planted in a wrong Soil for, go but to other Side of the Water, it's a Jest at Harlem to talk of a Skripe under eighteen Stone. These wise Traders regulate their Beauties as they do their Butter, by the Pound and Miss Cross, when she first arrived in the Low Countries, was not computed to be so handsome as Madam Van Bruskel by near half a Tun. On the other hand, there's Squire Lath, a proper Gentleman of Fifteen hundred Pound per Annum, as well as of an unblameable Life and Conversation yet would not I be the Esquire for half his Estate for if it was as much more, he'd freely part with it all for a pair of Legs to his Mind. Whereas in the Reign of our first King Edward of glorious Memory, nothing more modish than a Brace of your fine taper Supporters and his Majesty without an Inch of Calf, managed Affairs in Peace and War as judiciously as the braves and most politick of his Ancestors and was as terrible to his Neighbours under the Royal Name of Long-shanks, as Cour de Lion to the Saracens before him. If we look further back into History we shall find, that Alexander the Great wore his Head a little over the left Shoulder and then not a Soul stirred out till he had adjusted his Neck-bone, the whole Nobility addressed the Prince and each other obliquely, and all Matters of Importance were concerted and carried on in the Macedonian Court with their Polls on one Side. For about the first Century nothing made more Noise in the World than Roman Noses, and then not a Word of them till they revived again in Eighty eight. Nor is it so very long since Richard the Third set up half the Backs of the Nation, and high Shoulders, as well as high Noses, were the Top of the Fashion. But to come to our selves, Gentlemen, tho' I find by my quinquennial Observations that we shall never get Ladies enough to make a Party in our own Country, yet might we meet with better Success among some of our Allies. And what think you if our Board sat for a Dutch Piece? Truly I am of Opinion, that as odd as we appear in Flesh and Blood, we should be no such strange Things in Metz-

sincerely The Manner of his declining himself gave his Mistress occasion for a very hearty Laughter — Nay, says he, I knew you would Laugh at me, but I'll ask your Father. He did so the Father received his Intelligence with no less Joy than Surprise, and was very glad he had now no Care left but for his Beauty, which he thought he could carry to Market at his Leisure. I do not know any thing that has pleased me so much a great while as this Conquest of my Friend Daphne's. All her Acquaintance congratulate her upon her Charm-Medley, and laugh at that premeditating Murderer her Sister. As it is an Argument of a light Mind, to think the worse of our selves for the Imperfections of our Persons, it is equally below us to value our selves upon the Advantages of them. The Female World seem to be almost incorrigibly gone astray in this Particular for which Reason, I shall recommend the following Extract out of a Friend's Letter to the Profess'd Beauties who are a People almost as unsufferable as the Profess'd Wits.

'Monsieur St. Evremont' has concluded one of his Essays, with affirming that the Last Signs of a Handsome Woman are not so much for the loss of her Life, as of her Beauty. Perhaps this Rail lery is pursued too far, yet it is turn'd upon a very obvious Remark, that Women's strongest Passion is for her own Beauty, and that she values it as her Favourite Distinction. From hence it is that all Arts, which pretend to improve or preserve it, meet with so general a Reception among the Sex. To say nothing of many False Helps, and Contraband Wares of Beauty, which are daily vended in this great Mart, there is not a Maiden Gentlewoman, of a good Family in any County of South-Britain, who has not heard of the Virtues of Mary-Dew, or is unfurnished with some Receipt or other in Favour of her Complexion and I have known a Physician of Learning and Sense, after Eight Years Study in the University, and a Course of Travels into most Countries of Europe, owe the first raising of his Fortunes to a Cosmetick Wash.

This has given me Occasion to consider how so Universal a Disposition in Woman-kind, which springs from a laudable Motive, the Desire of Pleasing, and proceeds upon an Opinion, not altogether groundless, that Nature may be help'd by Art, may be turn'd to their Advantage. And, methinks, it would be an acceptable Service to take them out of the Hands of Quacks and Pretenders, and to prevent their imposing upon themselves, by discovering to them the true Secret and Art of improving Beauty.

In order to this, before I touch upon it directly, it will be necessary to lay down a few Preliminary Maxims,

That no Woman can be Handsome by the Force of Features alone, any more than she can be Witty only by the Help of Speech.

That Pride destroys all Symmetry and Grace, and Affectation is a more terrible Enemy to fine Faces than the Small Pox.

That no Woman is capable of being Beautiful who is not incapable of being Wise.

And, That what would be Odious in a Friend, is Deformity in a Mistress.

From these few Principles, thus laid down, it will be easy to prove, that the true Art of assisting Beauty consists in Lunellishing the whole Person by the proper Ornaments of virtuous and commendable Qualities. By this Help alone it is that those who are the Favourite Work of Nature, or, as Mr. Dryden expresses it, the Force of a Clay of human kind, become animated, and are in a Capacity of exerting their Charms. And those who seem to have been neglected by her, like Models wrought in Earthen, are capable, in a great measure, of finishing what She has left imperfect.

It is, methinks, a low and degrading Idea of that Sex, which was created to refine the Joints, and soften the Cares of Humanity, by the most agreeable Participation, to consider them merely as Objects of Sight. This is abridging them of their natural Extent of Power, to put them upon a Level with their Pictures at Kneller's. How much nobler is the Contemplation of Beauty heighten'd by Virtue, and commanding our Esteem and Love, while it draws our Observation? How faint and spiritless are the Charms of a Coquet, when compar'd with the real Loveliness of Sophronia's Innocence, Piety, good Humour and Truth. Virtues which add a new Softness to her Sex, and even beautify her Beauty. That Agreeableness, which must otherwise have appeared no longer in the modest Virgin, is now preserv'd in the tender Mother, the prudent Friend, and the faithful Wife. Colours, artfully spread upon Cheeks, may entertain the Eye, but not affect the Heart and she, who takes no care to add to the natural Graces of her Person any excellent Qualities, may be allowed still to amuse, as a Picture, but not to triumph as a Beauty.

When Adam is introduced by Milton describing Eve in Paradise, and relating to the Angel the Impressions he felt upon seeing her at her first * Charles de St. Denis, Sieur de St. Evremont, died in 1703, aged 95, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. His military and diplomatic career in France was closed in 1661, when his condemnations of Mazarin, although the Cardinal was then dead, obliged him to fly from the wrath of the French Court to Holland and afterwards to England, where Charles II. granted him a pension of £300 a year. At Charles's death the pension lapsed, and St. Evremont declined the post of cabinet secretary to James II. After the Revolution he had William III. for friend, and when, at last, he was invited back, in his old age, to France, he chose to stay and die among his English friends. In a second volume of 'Miscellany Essays by Monsieur de St. Evremont,' done into English by Mr. Brown (1694), an Essay 'Of the Pleasure that Women take in their Beauty' ends (p. 135) with the thought quoted by Steele.

Order of Persons should think themselves too considerable to be advi'd. That it was not Quality, but Innocence which exempted Men from Reproof. That Vice and Folly ought to be attacked where-ever they could be met with, and especially when they were placed in high and conspicuous Stations of Life. He further added, That my Paper would only serve to aggravate the Pains of Poverty, if it chiefly expos'd those who are already depressed, and in some measure turn'd into Ridicule, by the Meanness of their Conditions and Circumstances. He afterwards proceeded to take Notice of the great Use this Paper might be of to the Publick, by reprehending those Vices which are too trivial for the Chastisement of the Law, and too fantastical for the Cognizance of the Pulpit. He then advis'd me to prosecute my Undertaking with Cheerfulness and assured me, that whoever might be displeased with me, I should be approv'd by all those whose Praises do Honour to the Persons on whom they are bestowed.

The whole Club pays a particular Defiance to the Discourse of this Gentleman, and are drawn into what he says as much by the candid and ingenuous Manner with which he delivers himself, as by the Strength of Argument and Force of Reason which he makes Use of. With this Reason immediately agreed, that what he had said was right, and that for his Part, he would not insist upon the Quarter which he had demand'd for the Ladies. Sir ANDREW gave up the City with the same Frankness. The JOURNAL would not stand out, and was followed by Sir ROGER and the CAPTAIN. Who all agreed that I should be at Liberty to carry the War into that Quarter I pleas'd, provided I continued to combat with Criminals in a Body, and to assault the Vice without hurting the Person.

This Debate, which was held for the Good of Mankind, put me in Mind of that which the Roman Truismate were formerly engag'd in, for their Destruction. Every Man at first stood hard for his Friend, till they found that by this Means they should spoil their Prospection. And at length, making a Sacrifice of all their Acquaintance and Relations, furnished out a very decent Execution.

Having thus taken my Resolutions to march on boldly in the Cause of Virtue and good Sense, and to annoy their Adversaries in whatever Degree or Rank of Men they may be found. I shall be deaf for the future to all the Remonstrances that shall be made to me on this Account. If Punch grow extravagant, I shall reprimand him very freely. If the Stage becomes a Nursery of Folly and Impertinence, I shall not be afraid to animadvert upon it. In short, If I meet with anything in City, Court, or Country, that shocks Modesty or good Manners, I shall use my utmost Endeavours to make an Example of it. I must however intreat every particular Person, who does me the Honour to be a Reader of this Paper, never to think himself, or any one of his Friends or Enemies, aimed at in what is said. For I promise him, never to draw a faulty Character which does not fit at least a Thousand People, or to publish a single Paper, that is not written in the

AMONG all kinds of Writing, there is none in which Authors are more apt to miscarry than in Works of Humour, as there is none in which they are more ambitious to excel. It is not an Imagination that seems with Men to be allied that is filled with extravagant Conceptions, which is capable of furnishing the World with Diversions of this nature, and yet if we look into the Productions of several Writers, who set up for Men of Humour, what a wild irregular Images, what unaccountable Distortions of the Truth, do we meet with! If they speak of Women as they believe they are talking of Men, and when they have drawn for either a Scheme of absurd, monstrous Ideas, they are not able to tell a story to themselves without laughing. The good Gentlemen endeavour to gain their ends the same way of Wit and Humour, by which not only Cat-cous as almost quantify them for London not considering that Honour should always be under the Check of Reason and that it requires the Direction of the most judiciously chosen and the more it is moulded itself in the most boundless freedoms. There is a kind of Nature that is to be observed in this sort of Composition, as well as in all other, and a certain Liberty of Thought (which I must allow to the Writer to be a Man of Sense, as the first time that it appears also, either given up to Caprice. For my part, when I read the delicious Mirth of an unusual Author, I cannot be so barbarous as to divert my self with it, but am rather apt to pity the Man, than to laugh at any thing he writes.

The deceased Mr Stadwell, who had himself a great deal of the Talent, which I am treating of, represents an empty Rake, in one of his Plays, as very much surpris'd to hear one say that breaking of Windows was not Humour. And I ques not but several English Readers will be as much startled to hear me affirm, that many of those raving incoherent Pieces, which are often spread among us, under odd Chimerical Titles, are rather the Offsprings of a Distempered Brain, than Works of Humour.

It is indeed much easier to describe what is not Humour, than what is, and very difficult to define it otherwise than as Coxley has done Wu, by Negatives. Were I to give my own Notions of it, I would deliver them after Plato's manner, in a kind of Allegory, and by supposing Humour to be a Person, deduce to him all his Qualifications, re-

'in the said Speculation, We, the chief Actors of this Playhouse, met and sat upon the said Design. It is with great Delight that We expect the Execution of this Work and in order to contribute to it, We have given Warning to all our Ghosts to get their Livelihoods where they can, and not to appear among us after Dry break of the 16th Instant. We are resolved to take this Opportunity to part with every thing which does not contribute to the Representation of humane Life and shall make a free Gift of all unimpaired Utensils to your Projector. The Hangings, you formerly mentioned are run away as are likewise a Set of Chairs, each of which was met upon two Legs going through the Rose Tavern at two this Morning. We hope Sir, you will give proper Notice to the Town that we are endeavouring at these Regulations, and that we intend for the future to show no Minstrels, but Men who are converted into such by their own Industry and Affectation. If you will please to be at the House to night, you will see me do my Endeavour to show some unnatural Appearances which are in vogue among the Polite and Well bred. I am to represent, in the Character of a fine Lady Dancing, all the Distortions which are frequently taken for Graces in Men and Gesture. This, Sir, is a Specimen of the Method we shall take to expose the Monsters which come within the Notice of a regular Theatre, and we desire nothing more gross may be admitted by you Spectator, for the future. We have crushed three Comrings of Theatrical Guards, and design our Kings shall for the future make Love and sit in Council without an Army and wait only your Direction, whether you will have them reinforce King Porus or join the Troops of Macedon. Mr Penkethman resolves to consult his Pantheon of Heathen Gods in Opposition to the Oracle of Delphos, and doubts not but he shall turn the Fortunes of Porus when he personates him. I am desirous by the Company to inform you, that they submit to your Censures and shall have you in greater Veneration than Hercules was in of old, if you can drive Monsters from the Theatre and think your Merit will be as much greater than his, as to convince is more than to conquer.

I am,

Sir,

Your most obedient Servant,

SIR,

'When I acquaint you with the great and unexpected Vicissitudes of my Fortune, I doubt not but I shall obtain your Pity and Favour. I have for many Years last past been Thunderer to the Playhouse and have not only made as much Noise out of the Clouds as my Predecessor of mine in the Theatre that ever bore that Character, but also have descended and spoke on the Stage as the bold Thunder in The Relicarsal. When they got me down thus low, they thought

'fit to degrade me further, and make me a Ghost. I was contented with this for these two last Winters but they carry their Tyranny still further, and not satisfied that I am banished from above Ground, they have given me to understand that I am wholly to depart their Dominions, and taken from me even my subterraneous Employment. Now, Sir, what I desire of you is, that if your Undertaker thinks fit to use Fire-Arms, as other Authors have done in the Time of Heliander, I may be a Cannon against Porns, or else provide for me in the Burning of Persopolis, or what other Method you shall think fit.

The caricature here, and in following lines, is of a passage in Sir Robert Stapylton's Slighted Maid. I am the Evening, dark is Night, &c.

In the Spectator's time the Relicarsal was an acted play, in which Penkethman had the part of the gentleman Usher, and Bullock was one of the two Kings of Brentford. Thunder was Johnson, who played also the Grave-digger in Hamlet and other reputable parts.

William Bullock was a good and popular comedian, whom some preferred to Penkethman, because he spoke no more than was set down for him, and did not overact his part. He was now with Penkethman, now with Collier and others, joint-manager of a theatrical booth at Bartholomew Fair. When this essay was written Bullock and Penkethman were acting together in a play called Myself Love, produced at Drury Lane on the 7th of April, Bullock as 'Sir Bookish Outside', Penkethman as 'Tippie', a Servant. Penkethman, Bullock and Dogget were in those days Macbeth's three witches. Bullock had a son on the stage capable of courtly parts, who really had played Hephestion in The Rival Queens, in a theatre opened by Penkethman at Greenwich in the preceding summer.

Cassandra and Cleopatra were romances from the French of Grutier de Costes, Seigneur de La Calprenède, who died in 1663. He published Cassandra in 10 volumes in 1642, Cleopatra in 12 volumes in 1656, besides other romances. The custom was to publish these romances 2 volume at a time. A pretty and rich widow smitten with the Cleopatra while it was appearing, married La Calprenède upon condition that he finished it, and his promise to do so was formally inserted in the marriage contract. The English translations of these French Romances were always in folio. Cassandra, translated by Sir Charles Cotterell, was published in 1652. Cleopatra in 1663, translated by Robert Loveday. Astraea was a pastoral Romance of the days of Henri IV by Honoré D'Urfé, which had been translated by John Pyper in 1620, and was again translated by a 'Person of Quality' in 1647. It was of the same school as Sir Philip Sydney's Arcadia, first published after his death by his sister Mary, Countess of Pembroke, in 1590, and from her, for whom, indeed, it had been written, called the Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia.

Sir Isaac Newton was living in the Spectator's time. He died in 1727, aged 85. John Locke had died in 1704. His Essay on the Human Understanding was first published in 1690. Sir William Temple had died in 1699, aged 71.

The Grand Cyrus, by Madeleine de Scudéry, was the most famous of the French Romances of its day. The authoress, who died in 1701, aged 94, was called the Sappho of her time. Cardinal Mazarin left her a pension by his will, and she had a pension of two thousand livres from the king. Her Grand Cyrus, published in 10 volumes in 1650, was translated (in one volume, folio) in 1653. Clelia, presently afterwards included in the list of Leconte's books, was another very popular romance by the same authoress, published in 10 volumes, a few years later, immediately translated in English by John Davies, and printed in the usual folio form.

Dr William Sherlock, who after some scruple about taking the oath to King William, did so, and was made Dean of St Paul's, published his very popular Practical Discourse concerning Death, in 1687. He died in 1707.

Other Nicolas Malbranche, in the Spectator's time, was living in enjoyment of his reputation as one of the best French writers and philosophers. The foundations of his fame had been laid by his Recherches de la Vérité, of which the first volume appeared in 1673. An English translation of it, by Thomas Taylor, was published (in folio) in 1694. He died in 1715, aged 77.

Thomas D'Urfé was a licentious writer of plays and songs, whose tunes Charles II would hum as he leant on their writer's shoulder. His 'New Poems, with Songs' appeared in 1690. He died in 1723, aged 95.

I was taking a Catalogue in my Pocket Book of these, and several other Authors, when Leopora entered, and upon my presenting her with the Letter from the Knight, told me, with an unspeakable Grace, that she hoped Sir ROGER was in good Health. I answered Yes, for I hate long Speeches, and after a Bow or two retired.

Roger Manley, governor of Guernsey. She began her career as the victim of a false marriage, deserted and left to support herself, became a busy writer and a woman of intrigue, who was living in the Spectator's time, and died in 1724, in the house of Alderman Barber, with whom she was then living. Her New Atlantis, published in 1709, was entitled 'Secret Memoirs, and Manners of several Persons of Quality of both sexes, from the New Atlantis, an Island in the Mediterranean.' Under feigned names it especially attacked members of Whig families, and led to proceedings for libel.

La Ferte was a dancing master of the days of the Spectator, who in Nos. 52 and 54 advertised his School 'in Compton Street, Soho, over against St Ann's Church Back-door,' adding that, 'at the desire of several gentlemen in the City, he taught dancing on Tuesdays and Thursdays in the neighbourhood of the Royal Exchange.'

Pleasure. And such a Pleasure is which one meets with in the Representation of a well-written Tragedy. Divisions of this kind weer out of our Thoughts every thing that is mean and little. They cherish and cultivate that Humanity which is the Ornament of our Nature. They soften Insolence, sooth Affliction, and subline the Mind to the Dispensations of Providence.

It is no Wonder therefore that in all the polite Nations of the World, this part of the Drama has met with publick Encouragement.

The modern Tragedy exceeds that of Greece and Rome, in the Intricacy and Disposition of the Fable; but, what a Christ an Writer would be ashamed to own, falls infinitely short of it in the Moral Part of the Performance.

This I may shew more at large hereafter and in the mean time that I may contribute something towards the Improvement of the English Tragedy, I shall take notice, in this and in other following Papers, of some particular Parts in it that seem liable to Exception.

Aristotle<sup>3</sup> observes, that the Iambick Verse in the Greek Tongue was the most proper for Tragedy. Because at the same time that it lifted up the Discourse from Prose, it was that which approached nearer to it than any other kind of Verse. For, say he, we may observe that Men in Ordinary Discourse very often speak Iambicks, without taking notice of it. We may make the same Observation of our English Blank Verse, which often enters into our Common Discourse, though we do not attend to it, and is such a due Medium between Rhyme and Prose, that it seems wonderfully adapted to Tragedy. I am therefore very much offended when I see a Play in Rhyme, which is absurd in English, as a Tragedy of Hexameters would have been in Greek or Latin. The Solecism is, I think, still greater, in those Plays that have some Scenes in Rhyme and some in Blank Verse, which are to be looked upon as two several Languages; or where we see some particular Similes dignified with Rhyme, at the same time that every thing about them lies in Blank Verse. I would not however debar the Poet from concluding his Tragedy, or, if he pleases, every Act of it, with two or three Coupletts, which may have the same Effect as an Air in the Italian Opera after a long Recitativo, and give the Actor a graceful Exit. Besides that we see a Diversity of Numbers in some Parts of the Old Tragedy, in order to hinder the Ear from being tired with the same continued Modulation of Voice. For the same Reason I do not dislike the Speeches in our English Tragedy that close with an Hexameter, or half Verse, notwithstanding the Person who speaks after it begins a new Verse, without filling up the preceding one. Nor with abrupt Pauses and Breakings off in the middle of a Verse, when they humour any Passion that is expressed by it.

Since I am upon this Subject, I must observe that our English Poets have succeeded much better in the Style, than in the Sentiments of their Tragedies. Their Language is very often Noble and Sonorous, but the Sense either very trifling or very common. On the contrary, in the Ancient Tragedies, and indeed in those of Cornelle and Racine<sup>1</sup> tho' the Expressions are very great it is the Thought that bears them up and supports them. For my own part, I prefer a noble Sentiment that is depressed with homely Language infinitely before a vulgar one that is blown up with all the Sound and Energy of Expression. Whether this Defect in our Tragedies may arise from Want of Genius, Knowledge, or Experience, in the Writers, or from their Compliance with the vicious Taste of their Readers, who are better Judges of the Language than of the Sentiments, and consequently relish the one more than the other, I cannot determine. But I believe it might rectify the Conduct both of the one and of the other, if the Writer laid down the whole Contexture of his Dialogue in plain English, before he turned it into Blank Verse; and if the Reader, after the Perusal of a Scene, would consider the naked Thought of every Speech in it, when divested of all its Tragick Ornaments. By this means, without being imposed upon by Words, we may judge impartially of the Thought, and consider whether it be natural or great enough for the Person that utters it, whether it deserves to shine in such a Blaze of Eloquence, or shew itself in such a Variety of Lights as are generally made use of by the Writers of our English Tragedy.

I must in the next place observe, that when our Thoughts are great and just, they are often obscured by the sounding Phrases, hard Metaphors, and forced Expressions in which they are clothed. Shakespear is often very faulty in this Particular. There is a fine Observation in Aristotle to this purpose, which I have never seen quoted. The Expression, says he, ought to be very much laboured in the unpoetical Parts of the Fable, as in Descriptions, Similitudes, Narrations, and the like in which the Opinions, Manners and Passions of Men are not represented for these (namely the Opinions, Manners and Passions) are apt to be obscured by Pompous Phrases, and Elaborate Expressions.<sup>2</sup> Horace, who copied most of his Criticisms after Aristotle, seems to have had his Eye on the foregoing Rule in the following Verses

So also Minutius Felix, Adversus Gentes. 'Quam pulchrum spectaculum Deo, cum Christianus cum dolore congregitur? cum adversus miras, et supplicia, et tormenta componitur? cum libertatem cum adversus reges ac Principes erigit.' Among our Modern English Poets, there is none who was better turned for Tragedy than Lee<sup>1</sup> if instead of favouring the Impetuosity of his Genius, he had restrained it, and kept it within its proper Bounds His Thoughts are wonderfully suited to Tragedy, but frequently lost in such a Cloud of Words, that it is hard to see the Beauty of them There is an infinite Fire in his Works, but so involved in Smoak, that it does not appear in half its Lustre He frequently succeeds in the Passionate Parts of the Tragedy, but more particularly where he slackens his Efforts, and eases the Style of those Epithets and Metaphors, in which he so much abounds What can be more Natural, more Soft, or more Passionate, than that Line in Statira's Speech, where she describes the Charms of Alexander's Conversation?

Then he would talk Good Gods! how he would talk!

That unexpected Break in the Line, and turning the Description of his Manner of Talking into an Admiration of it, is inexpressibly Beautiful, and wonderfully suited to the fond Character of the Person that speaks it. There is a Simplicity in the Words, that outshines the utmost Pride of Expression.

Ottway<sup>2</sup> has followed Nature in the Language of his Tragedy, and therefore shines in the Passionate Parts, more than any of our English Poets As there is something Familiar and

Domestick in the Fable of his Tragedy, more than in those of any other Poet, he has little Pomp but great Force in his Expressions For which Reason, though he has admirably succeeded in the tender and melting Part of his Tragedies, he sometimes falls into too great a Familiarity of Phrase in those Parts, which, by Aristotle's Rule, ought to have been raised and supported by the Dignity of Expression

It has been observed by others, that this Poet has founded his Tragedy of Venice Preserved on so wrong a Plot, that the greatest Characters in it are those of Rebels and Traitors Had the Hero of his Play discovered the same good Qualities in the Defence of his Country, that he showed for its Ruin and Subversion, the Audience could not enough pity and admire him But as he is now represented, we can only say of him what the Roman Historian says of Catiline, that his Fall would have been Glorious (si pro Patriâ sic concidisset) had he so fallen in the Service of his Country C

THE English Writers of Tragedy are possessed with a Notion, that when they represent a virtuous or innocent Person in Distress, they ought not to leave him till they have delivered him out of his Troubles, or made him triumph over his Enemies This Error they have been led into by a ridiculous Doctrine in modern Criticism, that they are obliged to an equal Distribution of Rewards and Punishments, and an impartial Execution of poetical Justice Who were the first that established this Rule I know not but I am sure it has no Foundation in Nature, in Reason, or in the Practice of the Ancients We find that Good and Evil happen alike to all Men on this side the Grave and as the principal Design of Tragedy is to raise Commiseration and Terror in the Minds of the Audience, we shall defeat this great End, if we always make Virtue and Innocence happy and successful Whatever Crosses and Disappointments a good Man suffers in the Body of the Tragedy, they will make but small Impression on our Minds, when we know that in the last Act he is to arrive at the End of his Wishes and Desires When we see him engaged in the Depth of his Afflictions, we are apt to comfort our selves, because we are sure he will find his Way out of them and that his Grief, how great soever it may be at present, will soon terminate in Gladness For this Reason the ancient Writers of Tragedy treated Men in their Plays, as they are dealt with in the World, by making Virtue sometimes happy and sometimes miservable, as they found it in the Fable which they made choice of, or as it might affect their Audience in the most agreeable Manner. Aristotle considers the Tragedies that were written in either of these Kinds, and observes, That those which ended unhappily had always pleased the People, and carried away the Prize in the public Disputes of the Stage from those that ended happily. Temper and Commodities leave a pleasant Argus in the Mind, and fix the Attention in a serious Composition of Thought, as is much more lasting and delightful than any little transient State of Joy and Satisfaction. Accordingly, we find, that more of our English Tragedies have succeeded in which the Favourers of the Audience sink under their Calamities, than those in which they recover themselves out of them. The best Plays of this Kind are Tristram Shandy, Lucius Junius Brutus, Alexander the Great, Samson, Alfred, Henry the Sixth, Othello, &c. King Lear is an admirable Tragedy of the same Kind, as Asper is another. But as it is reformed according to the chimerical Notion of Poetical Justice, in my humble Opinion it has lost half its Beauty. At the same time I must allow, that there are very noble Tragedies which have been framed upon the other Plan and have ended happily, as indeed most of the good Tragedies, which have been written since the starting of the above-mentioned Criticism, have taken this Turn. The Merchant of Venice, Pericles, Ulysses, Philostratus, and Hippolytus, with most of Mr. Dryden's. I must also allow, that many of Shakespeare's and several of the celebrated Tragedies of Antiquity, are in the same Form. I do not therefore dispute against the Way of writing Tragedies; but against the Criticism that would establish this as the only Method, and by that Means would very much curtail the English Tragedy, and perhaps give a wrong Bent to the Genius of our Writers.

The Tragicomedy, which is the Product of the English Theatre, is one of the most monstrous Inventions that ever entered into a Poet's Thoughts. An Author might as well think of weaving the Adventures of Astias and Hudibras into a Poem, as of writing such a motley Piece of Mirth and Sorrow; but the Absurdity of these Performances is so very visible, that I shall not insist upon it.

The same Objections which are made to Tragicomedy, may in some Measure be applied to all Tragedies that have a double Plot in them, which are likewise more frequent upon the English Stage than upon any other. For though the Grief of the Audience, in such Performances, be not changed into another Passion, as in Tragicomedies it is diverted upon another Object, which weakens their Concern for the principal Action, and hinders the Tide of Sorrow, by throwing it into different Channels. This Inconvenience, however, may in a great Measure be cured, if not wholly removed by the skilful Choice of an Under-Plot, which may bear such a near Relation to the principal Design, as to contribute towards the Completion of it, and be concluded by the same Catastrophe.

There is also another Particular, which may be reckoned among the Pleurishes, or rather the false Beauties, of our English Tragedy. I mean those particular Speeches which are commonly known by the Name of Rants. The warm and passionate Parts of a Tragedy, are always the most taking with the Audience, for which Reason we often see the Players pronouncing, in all the Violence of Action, several Parts of the Tragedy which the Author wrote with great Temper, and designed that they should have been so acted. I have seen Powell very often raise himself a loud Clap by this Artifice. The Poets that were acquainted with this Secret, have given frequent Occasion for such Faintness in the Actor, by adding Vehemence to Words where there was no Passion, or inflaming a real Passion into Rustian. It hath filled the Mouths of our Heroes with Bombast and given them such Sentiments, as proceed rather from a Swelling than a Greatness of Mind. Unnatural Exclamations, Curses, Vows, Blasphemies, a Defiance of Mankind, and an Outraging of the Gods, frequently pass upon the Audience for towering Thoughts, and have accordingly met with much Applause.

I shall here add a Remark, which I am afraid our Tragic Writers may make an ill use of. As our Heroes are generally Lovers, their Swelling and Plurting upon the Stage very much recommends them to the fair Part of their Audience. The Ladies are wonderfully pleased to see a Man insulting Kings, or affronting the Gods, in one Scene, and throwing himself at the Feet of his Mistress in a next. Let him behave himself insolently towards the Men, and affectly towards the Fair One, and it is ten to one but he proves a favourite of the Foxes. Dryden and Lee, in several of their Tragedies, have practised this Secret with good Success.

But to shew how a Rant pleases beyond the most just and natural Thought that is not pronounced with Vehemence, I would desire the Reader, when he sees the Tragedy of Oedipus, to observe how Colley Cibber the Hero is dismissed at the End of the third Act, after having pronounced the

<sup>2</sup> Of the two plays in this list besides Othello, which have not been mentioned in the preceding notes, All for Love produced in 1678, was Dryden's Antony and Cleopatra, Orlando, first acted in 1691 was a tragedy by Thomas Southerne, which included comic scenes. Southerne, who held a commission in the army, was living in the Spectator's time and died in 1746, aged 86. It was in his best play, Isabel, or the Part Marriage, that Mrs. Siddons, in 1782, made her first appearance on the London stage.

ARISTOILE<sup>s</sup> has observed, That ordinary Writers in Tragedy endeavour to rouse Terror and Pity in their Audience, not by proper Sentiments and Expressions, but by the Dresses and Decorations of the Stage. There is something of this kind very ridiculous in the English Theatre. When the Author has a mind to terrify us, it thunders. When he would make us melancholy, the Stage is darkened. But among all our Tragick Artifices, I am the most offended at those which are made use of to inspire us with magnificent Ideas of the Persons that speak. The ordinary Method of making an Hero is to clap a huge Plume of Feathers upon his Head, which rises so very high, that there is often a greater Length from his Chin to the Top of his Head, than to the sole of his Foot. One would believe, that we thought a great Man and a tall Man the same thing. This very much embarrasses the Actor, who is forced to hold his Neck extremely stiff and steady all the while he speaks: and notwithstanding any Anxieties which he pretends for his Mistress, his Country, or his Friends, one may see by his Action, that his greatest Care and Concern is to keep the Plume of Feathers from falling off his Head. For my own part, when I see a Man uttering his Complaints under such a Mountain of Feathers, I am apt to look upon him rather as an unfortunate Lunatick, than a distressed Hero. As these superfluous Ornaments upon the Head make a great Man, a Princess generally receives her Grandeur from those additional Incumbrances that fall into her Tail. I mean the broad sweeping Train that follows her in all her Motions and finds constant Employment for a Boy who stands behind her to open and spread it to Advantage. I do not know how others are affected at this Sight, but, I must confess, my Eyes are wholly taken up with the Page's Part: and as for the Queen, I am not so attentive to any thing she speaks, as to the right adjustring of her Train, lest it should chance to trip up her Heels, or incommode her as she walks to and fro upon the Stage. It is, in my Opinion, a very odd Spectacle, to see a Queen venting her Passion in a disordered Motion, and a little Boy taking care all the while that they do not ruffle the Tail of her Gown. The Parts that the two Persons act on the Stage at the same Time are very different. The Princess is afraid lest she should incur the Displeasure of the King her Father, or lose the Hero her Lover, whilst her Attendant is only concerned lest she should entangle her Feet in her Petticoat.

We are told, That an ancient Tragick Poet, to move the Pity of his Audience for his exiled Kings and distressed Heroes, used to make the Actors represent them in Dresses and Cloaths that were thread-bare and decayed. Thus Artifice for moving Pity, seems as ill contrived, as that we have been speaking of to inspire us with a great Idea of the Persons introduced upon the Stage. In short, I would have our Conceptions raised by the Dignity of Thought and Sublimity of Expression, rather than by a Train of Robes or a Plume of Feathers.

Another mechanical Method of making great Men, and adding Dignity to Kings and Queens, is to accompany them with Halberds and Battle-axes. Two or three Shifters of Scenes, with the two Candle snuffers, make up a complete Body of Guards upon the English Stage, and by the Addition of a few Porters dressed in Red Coats, can represent above a Dozen Legions. I have sometimes seen a Couple of Armies drawn up together upon the Stage, when the Poet has been disposed to do Honour to his Generals. It is impossible for the Reader's Imagination to multiply twenty Men into such prodigious numbers, or to fancy that two or three hundred Soldiers are fighting in a Room or Yards in Compass. Incidents of this kind should be told, not represented.

Digna geri promes in scenam, multi Ex oculis, quæ mox narret facundia.

Yet there are things improper for a Sc
Which Men of Judgment only will relate

I should therefore, in this Particular, reco to my Countrymen the Example of the Stage, where the Kings and Queens appear unattended, and leave their Guards behind the Scenes. I should likewise be glad to see the French in banishing from our Stage the Noise of Drums, Trumpets, and Huzzas which is sometimes so very great, that when there is a Battle in the Hay Market Theatre, one may hear it as far as Charing Cross.

I have here only touched upon those Particulars which are made use of to rouse and aggrandize Passions in Tragedy: and shall shew in another Paper the several Expedients which are practised by Authors of a vulgar Genius to move Terror, Pity, or Admiration, in their Hearers.

The Tailor and the Painter often contribute to the Success of a Tragedy more than the Poet. Scenes affect ordinary Minds as much as Speeches: and our Actors are very sensible, that a well-dressed Play has sometimes brought them as full Audiences, as a well written one. The Italians have a very good Phrase to express this Art of imposing upon the Spectators by Apparences. They call it the Faustoria della Scena, The Knavery or trickish Part of the Drama. But however the Show and Outside of the Tragedy may work upon the Vulgar, the more understanding Part of the Audience immediately see through it and detect it.

'against our Goodwill and Liking, and, for all Monsieur Palmquist,<sup>1</sup> a most dangerous Innovation and we are by no means yet sure, that some People are not at the Bottom on't. At least, my own private Letters leave room for a Politician well versed in matters of this Nature, to suspect as much, as a penetrating Friend of mine tells me

We indeed could not imagine any Occasion for it, we guessed not a little on't beforehand, we were in nothing of the Secret and that City Tradesmen, or their Apprentices, should do Duty or work, during the Holidays, we thought absolutely impossible. But Dyer being positive in it, and some Letters

You may observe the Turn of their Minds tends only to Novelty, and not Satisfaction in any thing. It would be Disappointment to them, to come to Certainty in any thing, for that would grieve them, and put an end to their Enquiries, which dull Fellows do not make for Information, but for Exercise. I do not know but this may be a very good way of accounting for what we frequently see, to wit, that dull Fellows prove very good Men of Business. Business relieves them from their own natural Heaviness, by furnishing them with what to do: whereas Business to Mercurial Men, is an Interruption from their real Existence and Happiness. Tho the dull Part of Mankind are harmless in their Amusements, it were to be wished they had no vacant Time, because they usually undertake something that makes their Wants conspicuous, by their manner of supplying them. You shall seldom find a dull Fellow of good Education, but (if he happens to have any Leisure upon his Hands,) will turn his Head to one of those two Amusements, for all Tools of Eminence, Politics or Poetry. The former of these Arts, is the Study of all dull People in general: but when Dullness is lodged in a Person of a quiet Animal Life, it generally exerts it self in Poetry. One might here mention a few Military Writers, who give great Entertainment to the Age, by reason that the Stupidity of their Heads is quickened by the Alacrity of their Hearts. This Constitution in a dull Fellow, gives Vigour to Nonsense, and makes the Puddle boil, which would otherwise stagnate. The British Prince, that Celebrated Poem, which was written in the Reign of King Charles the Second, and deservedly called by the Wits of that Age Incomparable,<sup>2</sup> was the Effect of such a happy Genius as we are speaking of. From among

fuge at Bender in Bessarabia with the Turks, Mr Froth's Infidels

<sup>3</sup> After Pultowa Frederick IV of Denmark, Augustus II of Poland and Czar Peter, formed an alliance against Sweden and in the course of 1710 the Emperor of Germany, Great Britain, and the States General concluded two treaties, guaranteeing the neutrality of all the States of the Empire. This suggests to Mr Froth and his friends the idea that there is a 'Neutrality Army' operating somewhere.

<sup>4</sup> Dyer was a Jacobite printer, whose News-letter was twice in trouble for 'misrepresenting the proceedings of the House,' and who, in 1703, had given occasion for a proclamation against printing and spreading false news.

<sup>2</sup> 'The British Prince, an Heroick Poem,' by the Hon. Edward Howard, was published in 1669. The author produced also five plays, and a volume of Poems and Essays, with a Paraphrase on Cicero's Tullius in Heroic Verse. The Earls of Rochester and Dorset devoted some verses to jest both on The British Prince and on Edward Howard's Plays. Even Dr Spratt had his rhymed joke with the rest, in lines to a Person of Honour upon his Incomparable, Incomprehensible Poem, intitled The 'British Prince'. Edward Howard did not print the nonsense here ascribed to him. It was a burlesque of his lines

'A vest as admir'd Vortiger had on,
'Which from this Island's Joes his Grand sire wore

many other Disticks, no less to be quoted on this Account, I cannot, but recite the two following I met

*A haunted Vest Prince Voltrager had on,
Which from a Naked Pict his Grandsire won*

Here if the Poet had not been Vivacious, as well as Stupid, he could [not,] in the Warmth and Hurry of Nonsense, [have] been capable of forgetting that neither Prince Voltrager, nor his Grandfather, could strip a Naked Man of his Doublet, but a Fool of a colder Constitution, would have stud to have I let'd the Pul, and made Buff of his Skin, for the Wearing of the Conqueror

To bring these Observations to some useful Purpose of Use, what I would propose should be, that we imitated those wise Nations, wherein every Man learns some Handy-craft Work. Would it not employ a Man prettily enough, if instead of eternally prying with a Snuff-box, he spent some part of his Time in mending one? Such a Method as this, would very much conduce to the Publick Emolument, by making every Man living good for something for there would then be no one Member of Human Society, but who sh'd have some little Pretension for some Degree in it like him who came to Wills Coffee-house, upon the Merit of having writ a Poise of a Ring

AMONG the several Artifices which are put in Practice by the Poets to fill the Minds of [an]<sup>d</sup> Audience with Terror, the first Place is due to Thunder and Lightning, which are often made use of at the Descending of a God, or the Rising of a Ghost at the Vanishing of a Devil, or at the Death of a Tyrant I have known a Bell introduced into several Tragedies with good Effect and have seen the whole Assembly in a very great Alarm till the while it has been ringing But there is nothing which delights and terrifies our English Heart so much as a Ghost, especially when he appears in a bloody Shirt A Spectre has very often saved a Play, though he has done nothing but stalked across the Stage, or rose through a Cleft of it, and sunk again without speaking one Word There may be a proper Season for these several Terrors and when they only come in as Aids and Assistances to the Poet they are not only to be excused, but to be applauded Thus the sound of the Clock in  Venice Preserved,<sup>2</sup> strikes the Hearts of the whole Audience quiet and conveys a stronger Terror to the Mind than it is possible for Words to do The Appearance of the Ghost in Hamlet is a Master-piece in its kind, and wrought up with all the Circumstances

I do not therefore find Fault with the Artifices above-mentioned when they are introduced with Skill, and accompanied by proportionable Sentiments and Expressions in the Writing

For the moving of Pity, our principal Machine is the Handkerchief and indeed in our common Tragedies, we should not know very often that the Persons are in Distress by any thing they say, if they did not from time to time apply their Handkerchiefs to their Eyes Iar he it from me to think of blushing this Instrument of Sorrow from the Stage I know a Tragedy could not subsist without it All that I would contend for, is, to keep it from being misapplied In a Word, I would have the Actor's Tongue sympathize with his Eyes

A disconsolate Mother, with a Child in her Hand, has frequently drawn Compassion from the Audience, and has therefore gained a place in several Tragedies A Modern Writer, that observed how this had took in other Plays, being resolved to double the Distress, and melt his Audience twice as much as those before him had done, brought a Princess upon the Stage with a little Boy in one Hand and a Girl in the other This too had a very good Effect A third Poet, being resolved to out write all his Predecessors, a few Years ago introduced three Children, with great Success And as I am informed, a young Gentleman, who is fully determined to break the most obdurate Hearts, has a Tragedy by him, where the first Person that appears upon the Stage, is an afflicted Widow in her mourning Weeds, with half a Dozen fatherless Children attending her, like those that usually hang about the Figure of Charity Thus several Incidents that are beautiful in a good Writer, become ridiculous by falling into the Hands of a bad one

But among all our Methods of moving Pity or Terror, there is none so absurd and barbarous, and what more exposes us to the Contempt and Ridicule of our Neighbours, than that dreadful butchering of one another, which is so very frequent upon the English Stage. To delight in seeing Men stabbed, poisoned, racked, or impaled, is certainly the Sign of a cruel Temper. And as this is often practised before the British Audience, several French Critics, who think these are grateful Spectacles to us, take occasion from them to represent us as a People that delight in Blood.<sup>1</sup> It is indeed very odd, to see our Stage strowed with Carcasses in the last Scene of a Tragedy, and to observe in the Ward robe of a Play-house several Daggers, Poniards, Wheels, Bowls for Poison, and many other Instruments of Death. Murders and Executions are always transacted behind the Scenes in the French Theatre, which in general is very agreeable to the Manners of a polite and civilized People. But as there are no Exceptions to this Rule on the French Stage, it leads them into Absurdities almost as ridiculous as that which falls under our present Censure. I remember in the famous Play of Cornelle, written upon the Subject of the Horatii and Curatii the fierce young Hero who had overcome the Curatii one after another, (instead of being congratulated by his Sister for his Victory, being upbraided by her for having slain her Lover,) in the Height of his Passion and Resentment kills her. If any thing could extenuate so brutal an Action, it would be the doing of it on a sudden, before the Sentiments of Nature, Reason, or Manhood could take Place in him. However, to avoid publick Blood-shed, as soon as his Passion is wrought to its Height, he follows his Sister the whole length of the Stage, and forbears killing her till they are both withdrawn behind the Scenes. I must confess, had he murdered her before the Audience, the Indecency might have been greater: but as it is, it appears very unnatural, and looks like killing in cold Blood. To give my Opinion upon this Case the Fact ought not to have been represented, but to have been told, if there was any Occasion for it.

It may not be unacceptable to the Reader, to see how Sophocles has conducted a Tragedy under the like delicate Circumstances. Orestes was in the same Condition with Hamlet in Shakespeare, his Mother having murdered his Father, and taken possession of his Kingdom in Conspiracy with her Adulterer. That young Prince therefore, being determined to revenge his Father's Death upon those who filled his Throne, conveys himself by a beautiful Stratagem into his Mother's Apartment with a Resolution to kill her. But because such a Spectacle would have been too shocking to the Audience, this dreadful Resolution is executed behind the Scenes. The Mother is heard calling out to her Son for Mercy: and the Son answering her, that she shewed no Mercy to his Father, after which she shrieks out that she is wounded, and by what follows we find that she is slain. I do not remember that in any of our Plays there are Speeches made behind the Scenes, though there are other Instances of this Nature to be met with in those of the Ancients. And I believe my Reader will agree with me, that there is something infinitely more affecting in this dreadful Dialogue between the Mother and her Son behind the Scenes, than could have been in any thing transacted before the Audience. Orestes immediately after meets the Usurper at the Entrance of his Palace: and by a very happy Thought of the Poet avoids killing him before the Audience, by telling him that he should live some Time in his present Bitterness of Soul before he would dispatch him: and [by] ordering him to retire into that Part of the Palace where he had slain his Father, whose Murder he would revenge in the very same Place where it was committed. By this means the Poet observes that Decency, which Horace afterwards established by a Rule, of forbearing to commit Parricides or unnatural Murders before the Audience.

Nec coram populo natos Medea trucidet

*Let not Medea draw her murthering Knife,
And spill her Children's Blood upon the Stage*

The French have therefore refin'd too much upon Horace's Rule, who never designed to banish all Kinds of Death from the Stage, but only such as had too much Horror in them, and which would have a better Effect upon the Audience when transacted behind the Scenes. I would therefore recommend to my Countrymen the Practice of the ancient Poets, who were very sparing of their publick Executions, and rather chose to perform them behind the Scenes, if it could be done with as great an Effect upon the Audience. At the same time I must observe, that though the devoted Persons of the Tragedy were seldom slain before the Audience, which has generally something ridiculous in it, their Bodies were often produced after their Death, which has always in it something melancholy or terrifying, so that the killing on the Stage does not seem to have been avoided only as an Indecency, but also as an Improbability.

*Nec pueros coram populo Medea trucidet,
Aut humana palam coquat exta nefarius Atræus,
Aut in avem Progne vertatur, Cadmus in anguem,*

<sup>1</sup> Thus René Rapin, — whom Dryden declared alone sufficient, were all other critics lost, to teach anew the rules of writing, — said in his 'Reflections on Aristotle's Treatise of Poetry,' translated by Rymer in 1694, 'The English, our Neighbours, love Blood in their Sports, by the quality of their Temperament. These are Insulars, separated from the rest of men, we are more humane. The English have more of Genius for Tragedy than other People, as well by the Spirit of their Nation, which delights in Cruelty, as also by the Character of their Language, which is proper for Great Expressions.'

I have now gone through the several Dramatick Inventions which are made use of by [the] Ignorant Poets to supply the Place of Tragedy, and by [the] Skillful to improve it, some of which I could wish entirely rejected, and the rest to be used with Caution. It would be an endless Task to consider Comedy in the same Light, and to mention the innumerable Shifts that small Wits put in practice to raise a Laugh. Bullock in a short Coat, and Norris in a long one seldom fail of this Effect.<sup>2</sup> In ordinary Comedies, a broad and a narrow brim'd Hat are different Characters. Sometimes the Wit of the Scene lies in a Shoulder-belt and Sometimes in a Pair of Whiskers. A Love running about the Stage, with his Head peeping out of a Barrel was thought a very good Jest in King Charles the Second's time and in a Comedy by one of the first Wits of that Age.<sup>3</sup> But because Ridicule is not so delicate as Compassion, and [because]<sup>4</sup> the Objects that make us laugh are infinitely more numerous than those that make us weep, there is a much greater Latitude for comick than tragick Artifices, and by Consequence a much greater Indulgence to be allowed them.

<sup>6</sup> At this date the news would just have reached England of the death of the Emperor Joseph and accession of Archduke Charles to the German crown. The Archduke's claim to the crown of Spain had been supported as that of a younger brother of the House of Austria, in whose person the two crowns of Germany and Spain were not likely to be united. When, therefore, Charles became head of the German empire, the war of the Spanish succession changed its aspect altogether, and the English looked for peace. That same time I am very apprehensive of many ill Consequences that may attend it. I do not mean in regard to our Politics, but to our Manners. What an Inundation of Ribbons and Brocades will break in upon us? What Peals of Laughter and Impertinence shall we be exposed to? For the Prevention of these great Evils, I could heartily wish that there was an Act of Parliament for Prohibiting the Importation of French Fopperies.

The Female Inhabitants of our Island have already received very strong Impressions from this ludicrous Nation, tho' by the Length of the War (as there is no Evil which has not some Good attending it) they are pretty well worn out and forgotten. I remember the time when some of our well bred Country Women kept their Valet de Chambre, because, forsooth, a Man was much more handy about them than one of their own Sex. I myself have seen one of these Male Aigails tripping about the Room with a Looking-glass in his Hand, and combing his Lady's Hair a whole Morning together. Whether or no there was any Truth in the Story of a Lady's being got with Child by one of these her Handmaids I cannot tell, but I think at present the whole Race of them is extinct in our own Country.

About the Time that several of our Sex were taken into this kind of Service, the Ladies likewise brought up the Fashion of receiving Visits in their Beds.<sup>1</sup> It was then look'd upon as a piece of Ill Breeding, for a Woman to refuse to see a Man, because she was not stirring, and a Porter would have been thought unfit for his Place, that could have made so awkward an Excuse. As I love to see every thing that is new, I once prevailed upon my Friend WILL. HONEYCOMB to carry me along with him to one of these Travelled Ladies, desiring him, at the same time, to present me as a Foreigner who could not speak English, that so I might not be obliged to bear a Part in the Discourse. The Lady, tho' willing to appear undrest, had put on her best Look, and painted her self for our Reception. Her Hair appeared in a very nice Disorder, as the Night-Gown which was thrown upon her Shoulders was ruffled with great Care. For my part, I am so shocked with every thing which looks immodest in the Fur of 1711 was, in fact, Marlborough's last campaign. Peace negotiations were at the same time going on between France and England, and preliminaries were signed in London in October of this year, 1711. England was accused of betraying the allied cause, but the changed political conditions led to her withdrawal from it, and her withdrawal compelled the assent of the allies to the general peace made by the Treaty of Utrecht, which, after tedious negotiations, was not signed until the 11th of April, 1713, the continuous issue of the Spectator having ended, with Vol. VII, in December, 1712.

<sup>2</sup> The custom was copied from the French Prêtresses, at a time when courir les ruelles (to take the run of the bedsides) was a Parisian phrase for fashionable morning calls upon the ladies. The ruelle is the little path between the bedside and the wall.

Sex, that I could not forbear taking off my Eye from her when she moved in her Bed, and was in the greatest Confusion imaginable every time she stured a Leg or an Arm. As the Coquets, who introduced this Custom, grew old, they left it off by Degrees, well knowing that a Woman of Threescore may kick and tumble her Heart out, without making any Impressions.

Sempronia is at present the most profest Admirer of the French Nation, but is so modest as to admit her Visitants no further than her Toilet. It is a very odd Sight that beautiful Creature makes, when she is talking Politicks with her Lresses flowing about her Shoulders, and examining that Face in the Glass, which does such Execution upon all the Male Standers-by. How prettily does she divide her Discourse between her Woman and her Visitants? What sprightly Transitions does she make from an Opera or a Sermon, to an Ivory Comb or a Pincushion? How have I been pleased to see her interrupted in an Account of her Travels, by a Message to her Footman, and holding her Tongue, in the midst of a Moral Reflexion, by applying the Tip of it to a Patch?

There is nothing which exposes a Woman to greater dangers, than that Gaiety and Airiness of Temper, which are natural to most of the Sex. It should be therefore the Concern of every wise and virtuous Woman, to keep this Sprightliness from degenerating into Levity. On the contrary, the whole Discourse and Behaviour of the French is to make the Sex more Fantastical, or (as they are pleased to term it), more awakened, than is consistent either with Virtue or Discretion. To speak Loud in Publick Assemblies, to let every one hear you talk of Things that should only be mentioned in Private or in Whisper, are looked upon as Parts of a refined Education. At the same time, a Blush is unfashionable, and Silence more ill-bred than any thing that can be spoken. In short, Discretion and Modesty, which in all other Ages and Countries have been regarded as the greatest Ornaments of the Fair Sex, are considered as the Ingredients of narrow Conversation, and Family Behaviour.

Some Years ago I was at the Tragedy of Macbeth, and unfortunately placed myself under a Woman of Quality that is since Dead, who, as I found by the Noise she made, was newly returned from France. A little before the rising of the Curtain, she broke out into a loud Soliloquy, When will the dear Witches enter? and immediately upon their first Appearance, asked a Lady that sat three Rows from her, on her Right hand, if those Witches were not charming Creatures. A little after, as Bitterton was in one of the finest Speeches of the Play, she shook her Fan at another Lady, who sat as far on the Left hand, and told her with a Whisper, that might be heard all over the Pit, We must not expect to see Balloon to night.<sup>1</sup> Not long after, calling out to a young Baronet by his Name, who sat three Seats before me, she asked him whether Macbeth's Wife was still alive: and before he could give an Answer, fell a talking of the Ghost of Banquo. She had by this time formed a little Audience to herself, and fixed the Attention of all about her. But as I had a mind to hear the Play, I got out of the Sphere of her Impertinence, and planted myself in one of the remotest Corners of the Pit.

This pretty Childishness of Behaviour is one of the most refined Parts of Coquetry, and is not to be attained in Perfection, by Ladies that do not Travel for their Improvement. A natural and unconstrained Behaviour has something in it so agreeable, that it is no Wonder to see People endeavouring after it. But at the same time, it is so very hard to hit, when it is not Born with us, that People often make themselves Ridiculous in attempting it.

A very ingenious French Author<sup>2</sup> tells us, that the Ladies of the Court of France, in his time, thought it ill breeding, and a kind of Female Pedantry, to pronounce an hard Word right, for which Reason they took frequent occasion to use hard Words, that they might shew a Politeness in murdering them. He further adds, that a Lady of some Quality at Court, having accidentally made use of an hard Word in a proper Place, and pronounced it right, the whole Assembly was out of Countenance for her.

I must however be so just to own, that there are many Ladies who have travelled several Thousand Miles without being the worse for it, and have brought Home with them all the Modesty, Discretion and good Sense that they went abroad with. As on the contrary, there are great Numbers of Travelled Ladies, [who]<sup>3</sup> have lived all their Days within the Smoke of London. I have known a Woman that never was out of the Parish of St. James's, [betray]<sup>3</sup> as many foreign Poperies in her Carriage, as she could have cleaned up in half the Countries of Europe.

WHEN I went Materials for this Paper, it is my Custom to go abroad in quest of Game, and when I meet any proper Subject, I take the first Opportunity of setting down a Hint of it upon Paper. At the same time I look into the Letters of my Correspondents, and if I find any thing suggested in them that may afford Matter of Speculation, I likewise enter a Minute of it in my Collection of Materials. By this means I frequently carry about me a whole Sheetful of Hints, that would look like a Rhapsody of Nonsense to any Body but myself. There is nothing in them but Obscurity and Confusion, Raving and Inconsistency. In short, they are my Speculations in the first Principles, that (like the World in its Chaos) are void of all Light Distinction, and Order

About a Week since there happened to me a very odd Accident, by Reason of one of these my Papers of Minutes which I had accidentally dropped at Lloyds's Coffee-house, where the Auctions are usually kept. Before I missed it, there were a Christ of People who had found it, and were diverting themselves with it at one End of the Coffee house. It had raised so much Laughter among them before I had observed what they were about, that I had not the Courage to own it. The Boy of the Coffee-house, when they had done with it, carried it about in his Hand, asking every Body if they had dropped a written Paper, but no Body challenging it, he was ordered by those merry Gentlemen who had before perused it, to get up into the Auction Pulpit, and read it to the whole Room, that if any one would own it they might. The Boy accordingly mounted the Pulpit, and with a very audible Voice read as follows.

It was taken to get early Ship news at Lloyd's, and the house was used by underwriters and insurers of Ships' cargoes. It was found also to be a convenient place for sales. A poem called The Wealthy Shopkeeper, printed in 1700, says of him,

Now to Lloyd's Coffee-house he never fails,
To read the Letters, and attend the Sales

It was afterwards removed to Pope's Head Alley, as 'the New Lloyd's Coffee House' again removed in 1774 to a corner of the Old Royal Exchange, and in the building of the new Exchange was provided with the rooms now known as 'Lloyd's Subscription Rooms' an institution which forms part of our commercial system

The reading of this Paper made the whole Coffee house very merry, some of them concluded it was written by a Madman, and others by some Body that had been taking Notes out of the Spectator. One who had the Appearance of a very substantial Citizen, told us, with several politick Winks and Nods, that he wished there was no more in the Paper than what was expressed in it. That for his part, he looked upon the Dromedary, the Gridiron, and the Barber's Pole, to signify something more than what is usually meant by those Words, and that he thought the Coffee man could not do better than to carry the Paper to one of the Secretaries of State. He further added, that he did not like the Name of the outlandish Man with the golden Clock in his Stockings. A young [Oxford Scholar?], who chanced to be with his Uncle at the Coffee house, discovered to us who this Pactolus was, and by that means turned the whole Scheme of this worthy Citizen into Ridicule. While they were making their several Conjectures upon this innocent Paper, I reared out my Arm to the Boy, as he was coming out of the Pulpit, to give it me which he did accordingly. This drew the Eyes of the whole Company upon me, but after having cast a cursory Glance over it, and shook my Head twice or thrice at the reading of it, I twisted it into a kind of Match, and lit my Pipe with it. My profound Silence, together with the Steadiness of my Countenance, and the Gravity of my Behaviour during this whole Transaction, raised a very loud Laugh on all Sides of me, but as I had escaped all Suspicion of being the Author, I was very well satisfied, and applying myself to

My Reader will find, that I have already made use of above half the Contents of the foregoing Paper, and will easily Suppose, that those Subjects which are yet untouched were such Provisions as I had made for his future Entertainment But as I have been unluckily prevented by this Accident, I shall only give him the Letters which relate to the two last Hints The first of them I should not have published, were I not informed that there is many a Husband who suffers very much in his private Affairs by the indiscreet Zeal of such a Partner as is hereafter mentioned, to whom I may apply the barbarous Inscription quoted by the Bishop of Salisbury in his Travels.<sup>1</sup>

MR Hobbs, in his Discourse of Human Nature,<sup>2</sup> which, in my humble Opinion, is much the best of all his Works, after some very curious Observations upon Laughter, concludes thus 'The Passion of Laughter is nothing else but sudden Glory arising from some sudden conception of some Eminency in ourselves by Comparison with the Infirmary of others, or with our own formerly For Men laugh at the follies of themselves past, when they come suddenly to Remembrance, except they bring with them any present Dishonour

According to this Author, therefore, when we hear a Man laugh excessively instead of saying he is very Merry, we ought to tell him he is very Proud And, indeed, if we look into the bottom of this Matter, we shall meet with many Observations to confirm us in his Opinion Every one laughs at some Body that is in an inferior State of Folly to himself It was formerly the Custom for every great House in England to keep a tame Fool dressed in Petticoats that the Heir of the Family might have an Opportunity of jolting upon him, and diverting himself with his Absurdities For the same Reason Idiots are still in Request in most of the Courts of Germany, where there is not a Prince of any great Magnificence, who has not two or three dressed, distinguished, undisputed Fools in his Retinue, whom the rest of the Courtiers are always breaking their Jest upon

The Dutch, who are more famous for their Industry and Application, than for Wit and Humour, hang up in several of their Streets what they call the Sign of the Gaper, that is, the Head of an Idiot dressed in a Cap and Bells, and gaping in a most immoderate manner. This is a standing Jest at An sterlam.

Thus every one diverts himself with some Person or other that is below him in Point of Understanding, and triumphs in the Superiority of his Genius, whilst he has such Objects of Derision before his Eyes. Mr Dennis has very well expressed this in a Couple of humorous Lines, which are part of a Translation of a Satire in Monsieur Boileau's.

And shews his empty Noddle at his Brother*

Mr Hobbs's Reflection gives us the Reason why the insignificant People above-mentioned are Surfers up of Laughter among Men of a gross Taste. But as the more understanding Part of Mankind do not find their Rivality affected by such ordinary Objects, it may be worth the while to examine into the several Provocations of Laughter in Men of superior Sense and Knowledge.

In the first Place I must observe, that there is a Set of merry Drolls, whom the common People of all Countries admire and seem to love so well, that they could eat them, according to the old Proverb. I mean those circumfornaceous Wits whom every Nation calls by the Name of that Dish of Meat which it loves best. In Holland they are termed Pickled Herrings; in France, Jean Potages; in Italy, Marcarones; and in Great Britain, Jack Juddings. These merry Wags, from whatever Food they receive their Titles, that they may make their Audience laugh, always appear in a Fool's Court, and commit such Blunders and Mistakes in every Step they take, and every Word they utter, as those who listen to them would be ashamed of.

But this little Triumph of the Understanding, under the Disguise of Laughter, is no where more visible than in that Custom which prevails every where among us on the first Day of the present Month, when every Body takes it in his Head to make as many Fools as he can. In proportion as there are more Follies discovered, so there is more Laughter raised on this Day than on any other in the whole Year. A Neighbour of mine, who is a Haberdasher by Trade, and a very shallow conceited Fellow, makes his Boasts that for these ten Years successively he has not made less than an hundred April Fools. My Landlady had a falling out with him about a Fortnight ago, for sending every one of her Children upon some Sleevish Errand, as she terms it. Her eldest Son went to buy an Half penny worth of Ink at a Shoemaker's, the eldest Daughter was dispatched half a Mile to see a Monster, and, in short, the whole Family of innocent Children made April Fools. Nay, my Landlady herself did not escape him. This empty Fellow has laughed upon these Concepts ever since.

This Art of Wit is well enough, when confined to one Day in a Twelvemonth, but there is an ingenuous Tribe of Men sprung up of late Years, who are for making April Fools every Day in the Year. These Gentlemen are commonly distinguished by the Name of Bsters, a Race of Men that are perpetually employed in laughing at those Mistakes which are of their own Production.

Thus we see, in proportion as one Man is more refined than another, he chooses his Fool out of a lower or higher Class of Mankind or, to speak in a more Philosophical Language, that secret Elation and Pride of Heart, which is generally called Laughter, arises in him from his comparing himself with an Object below him, whether it so happens that it be a Natural or an Artificial Fool. It is indeed very possible, that the Persons we laugh at may in the main of their Characters be much wiser Men than ourselves: but if they would have us laugh at them, they must fall short of us in those Respects which stir up this Passion.

I am afraid I shall appear too Abstracted in my Speculations, if I shew that when a Man of Wit makes us laugh, it is by betraying some Oddness or Infirmary in his own Character, or in the Representation which he makes of others, and that when we laugh at a Brute or even at an inanimate thing, it is at some Action or Incident that bears a remote Analogy to any Blunder or Absurdity in reasonable Creatures.

But to come into common Life. I shall pass by the Consideration of those Stage Coxcombs that are able to shake a whole Audience, and take notice of a particular sort of Men who are such Provokers of Mirth in Conversation, that it is impossible for a Club or Merry meeting to subsist without them. I mean, those honest Gentlemen that are always exposed to the Wit and Railery of their Well-wishers and Companions, that are pelted by Men, Women, and Children, Friends and Foes, and, in a word, stand as Butts in Conversation, for every one to shoot at that pleases. I know several of these Butts, who are Men of Wit and Sense, though by some odd Turn of Humour, some unlucky Cast in their Person or Behaviour, they have always the Misfortune to make the Company merry. The Truth of it is, a Man is not qualified for a Butt, who has not a good deal of Wit and Vivacity, even in the ridiculous side of his Character. A stupid Butt is only fit for the Conversation of ordinary People. Men of Wit require one that will give them Play, and bestir himself in the absurd Part of his Behaviour. A Butt with these Accomplishments frequently gets the Laugh of his side, and turns the Ridicule upon him that attacks him. Sir John Falstaff was an Hero of this Species, and gives a good Description of himself in his Capacity of a Butt, after the following manner, Men of all Sorts (says that merry Knight) take a pride to gird at me. The Brain of Man is not able to invent any thing that tends to Laughter more than I invent, or is invented on me. I am not only Witty in my self, but the Cause that Wit is in other Men.

I shall next Week come down in the Stage-Coach, in order to take my Seat at the Board and shall bring with me a Candidate of each Sex. The Persons I shall present to you, are an old Beau and a modern Pret. If they are not so eminently gifted by Nature as our Assembly expects, give me Leave to say their acquired Ugliness is greater than any that has ever appeared before you. The Beau has varied his Dress every Day of his Life for these thirty Years last past, and still added to the Deformity he was born with. The Pret has still greater Merit towards us and has, ever since she came to Years of Discretion, deserted the handsome Party, and taken all possible Pains to acquire the Face in which I shall present her to your Consideration and I vow

I am,

Gentlemen,
I desire to know whether you admit
People of Quality
*Your most obliged Humble Servant,
The SPECTATOR*

Mr SPECTATOR,April 17

TO shew you there are among us of the vain weak Sex, some that have Honesty and Fortitude enough to dare to be ugly, and willing to be thought so. I apply my self to you, to beg your Interest and Recommendation to the Ugly Club. If my own Word will not be taken, (tho' in this Case a Woman's may) I can bring credible Witness of my Qualifications for their Company, whether they insist upon Hair, Forehead, Eyes, Cheeks, or Chin to which I must add that I find it easier to lean to my left Side than my right. I hope I am in all respects agreeable And for Humour and Mirth, I'll keep up to the President himself. All the Favour I'll pretend to is, that as I am the first Woman has appeared desirous of good Company and agreeable Conversation, I may take and keep the upper End of the Table. And indeed I think they want a Career, which I can be after in ugly a Manner as they can wish. I desire your Thoughts of my Claim as soon as you can. Add to my Features the Length of my Face, which is full half Yard tho' I never knew the Reason of it till you gave me for the Shortness of yours. If I knew a Name ugly enough to belong to the above-described Face, I would feign one but to my unspeakable Misfortune, my Name is the only disagreeable Pretinence about me so prithlee make one for me that signifies all the Deformity in the World. You understand Latin, but be sure bring it in with my being in the Sincerity of my Heart,

*Your most frightful Admirer, and Servant,
Heautausa*

Mr SPECTATOR,

I Read your Discourse upon Affection, and from the Remarks made in it examined my own Heart so strictly, that I thought I had found out its most secret Avenues, with a Resolution to be aware of you for the future. But alas! to my Sorrow I now understand, that I have several Faults which I do not know the Root of. I am an old Fellow, and extremely troubled with the Gout but having always a strong Vanity towards being pleasing in the Eyes of Women, I never have a Moment's Ease but I am mounted in high heel'd Shoes with a glazed Wax-leather Instep. Two Days after a severe Fit I was invited to a Friend's House in the City, where I believed I should see Ladies and with my usual Complaisance crippled my self to wait upon them. A very sumptuous Table, agreeable Company, and kind Reception, were but so many unfortunate Additions to the Torment I was in. A Gentleman of the Family observed my Condition and soon after the Queen's Health, he, in the Presence of the whole Company, with his own Hand degraded me into an old Pair of his own Shoes. This operation, before fine Ladies, to me (who am by Nature a Coxcomb) was suffered with the same Reluctance as they admit the Help of Men in their gatest Extremity. The Return of Ease made me forgive the rough Obligation laid upon me which at that time relieved my Body from a Distemper, and will my Mind for ever from a Folly. For the Charity received I return my thanks this Way

Your most humble ServantSIR,Effing, April 18

We have your Papers here this Morning they come out, and we have been very well entertained with your last, upon the false Omens of Persons who represent Heroes in a Tragedy. What made your Speculation come very seasonably amongst us is, that we have now at this Place a Company of Strollers, who are very far from offending in the impertinent Splendor of the Drama. They are so far from falling into these false Gallantries that the Stage is here in its Original Situation of a Cart. Alexander the Great was acted by a Fellow in a Paper Cravat. The next Day, the Earl of Essex acted to have no Distress but his Poverty. And my Lord

'Foppington' the same Morning wanted my better means to shew himself a Fop, than by wearing Stockings of different Colours. In a Word, tho' they have had a full Barn for many Days together, our Intruders are still in wretchedly poor, that without you can prevail to send us the Linnature you forbade at the Play house, the Heroes appear only like sturdy Beggars, and the Heroines Giggles. We have had but one Part which was performed and dressed with Propriety, and that was Justice Clodpate.<sup>2</sup> This was so well done that it offended Mr Justice Overdo,<sup>3</sup> when in the midst of our whole Audience, was (like Quixote in the Puppet-Show) so highly provoked, that he told them, If they would move Compassion, it should be in their own Persons, and not in the Characters of distressed Princes and Potentates. He told them, If they were so good in finding the way to People's Hearts, they should do it at the Land and Bridges or Church Porches, in their proper Vocation of Beggars. Thus, the Justice says, they must expect, since they could not be contented to let Heathen Warriors, and such a Crowd as Alexander, but must presume to make a Mockery of one of the Quorum.

—Hominem facinus nostra sapit—Mort

I am very natural for a Man who is not turned for Mirthful Meetings of Men, or Assemblies of the fair Sex, to delight in that sort of Conversation which we find in Coffee-houses. Here a Man, of my Temper, is in his Element: for if he cannot talk, he can still be merrily agreeable to his Company, as well as pleased in himself, in being only an Hearer. It is a Secret known but to few, yet of no small use in the Conduct of Life, that when you fall into a Man's Conversation, the first thing you should consider is, whether he has a greater Inclination to hear you, or that you should hear him. The latter is the more general Desire, and I know very able I litterers that never spend a Word in Praise of the Persons from whom they obtain daily a Nurture, but still practice a skilful Attention to whatever is uttered by those with whom they converse. We are very Curious to observe the Behaviour of Great Men and their Clients: but the same Passions and Interests move Men in lower Spheres: and I (tho' I have nothing else to do but make Observations) see in every Parish, Street, Lane, and Alley of this Populous City, a little Potentate that has his Court, and his I litterers who pay Suits for his Affection and Favour, by the same Arts that are practised upon Men in higher Stations.

In the Place I most usually frequent, Men differ rather in the Time of Day in which they make a Figure, than in any real Greatness above one another. I, who am at the Coffee-house at Six in a Morning, know that my Friend Beaver the Haberdashier has a Levy of more undisciplined Friends and Admirers, than most of the Courtiers or Generals of Great-britain. Every Man about him has, perhaps, a News Paper in his Hand, but none can pretend to guess what Step will be taken in any one Court of Europe, till Mr Beaver has thrown down his Pipe, and declares what Measures the Allies must enter into upon this new Posture of Affairs. Our Coffee house is near one of the Inns of Court, and Beaver has the Audience and Admiration of his Neighbours from Six till within a Quarter of Eight, at which time he is interrupted by the Students of the House: some of whom are ready dressed for Westminster, at Eight in a Morning, with Faces as busy as if they were returned in every Cause there: and others come in their Night Gowns to winter away their Time, as if they never designed to go thither. I do not know that I meet, in any of my Walks, Objects which move both my spleen and Laughter so effectually, as these young Fellows at the Grecian, Squire's, Scarle's,<sup>2</sup> and all other Coffee-houses adjacent to the Law, who rise early for no other purpose but to publish their Laziness. One would think these young Vertuosos take a gray Cap and Slippers, with a Scarf and Party-coloured Gown, to be Ensigns of Dignity: for the vain Things approach each other with an Air, which shews they regard one another for their Vestiments. I have observed, that the Superiority among these proceeds from an Opinion of Gallantry and Fashion. The Gentleman in the Strawberry Stalk, who presides so much over the rest, has it seems, subscribed to every Opera this last Winter, and is supposed to receive Favours from one of the Actresses.

When the Day grows too busy for these Gentlemen to enjoy any longer the Pleasures of their Deshabille, with any manner of Confidence, they give place to Men who have Business or good Sense in their Ideas, and come to the Coffee-house either to transact Affairs or to enjoy Conversation. The Persons to whose Behaviour and Discourse I have most regard, are such as are between these two sorts of Men. Such as have not Spirits too Active to be happy and well pleased in a private Condition, nor Complexions too warm to make them neglect the Duties and Relations of Life. Of these sort of Men consist the worthier Part of Mankind, of these are all good Fathers, generous Brothers, sincere Friends, and faithful Subjects Their Entertainments are derived rather from Reason than Imagination Which is the Cause that there is no Impatience or Instability in their Speech or Action You see in their Countenances they are at home, and in quiet Possession of the present Instant, as it passes, without desiring to quicken it by gratifying any Passion or prosecuting any new Design These are the Men formed for Society, and those little Communities which we express by the Word Neighbourhoods

The Coffee house is the Place of Rendezvous to all that live near it, who are thus, turned to relish calm and ordinary Life Eubulus presides over the middle Hours of the Day, when this Assembly of Men meet together He enjoys a great Fortune handsomely, without running into expence, and exerts many noble and useful Qualities, without appearing in any publick Employment His Wisdom and Knowledge are serviceable to all that think fit to make use of them, and he does the office of a Council, a Judge, an Executor, and a Friend to all his Acquaintance, not only without the Profits which attend such Offices, but also without the Defiance and Honour which are usually paid to them. The giving of Thanks is displeasing to him The greatest Gratitude you can shew him is to let him see you are the better Man for his Services and that you are ready to oblige others, as he is to oblige you

In the private Exigencies of his Friends he lends, at legal Value, considerable Sums, which he might highly increase by rolling in the Publick Stocks He does not consider in whose Hands his Money will improve most, but where it will do most Good

Eubulus has so great an Authority in his little Domestic Audience, that when he shakes his Head at any Piece of publick News, they all of them appear dejected and on the contrary, to him in their Dinners with a good Stomach and cheerful Aspect, when Eubulus seems to intimate that things go well Nay their Veneration towards him is so great, that when they are in other Company they speak and act after him are Wise in his Sentences, and are no sooner sit down at their own Tables, but they hope or fear, rejoice or despond as they saw him do at the Coffee house In a word, every Man is Eubulus is soon as his Briel is turned

Having here given an Account of the several Reigns that succeed each other from Day-break till Dinner time, I shall mention the Monarchs of the Afternoon on another Occasion, and shut up the whole Series of them with the History of Ion the Tyrant who, as first Minister of the Coffee house, takes the Government upon him between the Hours of Eleven and Twelve at Night, and gives his Orders in the most Arbitrary manner to the Servants below him, as to the Disposition of Liquors, Coal and Cinders R

WHILN the four Indian Kings were in this Country about a Twelvemonth ago, I often mixed with the Rabble, and followed them a whole Day together, being wonderfully struck with the Sight of every thing that is new or uncommon I have, since their Departure employed a Friend to make many Inquiries of their Landlord the Upholsterer, relating to their Manners and Conversation, as also concerning the Remarks which they made in this Country For, next to the former, a right Notion of such Strangers, I should be desirous to learn, what Ideas they have conceived of us

The Upholsterer finding my Friend very inquisitive about these his Indians, brought him some time since a little Bundle of Papers, which he assured him were written by King Sagoy Onee Kash Tony, and, as he supposed, left behind by some Mistake These Papers are now translated, and contain abundance of very odd Observations which I find this little Fraternity of Kings made during their Stay in the Isle of Great Britain I shall present my Reader with a short Specimen of them in this Paper, and may perhaps communicate more to him hereafter In the Article of Juvenal are the following Words, which without doubt are meant of the Church of St Paul

'On the most rising Part of the Town there stands a large House, big enough to contain the whole Nation of which I am King Our good Brother E. For O. Kaim, King of the Ancients is of opinion it was made by the Hand of that great God to whom it is consecrated The King of Grampah and of the Sir Nations believe that it was created with the Earth and produced on the same Day with the Sun and Moon But for my own Part, by the best Information that I

Swift writes to Stella, in his Journal, 28th April, 1711.—'The SPECTATOR is written by Steele with Addison's help is often very pretty Yesterday it was made of a noble hunt I give him long a for his Father, about an Indian, supposed to write his travels into England I repent he ever had it I intended to have written a look on that subject I believe he has spent it all in one paper, and all the under hints there are in it too but I never see him or Addison' The paper, it will be noticed, was not written by Steele

The four Kings Le Yee Nien Hn Ga Prow, Sagoy Onee Kash Tony, E. Ton O Kaim, and Oh Nee Yurth Ion Naw Prow, were chiefs of the Iroquois Indians who had been persued by adjacent British colonists to come and pay their respects to Queen Anne, and see for themselves the truth of the assertion made among them by the Jesuits, that the English and all other nations were vassals to the French king They were said also to have been told that the Saviour was born in France and crucified in England could get of this Matter, I am apt to think that this prodigious Pile was fashioned into the Shape it now bears by several Tools and Instruments of which they have a wonderful Variety in this Country. It was probably at first a huge mis-shapen Rock that grew upon the Top of the Hill, which the Natives of the Country (after having cut it into a kind of regular Figure) bored and hollowed with incredible Pains and Industry, till they had wrought in it all those beautiful Vaults and Caverns into which it is divided at this Day. As soon as this Rock was thus curiously scooped to their liking, a prodigious Number of Hands must have been employed in chipping the Outside of it, which is now as smooth as the Surface of a Pebble, and is in several Places hewn out into Pillars that stand like the Trunks of so many Trees bound about the Top with Garlands of Leaves. It is probable that when this great Work was begun, which must have been many Hundred Years ago, there was some Religion among this People, for they gave it the Name of a Temple, and have a Tradition that it was designed for Men to pay their Devotions in. And indeed, there are several Reasons which make us think that the Natives of this Country had formerly among them some sort of Worship, for they set apart every seventh Day as sacred, but upon my going into one of [these?] holy Houses on that Day, I could not observe any Circumstance of Devotion in their behaviour. There was indeed a Man in Black who was mounted above the rest, and seemed to utter something with a great deal of Vehemence, but as for those underneath him, instead of paying their Worship to the Deity of the Place, they were most of them bowing and curtsying to one another, and a considerable Number of them fist raised.

The Queen of the Country appointed two Men to attend us, that had enough of our Language to make themselves understood in some few Particulars. But we soon perceived these two were great Enemies to one another, and did not always agree in the same Story. We could make a Shift to gather out of one of them, that this Island was very much infested with a monstrous Kind of Animals, in the Shape of Men, called Wings, and he often told us, that he hoped we should meet with none of them in our Way, for that if we did, they would be apt to knock us down for being Kings.

Our other Interpreter used to talk very much of a kind of Animal called a Lory, that was as great a Monster as the Wings, and would treat us as ill for being I suppose, these two Creatures, it seems, are born with a secret Antipathy to one another, and engage when they meet as naturally as the Elephant and the Rhinoceros. But as we saw none of either of these Species, we are apt to think that our Guides deceived us with Misrepresentations and Inventions, and amused us with an Account of such Monsters as are not really in their Country.

from the Discourse of our Interpreters, which we put together as well as we could, being able to understand but here and there a Word of what they said, and afterwards making up the Meaning of it among ourselves. The Men of the Country are very cunning and ingenious in handicraft Works, but withal so very idle that we often saw young lusty raw-boned Fellows, carrying up and down the Streets in little covered Rooms by a Couple of Porters, who are hired for that Service. Their Dress is likewise very barbarous, for they almost strangle themselves about the Neck, and bind their Bodies with many Figures, that we are apt to think are the Occasion of several Distempers among them, which our Country is entirely free from. Instead of those beautiful Feathers with which we adorn our Heads, they often buy up a monstrous Bush of Hair, which covers their Heads, and falls down in a large Tassel below the Middle of their Faces, with which they walk up and down the Streets, and are as proud of it as if it was of their own growth.

We were invited to one of their publick Diversions, where we hoped to have seen the great Men of their Country running down a Stag or pitching a Bar, that we might have discovered who were the Persons of the greatest Abilities among them, but instead of that, they conveyed us into a huge Room lighted up with abundance of Candles, where this lazy People sat still above three Hours to see several Feats of Ingenuity performed by others, who it seems were paid for it.

As for the Women of the Country, not being able to talk with them, we could only make our Remarks upon them at a Distance. They let the Hair of their Heads grow to a great Length, but as the Men make a great Show with Heads of Hair that are not of their own, the Women who they say have very fine Heads of Hair, tie it up in a Knot, and cover it from being seen. The Women look like Angels, and would be more beautiful than the Sun, were it not for little black Spots that are apt to break out in their Face, and sometimes rise in very odd Figures. I have observed that those little Blanches wear off very soon, but when they disappear in one Part of the Face, they are very apt to break out in another, inasmuch that I have seen a Spot upon the Forehead in the Afternoon, which was upon the Chin in the Morning.

The Author then proceeds to shew the Absurdity of Breaches and Petticoats, with many other curious Observations, which I shall reserve for another Occasion. I cannot however conclude this Paper without taking notice, that amidst these wild Remarks there now and then appears something very reasonable. I cannot likewise forbear observing, that we are all guilty in some Measure of the same narrow way of Thinking, which we meet with in this Abstract of the Indian Journal when we fancy the Customs, Dress, and Manners of other Countries are ridiculous and extravagant, if they do not resemble those of our own C

MR SPECTATOR,
MY Fortune, Quality, and Person are such as reader me is conspicuous to any Young Woman in Town. It is in my Power to enjoy it in all its Vanities, but I have, from a very careful Education contracted a great Aversion to the forward Air and Fashion which is practised in all Publick Places and Assemblies. I attribute this very much to the Style and Manners of our Plays. I was last Night at the Funeral, where a Confident Lover in the Play, speaking of his Mistress, cries out—Oh that Harriot! to hold these Arms about the Waste of that Beauteous struggling, and at last yielding Fan! Such an Image as this ought, by no means, to be presented to a Chaste and Regular Audience. I expect your Opinion of this Sentence, and recommend to your Consideration, as a SPECTATOR, the conduct of the Stage at present with Relation to Chastity and Modesty

I am, SIR,
Your Constant Reader
and Well wisher

The Complaint of this Young Lady is so just, that the Offence is [great<sup>2</sup>] enough to have displeased Persons who cannot pretend to that Delicacy and Modesty, of which she is Mistress. But there is a great deal to be said in Behalf of an Author. If the Audience would but consider the <sup>1</sup> The Play is by Steele himself, the writer of this Essay. Steele's Plays were as pure as his Spectator Essays absolutely discarding the customary way of enforcing feeble dialogues by the spurious force of oaths, and running at a wholesome influence upon his audience. The passage here recounted was a climax of passion in one of the lovers of two sisters, Act II, sc 1, and was thus retrenched in subsequent editions.

Campfly 'Oh that Harriot! to embrace that beauteous—

Lord Hardy 'Ay, Tom but methinks your Head runs too much on the Wedding Night only, to make your Happiness lasting, mine is fixt on the married State. I expect my Felicity from Lady Shalot, in her Friendship, her Constancy, her Piety, her household Cares, her maternal Indulgence—You think not of any excellence of your Mistress that is more than skin deep'

Difficulty of keeping up a sprightly Dialogue for five Acts together they would allow a Writer, when he wants Wit, and can't please any other way, to help it out with a little Smuttiness. I will answer for the Poets, that no one ever writ Bawdy for any other Reason but Dearth of Invention. When the Author cannot strike out of himself any more of that which he has superior to those who make up the Bulk of his Audience, his natural Recourse is to that which he has in common with them. And a Description which gratifies a sensual Appetite will please, when the Author has nothing [about him to delight<sup>1</sup>] a refined Imagination. It is to such a Poverty we must impute this and all other Sentences in Plays, which are of this Kind, and which are commonly termed Lascivious Expressions.

This Expedient, to supply the Deficiencies of Wit, has been used more or less, by most of the Authors who have succeeded on the Stage tho' I know but one who has professedly writ a Play upon the Basis of the Desire of Multiplying our Species, and that is the Polite Sir George Etherege, if I understand what the Lady would be at, in the Play called She would if She could. Other Poets have, here and there, given an Intimation that there is this Design, under all the Disguises and Affectations which a Lady may put on but no Author, except this, has made sure Work of it, and put the Imaginations of the Audience upon this one Purpose, from the Beginning to the End of the Comedy. It has always fared accordingly, for whether it be, that all who go to this Piece would if they could, or that the Innocents go to it, to guess only what She would if She could, the Play has always been well received.

It lifts an heavy empty Sentence, when there is added to it a lascivious Gesture of Body, and when it is too low to be raised even by that, a flat Meaning is enlivened by making it a double one. Writers, who want Genius, never fail of keeping this Secret in reserve, to create a Laugh, or raise a Clap. I, who know nothing of Women but from seeing Plays, can give great Guesses at the whole Structure of the fair Sex, by being innocently placed in the Pit, and insulted by the Petticoats of their Dancers. The Advantages of whose pretty Persons are a great Help to a dull Play. When a Poet flags in writing Lasciviously a pretty Girl can move Lasciviously, and have the same good Consequence for the Author. Dull Poets in this Case use their Audiences, as dull Parasites do their Patrons when they cannot longer divert [them<sup>2</sup>] with their Wit or Humour, they bait [their<sup>3</sup>] Ears with something which is agreeable to [their<sup>4</sup>] Temper, though below [their<sup>5</sup>] Understanding. Apuian cannot resist being pleased, if you give him an Account of a delicious Meal, or Clodius, if you describe a Wanton Beauty. Tho' at the same time, if you do not awake those Inclinations in them, no Men are better Judges of what is just and delicate in Conversation. But as I have before observed, it is easier to talk to the Menn, than to the Men of Sense.

It is remarkable, that the Writers of last Learning are best skilled in the luscious Way. The Poetesses of the Age have done Wonders in this kind, and we are obliged to the Lady who writ Ibrahim,<sup>1</sup> for introducing a preparatory Scene to the very Action, when the Emperor throws his Handkerchief as a Signal for his Mistress to follow him in the most retired Part of the Seraglio. It must be confessed his Turkish Majesty went off with a good Air, but, methought, we made but a sad Figure who waited without. This ingenious Gentlewoman, in this piece of Bowdry, refused upon an Author of the same Sex,<sup>2</sup> who in the Kover, makes a Country Squire strip to his Holland Drawers. For Blunt is disappointed, and the Emperor is understood to go on to the utmost. The Pleasantry of stripping almost Naked has been since practised (where indeed it should have begun) very successfully at Bartholomew Fair.

It is not here to be omitted, that in one of the above mentioned I amble Compositions, the Kover is very frequently sent on the same Errand. As I take it above once every Act. This is no wholly unnatural for, they say, the Men-Authors draw themselves in their chief Characters, and the Women Writers may be allowed the same Liberty. Thus, as the Male Wit gives his Hero a good Fortune, the Female gives her Heroine a great Gallant, at the End of the Play. But, indeed, there is hardly a Play one can go to, but the Hero or fine Gentleman of it struts off upon the same account, and leaves us to consider what good Office he has put us to, or to employ ourselves as we please. To be plain, a Man who frequents Plays would have a very respectful Notion of himself, were he to recollect how often he has been used as a Pimp to ravishing Lords, or successful Rakes. When the Actors make their Exit on this good Occasion the Ladies are sure to have an examining Glance from the Pit, to see how they relish what passes, and a few lewd Fools are very ready to employ their Talents upon the Composure or Freedom of their Looks. Such Incidents as these make some Ladies wholly absent themselves from the Play House, and others never miss the first Day of a Play, lest it should prove too luscious to admit their going with any Countenance to it on the second.

If Men of Wit, who think fit to write for the Stage, instead of this painful way of giving Delight, would turn their Thoughts upon raising it from good natural Impulses as are in the Audience, but are choked up by Vice and Luxury, they would not only please, but befriended us at the same time. If a Man had a mind to be new in his way of Writing, might not he who is now represented as a fine Gentleman, tho he betrays the Honour and Bed of his Neighbour and Friend, and lies with half the Women in the Play, and is at last rewarded with her of the best Character in it. I say, upon giving the Comedy another Cast, might not such a one divert the Audience quite as well, if at the Catastrophe he were found out for a Traitor, and met with Contempt accordingly? There is seldom a Person devoted to above one Darling Vice at a time, so that there is room enough to catch at Men's Hearts to their Good and Advantage, if the Poets will attempt it with the Honesty which becomes their Character.

There is no Man who loves his Bottle or his Mistress, in a manner so very abandoned, as not to be capable of relishing an agreeable Character, that is no way a Slave to either of those Pursuits. A Man that is Temperate, Generous, Valiant, Chaste, Trustful and Honest, may, at the same time, have Wit, Humour, Mirth, Good-breeding, and Gallantry. While he exerts these latter Qualities, twenty Occasions might be invented to shew he is Master of the other noble Virtues. Such Characters would smite and reprove the Heart of a Man of Sense, when he is given up to his Pleasures. He would see he has been mistaken all this while, and be convinced that a sound Constitution and an innocent Mind are the true Ingredients for becoming and enjoying Life. All Men of true Taste would call a Man of Wit, who should turn his Ambition this way, a Friend and Benefactor to his Country. But I am at a loss what Name they would give him, who makes use of his Capacity for contrary Purposes. R

AN ingenious Correspondent, like a sprightly Wife, will always have the last Word. I did not think my last Letter to the deformed Immortality would have occasioned any Answer, especially since I had promised them so sudden a Visit. But as they think they cannot shew too great a Veneration for my Person, they have already sent me up an Answer. As to the Proposal of a Marriage between my self and the matchless Heautissa, I have but one Objection to it, which is, that all the Society will expect to be acquainted with her, and who can be sure of keeping a Woman's Heart long, where she may have so much Choice? I am the more alarmed at this, because the Lady seems particularly smitten with Me of their Make.

I believe I shall set my Heart upon her, and think never the worse of my Mistress for an Epigram a smart Fellow writ, as he thought, against her. It does but the more recommend her to me. At the same time I cannot but discover that his Malice is stolen from Martial.

But when the Cavalier enter'd I was cur'd*

Your Letter to us we have received, as a signal Mark of your Favour and brotherly Affection. We shall be heartily glad to see your short Piece in Oxford. And since the Wisdom of our Legislature has been immortalized in our Speculations, and our personal Deformities in some sort by you recorded to all Posterity, we hold ourselves in Gratitude bound to receive with the highest Respect, all such Persons as for their extraordinary Merit you shall think fit, from Time to Time, to recommend unto the Board. As for the Pictish Damsel, we have an easy Chair prepared at the upper End of the Table, which we do not but she will grace with a very hideous Aspect, and much better become the Seat in the native and unaffected Uneasiness of her Person, than with all the superficial Air of the Peniel, which (as you have very ingeniously observed) runs with a Breath, and the most innocent Admiration may deface the Shrine with a Salutation, and in the literal Sense of our Poets, scratch and imprint his balmy Kisses, and discolour her melting Lips. In short, the only Foes of the Pictish Kind that will endure the Weather, must be of Dr Carbuncle's the thorn, his, in truth, has cost him a World of Painting, but then he boasts with Jeuxes Tu c'est statum Angl and oft jocosely tells the fair Ones, would they require Colours that would stand kissing, they must no longer Paint but Drank for a Complexion. A Maxim that in this our Age has been pursued with no ill Success, and has been as valuable in its Effects, as the famous Cosmetics mentioned in the Pest man, and invented by the renowned British Hippocrates of the Pestic and Mortar making the Party, after a due Course, rosy, hale and airy, and the best and most approved Receipt now extant for the Favour of the Spirits. Fit to return to our Female Candidate, who I understand, is returned to herself, and will no longer hang out false Colours, as she is the first of her Sex that has done us so great an Honour, she will certainly, in a very short Time, both in Prose and Verse, be a Lady of the most celebrated Deformity now living, and meet with Admirers here, as faithful as herself. But being a long-headed Gentlewoman, I am apt to imagine she has some further Design than you have yet penetrated, and perhaps has more mind to the SPECTATOR than any of his Paternity, as the Person of all the World she could like for a Par amour. And if so, really I cannot but applaud her Choice, and should be glad if it might be in my Power to effect an amicable accommodation between two Foes of such different Extremes, as the only possible Expedient to mend the Freed and rectify the Physiognomy of the Family on both Sides. And again, as she is a Lady of very fluent Elocution, you need not fear that your first Child will be born dumb, which otherwise you might have some Reason to be apprehensive of. To be plain with you, I can see nothing shocking in it, for tho' she has not a Face like a John-Apple, yet as a late Friend of mine, who at Sixty five ventured on a Lass of fifteen, very frequently, in the remaining five Years of his Life, gave me to understand, that, as old as he then seemed, when they were first married he and his Spouse (could I make but fourscore so many Madam Hecatissa very justly allege hereafter, that, as long-lived as she may then be thought, upon their Wedding-day Mr SPECTATOR and she had but Half an Ell of I see betwixt them. And this my very worthy Predecessor, Mr Sergeant Chin, always maintained to be no more than the true oval Proportion between Man and Wife. But as thus may he a new thing to you, who have hitherto had no Expectations from Women, I shall allow you what Time you think fit to consider on't, not without some Hope of seeing at last your Thoughts hereupon subjoin'd to mine, and which is an Honour much desired by,

Sir,

The following Letter has not much in it, but as it is written in my own Praise I cannot for my Heart suppress it

SIR,
You proposed, in your SPECTATOR of last Tuesday, Mr Hobbs's Hypothesis for solving that very odd Phenomenon of Laughter. You have made the Hypothesis valuable by espousing it your self, for had it continued Mr Hobbs's, no Body would have minded it. Now here this perplexed Case arises. A certain Company laugh'd very heartily upon the Reading of this very Paper of yours. And the Truth on it is, he must be a Man of more than ordinary Constancy, that could stand it out against so much Comedy, and not do as we did. Now there are few Men in the World so far lost to all good Sense, as to look upon you to be a Man in a State of Folly infer or to him self. Pray then how do you justify your Hypothesis of Laughter?

Mr SPECTATOR,

I am glad I can inform you, that you are Endeavouring to adorn that Sex, which is the fairest Part of the visible Creation, are well received, and like to prove not unsuccessful. The Triumph of Daphne over her Sister Leto has been the Subject of Conversation at Several Ladies Tables, where I have been present, and I have observed the fair Circle not a little pleas'd to find you considering them as reasonable Creatures, and endeavouring to banish that Mahometan Custom which had too much prevail'd even in this Island, of treating Women as if they had no Souls. I must do them the Justice to say, that there seems to be nothing wanting to the finishing of these lovely Pieces of Human Nature, besides the turning and applying their Ambition properly and the keeping them up to a Sense of what is their true Merit. Spechtus, that plain honest Philosopher, as little as he had of Gallantry, appears to have understood them, as well as the polite St. Pierre, and has hit their Privacy well. When young Women, says he, arrive at a certain Age, they learn to themselves called Mistresses, and are made to believe that their only Business is to please the Men. They must dately be in to dress, and place all their Hopes in the favour of their Persons, it is therefore, continues he, worth the while to endeavour by all means to make themselves the Honour paid to them is only upon account of their conducing themselves with Virtue, Modesty, and Discretion.

Now to pursue the Matter yet further, and to render your Cares for the Improvement of the fair Ones more effectual, I would propose a new method, like those Applications which are said to convey their virtues by Sympathy, and that is, in order to embellish the Mistress, you should give a new Education to the Lover, and teach the Men not to be any longer dazzled by false Charms and unreal Beauty. I cannot but think that if our Sex knew always how to please their Ladies justly, the other would not be so often wanting to themselves in deserving it. For as the brain, enamoured with a Woman of Sense and Virtue is an Improvement to a Man's Understanding and Morals, and the Passion is ennobled by the Object which inspires it, so on the other side the appearing amiable to a Man of a wise and elegant Mind, carries in it self no small Degree of Merit and Accomplishment. I conclude therefore, that one way to make the Women yet more agreeable is, to make the Men more virtuous

SIR,

April 26

Yours of Saturday last I read, not without some Resentment but I will suppose when you say you expect an Inundation of Ribbons and Brocade, and to see many new Vanities which the Women will fall into upon a Peace with France, that you intend only the unthinking Part of our Sex. And what Methods can reduce them to Reason is hard to imagine.

But, Sir, there are others yet, that your Instructions might be of great Use to, who, after their bett'le Manners, are sometimes at a loss to requit themselves to a Censorious World. I am far from thinking you can altogether disapprove of Conversation between Ladies and Gentlemen, regulated by the Rules of Honour and Prudence, and have thought it an Observation not ill made that where that was wholly denied, the Women lost the Wit, and the Men their Good manners. 'Tis sure, from those improper Liberties you mentioned, that a sort of undistinguishing People shall banish from their Drawing Rooms the best bred Men in the World, and condemn those that do not. Your stringing this Point might, I think, be of good use, as well as much otherwise.

No Answer to this, till Anna Bella sends a Description of those she calls the Best bred Men in the World

Mr SPECTATOR,

I am a Gentleman who for many Years last past have been well known to be truly Spleenick, and that my Spleen rises from having contracted so great a Delicacy, by reading the best Authors, and keeping the most refined Company, that I cannot bear the least Impropriety of Language, or Rusticity of Behaviour. Now, Sir, I have ever looked upon this as a wise Distemper but by late Observations find that every heavy Wretch, who has nothing to say, excuses his Dulness by complaining of the Spleen. Nay, I saw, the other Day, two Fellows in a Tavern Kitchen set up for it, call for a Pint and Pipes, and only by Guzzling Ignorance each other's Health, and waiving Smoke in each other's Face, pretend to throw off the Spleen. I appeal to you, whether these Dishonours are to be done to the Distemper of the Great and the Polite. I beseech you, Sir, to inform these Fellows that they have not the Spleen, because they cannot talk without the help of a Glass at their Mouths, or convey their Meaning to each other without the Interposition of Clouds. If you will not do this with all Speed, I assure you, for my part, I will wholly quit the Discease, and for the future be merry with the Vulgar.

A Name, a Nothing but an Old Wife's Tale
 Speak, wilt thou Avarice, or Pleasure choose To be thy Lord? Take one, and one refuse

When a Government flourishes in Conquests, and is secure from foreign Attacks, it naturally falls into all the Pleasures of Luxury, and as these Pleasures are very expensive, they put those who are addicted to them upon raising fresh Supplies of Money, by all the Methods of Rap-aciousness and Corruption so that Avarice and Luxury very often become one complicated Principle of Action, in those whose Hearts are wholly set upon Ease, Magnificence, and Pleasure.
 The most Elegant and Correct of all the Latin Historians observes, that in his time, when the most formidable States of the World were subdued by the Romans, the Republick sunk into those two Vices of a quite different Nature, Luxury and Avarice. And accordingly describes Catiline as one who coveted the Wealth of other Men, at the same time that he squander'd away his own. This Observation on the Commonwealth, when it was in its height of Power and Riches, holds good of all Governments that are settled in a State of Ease and Prosperity. At such times Men naturally endeavour to outshine one another in Pomp and Splendor, and having no Fears to alarm them from abroad, indulge themselves in the Enjoyment of all the Pleasures they can get into their Possession which naturally produces Avarice and an immoderate Pursuit after Wealth and Riches.

As I was humouring my self in the Speculation of these two great Principles of Action, I could not forbear throwing my Thoughts into a little kind of Allegory or Fable, with which I shall here present my Reader.

There were two very powerful Tyrants engaged in a perpetual War against each other. The Name of the first was Luxury, and of the second

Lion couched under the Side of it, who kept his Eye upon him in the same Posture as when he watches for his Prey. The Indian immediately started back, whilst the Lion rose with a Spring, and leaped towards him. Being wholly desolate of all other Weapons, he stooped down to take up an huge Stone in his Hand but to his infinite Surprise grasped nothing, and found the supposed Stone to be only the Apparition of one. If he was disappointed on this Side, he was as much pleased on the other, when he found the Lion, which had seized on his left Shoulder, had no Power to hurt him, and was only the Ghost of that ravenous Creature which it appeared to be. He no sooner got rid of his impotent Enemy, but he marched up to the Wood, and after having surveyed it for some Time, endeavoured to press into one Part of it that was a little thinner than the rest, when again, to his great Surprise, he found the Bushes made no Resistance, but that he walked through Brurs and Brambles with the same Ease as through the open Air and, in short, that the whole Wood was nothing else but a Wood of Shades. He immediately concluded, that this huge Thicket of Thorns and Brakes was designed as a kind of Fence or quick set Hedge to the Ghosts it inclosed and that probably their soft Substances might be torn by these subtle Points and Prickles, which were too weak to make any Impressions in Flesh and Blood. With this Thought he resolved to travel through this intricate Wood when by Degrees he felt a Gale of Perfumes breathing upon him, that grew stronger and sweeter in Proportion as he advanced. He had not proceeded much further when he observed the Thorns and Brurs to end and give place to a thousand beautiful green Trees covered with Blossoms of the finest Scents and Colours, that formed a Wilderness of Sweets, and were a kind of Lining to those rugged Scenes which he had before passed through. As he was coming out of this delightful Part of the Wood, and entering upon the Plains it inclosed he saw several Horsemen rushing by him, and a little while after heard the Cry of a Pack of Dogs. He had not listened long before he saw the Apparition of a milk-white Steed, with a young Man on the Back of it, advancing upon full Stretch after the Souls of about an hundred Beagles that were hunting down the Ghost of an Hare, which ran away before them with an unspeakable Swiftness. As the Man on the milk-white Steed came by him, he looked upon him very attentively, and found him to be the young Prince Nicharagun, who died about Half a Year before, and, by reason of his great Vertues, was not that time lamented over all the Western Parts of America.

He had no sooner got out of the Wood, but he was entertained with such a Landscape of flowery Plains green Meadows, running Streams, sunny Hills, and shady Vales, as were not to be represented by his own Expressions; nor, as he said, by the Conceptions of others. This happy Region was peopled with innumerable Swarms of Spirits, who applied themselves to Exercises and Diversions according as their Fancies led them

Some of them were tossing the Figure of a Coat others were pitching the Shadow of a Bar others were breaking the Apparition of a Horse and Multitudes employing themselves upon ingenious Handicrafts with the Souls of departed Ukulsis, for that is the Name which in the Indian Language they give their Tools when they are burnt or broken. As he travelled through this delightful Scene, he was very often tempted to pluck the Flowers that rose every where about him in the greatest Variety and Profusion, having never seen several of them in his own Country. But he quickly found that though they were Objects of his Sight, they were not liable to his Touch. He at length came to the Side of a great River, and being a good Fisherman himself stood upon the Banks of it some time to look upon an Angler that had taken a great many Shapes of Fishes, which lay flouncing up and down by him.

I should have told my Reader, that this Indian had been formerly married to one of the greatest Beauties of his Country, by whom he had several Children. This Couple were so famous for their Love and Constancy to one another, that the Indians to this Day, when they give a married Man Joy of his Wife, wish that they may live together like Marraton and Yaratilda. Marraton had not stood long by the Fisherman when he saw the Shadow of his beloved Yaratilda, who had for some time fixed her Eye upon him, before he discovered her. Her Arms were stretched out towards him, Floods of Tears ran down her Eyes, her Looks, her Hands, her Voice called him over to her and at the same time seemed to tell him that the River was unpassable. Who can describe the Passion made up of Joy, Sorrow, Love, Desire, Astonishment, that rose in the Indian upon the Sight of his dear Yaratilda? He could express it by nothing but his Tears, which ran like a River down his Checks as he looked upon her. He had not stood in this Posture long before he plunged into the Stream that lay before him and finding it to be nothing but the Phantom of a River, walked on the Bottom of it till he rose on the other Side. At his Approach Yaratilda flew into his Arms, whilst Marraton wished himself disencumbered of that Body which kept her from his Embraces. After many Questions and Underments on both Sides, he conducted him to a Bower which she had dressed with her own Hands with all the Ornaments that could be met with in those blooming Regions. She had made it gay beyond Imagination, and was every day adding something new to it. As Marraton stood astonished at the unspeakable Beauty of her Habitation, and ravished with the Fragrancy that came from every Part of it, Yaratilda told him that she was preparing this Bower for his Reception as well knowing that his Duty to his God and his faithful Darling towards Men, would certainly bring him to that happy Place whenever his Life should be at an End. She then brought two of her Children to him, who died some Years before, and resided with her in the same delightful Bower, advising him to breed up those others which were still with him in such a Manner, that they might let either all of them meet it, either in this happy Place.

The Tradition tells us further, that he had afterwards a Sight of those dismal Habitations which are the Portion of all Men after Death, and went out several Mollen Sacks of Gold in which were plunged the Souls of barbarous Puritans [who] I put to the Sword in many Thousands of poor Soldiers for the sake of that precious Metal. But having already touched upon the chief Points of this Tradition, and exceeded the Measure of my Paper, I shall not, we say in their Account of it.

*Quer primum pateris heri et tuatorem,
Quæsit & Servus—* Jun

WHEN the Wife of Hector in Homer's Iliad discourses with her Husband about the Battle in which he was going to engage, the Hero, desirous her to leave that Matter to his Care, bids her go to her Muds and mind her Spinning. In which the Poet intimates, that Men and Women ought to busy themselves in their proper Spheres, and on such Matters only as are suitable to their respective Sex.

I am at this time acquainted with a young Gentleman who has pass'd a great Part of his Life in the Nursery, and, upon Occasion, can make a Caille or a Sack-Poet better than any Man in England. He is likewise a wonderful Critick in Cambricks and Muslins, and will talk an Hour together upon a Sweet meat. He entertains his Mother every Night with Observations that he makes both in Town and Court. As what Laïs shows the nicest fancy in her Dress, what Mim of Quilby wears the finest Whig, who has the finest Linen, who the prettiest Sun-bon, with many other the like curious Remarks that may be made in good Company.

On the other hand I have very frequently the Opportunity of seeing a Rural Andromache, who came up to Town last Winter and is one of the greatest Fox-hunters in the Country. She talks of Hounds and Horses and makes nothing of leaping over a Six-bar Gate. If a Man tells her a waggish Story, she gives him a Push with her Elbow in jest and calls him an Impudent Dog, and if her Servant neglects his Business, threatens to kick him out of the House. I have heard her in her Wrath, call a Substantial Tradesman a Lousy Cur, and remember one Day when she could not think of the Name of a Person she described him in a large Company of Men and Ladies, by the Fellow with the Broad Shoulders.

*No more—but hasten to thy tasks at home,
There guide the spindle, and direct the loom,

The field of combat is the sphere for man*

If those Speeches and Actions, which in their own Nature are indifferent, appear ridiculous when they proceed from a wrong Sex, the Faults and Imperfections of one Sex transplanted into another, appear black and monstrous. As for the Men I shall not in this Paper any further concern myself about them, but as I would contribute to make Woman-kind, which is the most beautiful Part of the Creation, entirely amiable, and wear out all those little Spots and Blemishes that are apt to rise among the Charms which Nature has poured out upon them I shall dedicate this Paper to their Service. The Spot which I would here endeavour to clear them of, is that Party-Rage which of late Years is very much crept into their Conversation. This is, in its Nature, a Male Vice and made up of many angry and cruel Passions that are altogether repugnant to the Softness, the Modesty, and those other endearing Qualities which are natural to the fair Sex. Women were formed to temper Mankind and root them into Tenderness and Compassion, not to set an Edge upon their Minds, or blow up in them those Passions which are so apt to rise of their own Accord. When I have seen a pretty Mouth uttering Calumnies and Invectives, what would not I have given to have stoop'd it? How have I been troubled to see some of the finest Features in the World grow pale, and tremble with Party-Rage? Camilla is one of the greatest Beauties in the British Nation, and yet values her self more upon being the Prize of one Party, than upon being the Love of both. The Dear Creature, about a Week ago, encountered the fierce and beautiful Penthesilea across a Tea-Table, but in the Height of her Anger, as her Hand chanced to strike with the Lateness of the Dispute, she scalded her Fingers, and spilt a Dish of Tea upon her Petticoat. Had not this Accident broke off the Debate, no Body knows where it would have ended.

There is one Consideration which I would earnestly recommend to all my female Readers, and which, I hope, will give some weight with them. In short, it is this, that there is nothing so bad for the fair Sex as Party-Zeal. It gives us all natural Lust to the Eye, and a disagreeable Sourness to the Foot, besides, that it makes the Lines too strong and flushes them worse than Brandy. I have seen a Woman's Face break out in Heats, as she has been talking against a great Lord, whom she had never seen in her Life, and indeed never knew a Party Woman that kept her Beauty for a Twelvemonth. I would therefore advise all my female Readers, as they value their Complexions, to let alone all Disputes of this Nature though at the same time, I would give free Liberty to all superannuated motherly Partizans to be as violent as they please, since there will be no Danger either of their spoiling their Faces, or of their running Couverts.

<sup>2</sup> For my own part, I think a Man makes an odious and despicable Figure, that is violent in a Party, but a Woman is too sincere to mitigate the Fury of her Principles with Temper and Discretion, and to act with that Caution and Re-servedness which are requisite in our Sex. When this unnatural Zeal gets into them, it throws them into ten thousand Heats and Extravagancies their generous [Souls<sup>1</sup>] set no Bounds to their Love or to their Hatred, and whether a Whig or Tory, a Lap-Dog or a Gallant, an Opera or a Puppet-Show, be the Object of it, the Passion, while it reigns, engrosses the whole Woman.

I remember when Dr Titus Oates<sup>2</sup> was in all his Glory, I accompanied my Friend Will [Honycombe<sup>3</sup>] in a Visit to a Lady of his Acquaintance. We were no sooner set down but upon casting my Eyes about the Room, I found in almost every Corner of it a Print that represented the Doctor in all Magnitudes and Dimensions. A little after, the Lady was discoursing my Friend and held her Snuff-box in her Hand, who should I see in the Lid of it but the Doctor. It was not long after this, when she had Occasion for her Handkerchief, which upon the first opening discovered among the Plaits of it the Figure of the Doctor. Upon this my Friend Will, who loves Raillery, told her, That if he was in Mr Fruelands Place (for that was the Name for her Husband) she should be made as uneasy by a Handkerchief as ever Othello was. I am afraid, said she, Mr [Honycombe], you are a Tory, tell me truly, are you a Friend to the Doctor or no? Will, instead of making her a Reply, smiled in her Face (for indeed she was very pretty) and told her that one of her Patchers were dropping off. She immediately adjusted it, and looking a little seriously, Well, says she, I'll be land's if you and your silent Friend there are not against the Doctor in 30 or 40 Hearts, I suspected as much by his saying nothing. Upon this she took her Fan into her Hand, and upon the opening of it again displayed to us the Figure of the Doctor, who was placed with great Gravity among the Sticks of it. In a word, I found that the Doctor had taken Possession of her Thoughts, her Discourse, and most of her Furniture: but finding, my self pressed too close by her Question, I winked upon my Friend to take his Leave, which he did accordingly. C

NOTHING is so much admired, and so little understood, as Wit. No Author that I know of has written professedly upon it, and yet for those who make any Mention of it, they only treat on the Subject as it has accidentally fallen in their Way, and that too in little short Reflections, or in general declamatory Flourishes, without entering into the Bottom of the Matter. I hope therefore I shall perform an acceptable Work to my Countrymen, if I treat at large upon this Subject, which I shall endeavour to do in a Manner suitable to it, that I may not incur the Censure which a famous Critick bestows upon one who had written a Treatise upon the Sublimity in a low grovelling Style. I intend to lay aside a whole Week for this Undertaking, that the Scheme of my Thoughts may not be broken and interrupted, and I dare promise my self, if my Readers will give me a Week's Attention that this great City will be very much changed for the better by next Saturday Night. I shall endeavour to make what I say intelligible to ordinarv Capacities, but if my Readers meet with any Paper that in some Parts of it may be a little out of their Reach, I would not have them discouraged, for they may assure themselves the next shall be much clearer.

As the great and only End of these my Speculations is to banish Vice and Ignorance out of the Territories of Great Britain, I shall endeavour as much as possible to establish among us a Taste of polite Writing. It is with this View that I have endeavoured to set my Readers right in several Points relating to Operas and Tragedies, and shall from time to time impart my Notions of Comedy, as I think they may tend to its Refinement and Perfection. I find by my Book-seller that these Papers of Criticism, with that upon Humour, have met with a more kind Reception than indeed I could have hoped for from such Subjects, for which Reason I shall enter upon my present Undertaking with greater Cheerfulness.

In this, and one or two following Papers, I shall trace out the History of false Wit, and distinguish the several Kinds of it as they have prevailed in different Ages of the World. This I think the more necessary at present, because I observed there were Attempts on foot last Winter to revive some of those antiquated Modes of Wit that have been long exploded out of the Common wealth of Letters. There were several Satyrs and Panegyrics handed about in Acrostick, by which Means some of the most arrant indisputable Blockheads about the Town began to entertain ambitious Thoughts, and to set up for polite Authors. I shall therefore describe at length those many Arts of false Wit, in which a Writer does not show himself a Man of a beautiful Genius, but of great Industry.

The first Species of false Wit which I have met with is very venerable for its Antiquity, and has the Wig was finished, there is a Space left in it for the Face of any one that has a mind to purchase it

But to return to our ancient Poems in Picture, I would humbly propose, for the Benefit of our modern Smatterers in Poetry, that they would imitate their Brethren among the Ancients in those ingenious Devices I have communicated this Thought to a young Poetical Lover of my Acquaintance, who intends to present his Mistress, with a Copy of Verses made in the Shape of her Fan and, if he tells me true, has already finished the three first Sticks of it He has likewise promised me to get the Measure of his Mistress's Marriage-Finger, with a Design to make a Posy in the Fashion of a Ring, which shall exactly fit it It is so very easy to enlarge upon a good Hint that I do not question but my ingenious Readers will apply what I have said to many other Particulars and that we shall see the Town filled in a very little time with Poetical Tipsters, Handkerchiefs, Snuff-Boxes, and the like Female Ornaments I shall therefore conclude with a Word of Advice to those admirable English Authors who call themselves Pindarick Writers,<sup>1</sup> that they would apply themselves to this kind of Wit without Loss of Time, as being provided better than any other Poets with Verses of all Sizes and Dimensions C

Operose Nilul agunt — Seneca

THERE is nothing more certain than that every Man would be a Wit if he could and notwithstanding Pedants of a pretended Depth and Solidity are so to deery the Writings of a polite Author, as Flash and Froth, they all of them shew upon Occasion that they would spare no pains to arrive at the Character of those whom they seem to despise For this Reason we often find them endeavoring, at Words of Fancy, which cost them infinite Pains in the Production The Truth of it is, a Man had better be a Gally-Slave than a Wit were one to gain that Title by those Elaborate Trifles which have been the Inventions of such Authors as were often Masters of great Learning but no Genius

In my last Paper I mentioned some of these false Wits among the Ancients and in this shall give the Reader two or three other Species of them that flourished in the same early Ages of the World The first I shall produce are the Life, ramn aluts<sup>2</sup> or Letter droppers of Antiquity, that would take an Exception, without any Reason, against some particular Letter in the Alphabet, so as not to admit it once into a whole Poem One Tryphiodorus was a great Master in this kind of Writing He composed an Odyssey or Epick Poem on the Adventures of Ulysses, consisting of four and twenty Books having entirely banished the Letter A from his first Book, which was called Alpha (as Lucus a non Lucendo) because there was not an Alpha in it His second Book was inscribed Beta for the same Reason In short, the Poet excluded the whole four and twenty Letters in their Turns, and shewed them, one after another, that he could do his Business without them

It must have been very pleasant to have seen this Poet avoiding the reprobate Letter, as much as ano her would a false Quantity, and making his Escape from it through the several Greek Dialects, when he was pressed with it in any particular Syllable For the most apt and elegant Word in the whole Language was rejected, like a Diamond with a Flaw in it, if it appeared blemished with a wrong Letter I shall only observe upon this Head, that if the Work I have here mentioned had been now extant the Odyssey of Tryphiodorus, in all probability, would have been often quoted by our learned Pedants, than the Odyssey of Homer What a perpetual Fund would it have been of obsolete Words and Phrases, unusual Barbarisms, and Rusticities, absurd Spell words and complicated Dialects I make no question but it would have been looked upon as one of the most valuable Treasures of the Greek Tongue

I find likewise among the Ancients that ingenious kind of Conceit, which the Moderns distinguish by the Name of a Kelus,<sup>3</sup> that does not sink a Letter but a whole Word, by substituting a Picture in its Place When Cassius was one of the Masters of the Roman Verse, he placed the Figure of an Elephant upon the Reverse of the Publick Money the Word Cassius signifying an Elephant in the Punic Language This was triflingly contrived by Cassius, because it was not lawful for a private Man to stamp his own Figure upon the Coin of the Commonwealth Cicero, who was so called from the Founder of his Family, that was marked on the Nose with a little Wen like a Vetch (which is Cicer in Latin) instead of Marcus Sullus Cicero, ordered the Words Marcus Sullus with the Figure of a Vetch at the End of them to be inscribed on a publick Monument<sup>4</sup>

grammarian verse is said to have been the Greek poet Lasius, born in Ael 171 538 u c. Lope de Vega wrote five novels, each with one of the five vowels excluded from it

<sup>2</sup> From Antro I omit, γρημα a letter In modern literature there is a Pan-na Porconum picture of which every word begins with a p and there are Spanish odes from which all vowels but one are omitted The earliest writer of Epigrams

The Poet rung the [changes<sup>1</sup>] upon these eight several Words, and by that Means rinde his Verses almost as numerous as the Virtues and the Stars which they celebrated. It is no wonder that Men who had so much Time upon their Hands did not only restore all the antiquated Pieces of false Wit, but enriched the World with Inventions of their own. It was to this Age that we owe the Production of Anagrams,<sup>2</sup> which is nothing else but a Transmutation of one Word into another, or the turning of the same Set of Letters into different Words, which may change Night into Day, or Black into White, if Chance, who is the Goddess that presides over these Sorts of Composition, shall so direct. I remember a witty Author, in Allusion to this kind of Writing, calls his Rival, who (it seems) was distorted, and had his Limbs set in Places that did not properly belong to them, The Anagram of a Man.

When the Anagrammatist takes a Name to work upon, he considers it at first as a Mine not broken up, which will not shew the Treasure it contains till he shall have spent many Hours in the Search of it. For it is his Business to find out one Word that conceals it self in another, and to examine the Letters in all the Variety of Stations in which they can possibly be ranged. I have heard of a Gentleman who, when this Kind of Wit was in fashion, endeavoured to gain his Mistress's Heart by it. She was one of the finest Women of her Age, and [known<sup>3</sup>] by the Name of the Lady Mary Boon. The Lover not being able to make any thing of Mary, by certain Liberties indulged to this kind of Writing, converted it into Moll, and after having shut himself up for half a Year, with indefatigable Industry produced in Anagram. Upon the presenting it to his Mistress, who was a little vexed in her Heart to see herself degraded into Moll Boon, she told him, to his infinite Surprise, that he had mistaken her Surname, for that it was not Boon but Bolun.

—*Ibi omnis
Effusus labor*—

The lover was thunder-struck with his Misfortune, inasmuch that in a little time after he lost his Senses, which indeed had been very much impaired by that continual Application he had given to his Anagram.

The Acrostick<sup>4</sup> was probably invented about the same time with the Anagram, tho' it is impossible to decide whether the Inventor of the one or the other [were<sup>1</sup>] the greater Blockhead. The Simple Acrostick is nothing but the Name or Title of a Person or Thing made out of the initial Letters of several Verses, and by that Means written, after the Manner of the Chinese, in a perpendicular Line. But besides these there are Compound Acrosticks, where the principal Letters stand two or three deep. I have seen some of them where the Verses have not only been edged by a Name at each Extremity, but have had the same Name running down like a Seam through the Middle of the Poem.

There is another near Relation of the Anagrams and Acrosticks, which is commonly called<sup>2</sup> a Chronogram. This kind of Wit appears very often on many modern Medals, especially those of Germany,<sup>3</sup> when they represent in the Inscription the Year in which they were coined. Thus we see on a Medal of Gustavus Adolphus the following Words, CHRISTVS DUX ERGO TRI-VMPHVS. If you take the pawns to pick the Figures out of the several Words, and range them in their proper Order, you will find they amount to MDCXVVII, or 1627, the Year in which the Medal was stamped. For as some of the Letters distinguish themselves from the rest, and overtop their Fellows, they are to be considered in a double Capacity, both as Letters and as Figures. Your laborious German Wits will turn over a whole Dictionary for one of these ingenious Devices. A Man would think they were searching after an apt classical Term, but instead of that they are looking out a Word that has an L, and M, or a D in it. When therefore we meet with any of these Inscriptions, we are not so much to look in 'em for the Thought, as for the Year of the Lord.

The Bouts Rimés were the Favourites of the French Nation for a whole Age together, and that at a Time when it abounded in Wit and Learning. They were a List of Words that rhyme to one another, drawn up by another Hand, and given to a Poet, who was to make a Poem to the Rhymes in the same Order that they were placed upon the List. The more uncommon the Rhymes were, the more extraordinary was the Genius of the Poet that could accommodate his Verses to them. I do not know any greater Instance of the Decay of Wit and Learning among the French (which generally follows the Declension of Empire) than the endeavouring to restore this foolish Kind of Wit. If the Reader

<sup>3</sup> The Chronogram was popular also, especially among the Germans, for inscriptions upon marble or in books. More than once, also, in Germany and Belgium a poem was written in a hundred hexameters, each yielding a chronogram of the date it was to celebrate.

<sup>4</sup> Bouts rimés are said to have been suggested to the wits of Paris by the complaint of a verse turner named Dulot, who grieved one day over the loss of three hundred sonnets and when surprise was expressed at the large number, said they were the 'rhymed ends,' that only wanted filling up.

<sup>2</sup> This is an error. Ἀνάγραμμα meant in old Greek what it now means. Lycophrion, who lived B.C. 280, and wrote a Greek poem on Cissandra, was famous for his Anagrams, of which two survive. The Cabalists had a branch of their study called Themura, changing, which made mystical anagrams of sacred names.

some time or other signalized themselves by a Clinch, or a Conundrum. It was therefore in this Age that the Punn appeared with Pomp and Dignity. It had before been admitted into merry Speeches and ludicrous Compositions, but was now delivered with great Gravity from the Pulpit, or pronounced in the most solemn manner at the Council Table. The greatest Authors, in their most serious Works, made frequent use of Puns. The Sermons of Bishop Andrews, and the Tragedies of Shakespeare, are full of them. The Sinner was punned into Repentance by the former, as in the latter nothing is more usual than to see a Hero weeping and quibbling for a dozen Lines together.

I must add to these great Authorities, which seem to have given a kind of Sanction to this Piece of false Wit, that all the Writers of Rheturick have treated of Punning with very great Respect, and divided the several kinds of it into hard Names, that are reckoned among the Figures of Speech, and recommended as Ornaments in Discourse. I remember a Country School master of my Acquaintance told me once, that he had been in Company with a Gentleman whom he looked upon to be the greatest Paragrammatist among the Moderns. Upon Inquiry, I found my learned Friend had dined that Day with Mr Swan, the famous Punnster, and desiring him to give me some Account of Mr Swan's Conversation, he told me that he generally talked in the Paranomasia, that he sometimes gave into the Ploce, but that in his humble Opinion he shined most in the Antianacrisis.

I must not here omit, that a famous University of this Land was formerly very much infested with Puns, but whether or no this might not arise from the Fens and Marshes in which it was situated, and which are now drained. I must leave to the Determination of more skilful Naturalists.

After this short History of Punning, one would wonder how it should be so entirely banished out of the Learned World, as it is at present, especially since it had found a Place in the Writings of the most ancient Polite Authors. To account for this, we must consider, that the first Race of Authors, who were the great Heroes in Writing, were destitute of all Rules and Arts of Criticism, and for that Reason, though they excel later Writers in Greatness of Genius, they fall short of them in Accuracy and Correctness. The Moderns cannot reach their Beauties, but can avoid their Imperfections. When the World was furnished with these Authors of the first Eminence, there grew up another Set of Writers, who gained themselves a Reputation by the Remarks which they made on the Works of those who preceded them. It was one of the Employments of these Secondary Authors, to distinguish the several kinds of Wit by Terms of Art, and to consider them as more or less perfect, according as they were founded in Truth. It is no wonder therefore, that even such Authors as Isocrates, Plato, and Cicero, should have such little Blemishes as are not to be met with in Authors of a much inferior Character, who have written since those several Characters were discovered. I do not find that there was a proper Separation made between Puns and [true] Wit by any of the Ancient Authors, except Quintilian and Longinus. But when this Distinction was once settled, it was very natural for all Men of Sense to agree in it. As for the Revival of this false Wit, it happened about the time of the Revival of Letters, but as soon as it was once detected, it immediately vanished and disappeared. At the same time there is no question, but as it has sunk in one Age and rose in another, it will again recover it self in some distant Period of Time, as Pedantry and Ignorance shall prevail upon Wit and Sense. And, to speak the Truth, I do very much apprehend, by some of the last Winter's Productions, which had their Sets of Admirers, that our Posterity will in a few Years degenerate into a Race of Punnsters. At least, a Man may be very excusable for any Apprehensions of this kind, that has seen Acrosticks handed about the Town with great Secrecy and Applause to which I must also add a little Epigram called the Witches Prayer, that fell into Verse when it was read either backward or forward, excepting only that it Cursed one way and Blessed the other. When one sees there are actually such Puns takers among our British Wits, who can tell what it may end in? If we must Lash one another, let it be with the manly Strokes of Wit and Satyr for I am of the old Philosopher's Opinion, that if I must suffer from one or the other, I would rather it should be from the Paw of a Lion, than the Hoof of an Ass. I do not speak this out of any Spirit of Party. There is a most crying Dulcness on both Sides. I have seen forty Acrosticks and Whig Anagrams, and do not quarrel with either of them, because they are Whigs or Tories, but because they are Anagrams and Acrosticks.

But to return to Punning. Having pursued the History of a Punn, from its Original to its Down-fall, I shall here define it to be a Conceit arising from the use of two Words that agree in the Sound, but differ in the Sense. The only way therefore to try a Piece of Wit, is to translate it into a different Language. If it bears the Test, you may pronounce it true. But if it vanishes in the Experiment, you may conclude it to have been a Punn. In short, one may say of a Punn, as the Countryman described his Nightingale, that it is vox et preterea nihil, a Sound, and nothing but a Sound. On the contrary, one may represent true Wit by the Description which Aristmetus makes of a fine Woman, when she is dressed she is Beautiful, when she is undressed she is Beautiful, or as Mercerus has translated it [more Emphatically] Induitur, formosa est Exuitur, ipsa forma est. MR Lock has an admirable Reflexion upon the Difference of Wit and Judgment, wherein he ends two ways to shew the Reason why they are not always the Talents of the same Person. His Words are as follow. And hence, perhaps, may be given so no Reason of that common Observation that Men who have a great deal of Wit and prompt Memories, have not always the clearest Judgments, or deepest Reason. For it lying most in the Assemblage of Ideas, as in putting those together with Quickness and Variety, wherein can be found any Resemblance or Congruity, thereby to make up pleasant Pictures and agreeable Images in the Fancy. Judgment, on the contrary, lies quite on the other Side, in separating carefully one from another, Ideas wherein can be found the least Difference, thereby to avoid being misled by Similitude, and by Whynity to take one thing for another. This is a way of proceeding quite contrary to Metaphor and Allusion wherein, for the most part, lies that Entertain'd and Pleasant way of Wit which strikes so lively on the Fancy, and is therefore so acceptable to all People.

This is, I think, the best and most Philosophical Account that I have ever met with of Wit, which generally, though not always, consists in such a Resemblance and Congruity of Ideas as this Author mentions. I shall only add to it, by way of Explanation, that every Resemblance of Ideas is not that which we call Wit, unless it be such an one that gives Delight and Surprise to the Reader. These two Properties seem essential to Wit, more particularly the first of them. In order therefore that the Resemblance in the Ideas be Wit, it is necessary that the Ideas should not lie too near one another in the Nature of things for where the Likeness is obvious, it gives no Surprise. To compare one Man's Singing to that of another, or to represent the Whiteness of any Object by that of Milk and Snow, or the Variety of its Colours by those of the Rainbow, cannot be called Wit, unless besides this obvious Resemblance, there be some further Congruity discovered in the two Ideas that is capable of giving the Reader some Surprise. Thus when a Poet tells us, the Bosom of his Mistress is as white as Snow, there is no Wit in the Comparison but when he adds, with a Sigh, that it is as cold too, it then grows into Wit. Every Reader's Memory may supply him with innumerable Instances of the same Nature. For this Reason, the Similitudes in Heroick Poets, who entertain rather to fill the Mind with great Conceptions, than to divert it with such as are new and surprising, have seldom any thing in them that can be called Wit. Mr Lock's Account of Wit with this short Explanation, comprehends most of the Species of Wit, as Metaphors, Similitudes, Allegories, Aenigmas, Motifs, Parables, Fables, Dreams, Visions, dramatick Writings, Burlesque, and all the Methods of Allusion. As there are many other Pieces of Wit, (how remote soever they may appear at first sight, from the foregoing Description) which upon Examination will be found to agree with it.

As true Wit generally consists in this Resemblance and Congruity of Ideas, false Wit chiefly consists in the Resemblance and Congruity sometimes of single Letters, as in Anagrams, Chronograms, Lipograms, and Acrosticks. Sometimes of Syllables, as in Echoes and Doggerel Rhymes. Sometimes of Words, as in Puns and Quibbles and sometimes of whole Sentences or Poems, as in the Figures of Eggs, Axes, or Altars. Nay, some carry the Notion of Wit so far, as to ascribe it even to external Mimicry and to look upon a Man as an ingenious Person, that can resemble the Tone, Posture, or Face of another.

As true Wit consists in the Resemblance of Ideas, and false Wit in the Resemblance of Words according to the foregoing Instances, there is another kind of Wit which consists partly in the Resemblance of Ideas, and partly in the Resemblance of Words, which for Distinction Sake I shall call mixt Wit. This kind of Wit is that which abounds in Covseley, more than in any Author that ever wrote. Mr Waller has likewise a great deal of it. Mr Dryden is very sparing in it. Milton had a Genius much above it. Spencer is in the same Class with Milton. The Italians, even in their Epic Poetry, are full of it. Monsieur Boileau, who formed himself upon the Ancient Poets, has every where rejected it with Scorn. If we look after mixt Wit among the Greek Writers, we shall find it no where but in the Epigrammatists. There are indeed some Strokes of it in the little Poem ascribed to Musaeus, which by that, as well as many other Marks, betrays it self to be a modern Composition. If we look into the Latin Writers, we find none of this mixt Wit in Virgil, Lucretius, or Catullus, very little in Horace, but a great deal of it in Ovid, and scarce any thing else in Martial.

Out of the innumerable Branches of mixt Wit, I shall choose one Instance which may be met with in all the Writers of this Class. The Passion of Love in its Nature has been thought to resemble a Fire for which Reason the Words Fire and Flame are made use of to signify Love. The witty Poets therefore have taken an Advantage from the doubtful Meaning of the Word Fire, to make an infinite Number of Witteisms. Covseley observing the cold Regard of his Mistress's Eyes, and at the same Time their Power of producing Love in him, considers them as Burning Glasses made of Ice and finding himself able to live in the greatest Extremities of Love, concludes the Torrid Zone to be habitable. When his Mistress has read his Letter written in Juice of Lemon by holding it to the Fire, he desires her to read it over a second time by Love's Flames. When she weeps, he wishes it were inward Heat that distilled those Drops from the Limbeck. When she is absent he is beyond eighty, that is, thirty Degrees nearer the Pole than when she is with him. His ambitious Love is a Fire that naturally mounts upwards his happy Love is the Beams of Heaven, and his unhappy Love Flames of Hell. When it does not let him sleep, it is a Flame that sends up no Smoke when it is opposed by Counsel and Advice, it is a Fire that rages the more by the Wind's blowing upon it. Upon the dying of a Tree in which he had cut his Loves, he observes that his written Flames had burnt up and withered the Fire. When he resolves to give over his Passion, he tells us that one burnt like him for ever dreads the Fire. His Heart is an Albion, that instead of Vulcan's Shop encloses Cupid's Forge in it. His endeavouring to drown his Love in Wine, is throwing Oil upon the Fire. He would insinuate to his Mistress, that the Fire of Love, like that of the Sun (which produces so many living Creatures) should not only warm but burnet Love in another Place cooks Pleasure at his Fire. Sometimes the Poet's Heart is frozen in every Breast, and sometimes scorched in every Eye. Sometimes he is drowned in Tears, and burnt in Love, like a Ship set on Fire in the Middle of the Sea.

The Reader may observe in every one of these Instances, that the Poet mixes the Qualities of Fire with those of Love: and in the same Sentence speaking of it both as a Passion and as real Fire, surprises the Reader with those seeming Resemblances or Contradictions that make up all the Wit in this kind of Writing. Mist Wit therefore is a Composition of Funn and true Wit, and is more or less perfect as the Resemblance lies in the Ideas or in the Words. Its Foundations are laid partly in Falsehood and partly in Truth. Reason puts in her Claim for one Half of it, and Extravagance for the other. The only Province therefore for this kind of Wit, is Epigram, or those little occasional Poems that in their own Nature are nothing else but a Tissue of Epigrams. I cannot conclude this Head of mist Wit, without owning that the admirable Poet out of whom I have taken the Examples of it, had as much true Wit as any Author that ever writ, and indeed all other Talents of an extraordinary Genius.

It may be expected, since I am upon this Subject, that I should take notice of Mr Dryden's Definition of Wit which, with all the Difference that is due to the Judgment of so great a Man, is not so properly a Definition of Wit, as of good writing in general. Wit, as he defines it, is 'a Propriety of Words and Thoughts adapted to the Subject'. If this be a true Definit on of Wit, I am apt to think that Eschylus (was) the greatest Wit that ever set Pen to Paper. It is certain that never was a greater Propriety of Words and Thoughts adapted to the Subject, than what that Author has made use of in his Elements. I shall only appeal to my Reader, if this Definition agrees with any Notion he has of Wit. If it be a true one I am sure Mr Dryden was not only a better Poet, but a greater Wit than Mr Corneille, and Virgil a much more frictions Man than either Ovid or Marshall.

Bouhours, whom I look upon to be the most penetrating of all the French Critics, has taken

'If Wit has truly been defined as a Propriety of Thoughts and Words then that definition will extend to all sorts of Poetry. Propriety of Thought is that Fancy which arises naturally from the Subject, or which the Poet adapts to it. Propriety of Words is the clothing of these Thoughts with such Expressions as are naturally proper to them.'—Dryden's Preface to Albion and Iliadis 2 [12]

pains to show, that it is impossible for any Thought to be beautiful which is not just, and has not its foundation in the Nature of things. That the Basis of all Wit is Truth and that no Thought can be valuable, of which good Sense is not the Ground work. Boileau has endeavoured to inculcate the same Notions in several Parts of his Writings, both in Prose and Verse. This is that natural Way of Writing, that beautiful Simplicity, which we so much admire in the Compositions of the Ancients and which no Body derives from, but those who want Strength of Genius to imitate. I thought shine in its own natural Plainness. Poets who want this Strength of Genius to give that Mystical Simplicity to Nature, which we so much admire in the Works of the Ancients, are forced to hunt after flourish and Ornaments, and not to let any Piece of Wit of what kind soever escape them. I look upon these writers as Goff's in Poetry, who, like those in Architecture, not being able to come up to the beautiful Simplicity of the old Greeks and Romans, have endeavoured to supply its place with all the Extravagancies of an irregular Fancy. Mr Dryden makes a very handsome Observation, on Ovid's writing a Letter from Dido to Aeneas, in the following Words: 'Ovid,' says he, (speaking of Virgil's Iliad) of Dido and Aeneas 'takes it up after him, and

<sup>1</sup> Doninique Bouhours, a learned and accomplished Jesuit, who died in 1702, aged 75, was a Professor of the Humanities, in Paris, till the Licadachus by which he was tormented until death compelled him to resign his chair. He was afterwards tutor to the two young Princes of Longueville, and to the son of the minister Colbert. His best book was translated into English in 1705, as 'The Art of Criticism or the Method of making a Right Judgment upon Subjects of Wit and Learning translated from the best Edition of the French, of the famous Father Bouhours, b, a Person of Quality. In Four Dialogues.' Here he says 'Truth is the first Quality, and, as it were, the foundation of Thought the fairest is the faultiest or, rather, those which pass for the fairest, are not really so, if they want this Foundation. I do not understand your Doctrine,' replies Philanthus, and I can scarce persuade myself that a witty Thought should be as it is founded on Truth. On the contrary, I am of the opinion of a famous Critic (i.e. Vassor in his book on Epigrams) that falsehood gives it often all its Grace, and is, as it were, the Soul of it,' &c., pp. 6, 7, and the following 'in the same Age, and makes an Ancient Heroine of Virgil's new created Dido, dictates a Letter for her just before her Death to the ungrateful Fugitive, and, very unluckily for himself, is for measuring a Sword with a Man so much superior in Force to him on the same Subject. I think I may be Judge of this, because I have translated both. The famous Author of the Art of Love has nothing of his own, he borrows all from a greater Master in his own Profession, and, which is worse, improves nothing which he finds. Nature fails him, and being forced to his old Shift, he has Recourse to Witicism. This passes indeed with his soft Admirers, and gives him the Preference to Virgil in their Esteem.

Were not I surprised by so great an Authority as that of Mr Dryden, I should not venture to observe, That the Taste of most of our English Poets, as well as Readers, is extremely Gothic. He quotes Monsieur Segrais<sup>2</sup> for a threefold Distinction of the Readers of Poetry. In the first of which he comprehends the Rabble of Readers, whom he does not treat as such with regard to their Quality, but to their Numbers and Coarseness of their Taste. His Words are as follow: 'Segrais has distinguished the Readers of Poetry, according to their Capacity of judging, into three Classes (He might have said the same of Writers too, if he had pleased.) In the lowest Form he places those whom he calls Les Petits Esprits, such things as are our Upper Gallery Audience in a Play-house, who like nothing but the Husk and Rind of Wit, prefer a Quibble, a Conceit, an Epigram, before solid Sense and elegant Expression. These are Mob Readers. If Virgil and Martial stood for Parliament-Men, we know already who would carry it. But though they make the greatest Appearance in the Field, and cry the loudest, the best on't is they are but a sort of French Huguenots, or Dutch Boors, brought over in Herds, but not <sup>2</sup> Jean Regnauld de Segrais, b 1634, d 1701, was of Caen, where he was trained by Jesuits for the Church but took to Literature, and sought thereby to support four brothers and two sisters, reduced to want by the dissipations of his father. He wrote, as a youth, odes, songs, a tragedy, and part of a romance. Attraction, at the age of 20, the attention of a noble patron, he became, in 1647, and remained for the next 24 years, attached to the household of Mlle de Montpensier. He was a favoured guest among the Précieuses of the Hôtel Rambouillet, and was styled, for his acquired ut bon ton, the Voiture of Caen. In 1671 he was received by Mlle de La Fayette. In 1676 he married a rich wife, at Caen, his native town, where he settled and revived the local 'Academy.' Among his works were translations into French verse of the Aeneid and Georgics. In the dedication of his own translation of the Aeneid by an elaborate essay to Lord Normanby, Dryden refers much, and with high respect, to the dissertation prefixed by Segrais to his French version, and towards the end (on p 80 where the essay occupies 100 pages), writes as above quoted. The first parenthesis is part of the quotation.

'Naturalized, who have not Lands of two Pounds per Annum in Parnassus, and therefore are not privileged to poll. Their Authors are of the same Level, fit to represent them on a Mountebank's Stage, or to be Masters of the Ceremonies in a Bear-garden. Yet these are they who have the most Admirers. But it often happens, to their Mortification, that as their Readers improve their Stock of Sense, (as they may by reading better Books, and by Conversation with Men of Judgment) they soon forsake them.'

I [must not dismiss this Subject without<sup>3</sup>] observing that as Mr Lock in the Passage above-mentioned has discovered the most fruitful Source of Wit, so there is another of a quite contrary Nature to it, which does likewise branch it self out into several kinds. For not only the Resemblance, but the Opposition of Ideas, does very often produce Wit as I could shew in several little Points, Turns and Antitheses, that I may possibly enlarge upon in some future Speculation. IT is very hard for the Mind to disengage it self from a Subject in which it has been long employed. The Thoughts will be rising of themselves from time to time, tho' we give them no Encouragement, as the Tossings and Fluctuations of the Sea continue several Hours after the Winds are laid.

It is to this that I impute my last Night's Dream or Vision, which formed into one continued Allegory the several Schemes of Wit, whether False, Mixed, or True, that have been the Subject of my late Papers.

Methoughts I was transported into a Country that was filled with Prodiges and Enchantments, governed by the Goddess of FALSEHOOD, entitled the Region of False Wit. There is nothing in the Fields, the Woods, and the Rivers, that appeared natural. Several of the Trees blossomed in Leaf Gold, some of them produced Bone-Lace, and some of them precious Stones. The Fountains bubbled in an Opera Tune, and were filled with Stags, Wild-Boars, and Mermaids, that lived among the Waters, at the same time that Dolphins and several kinds of Fish played upon the Banks or took their Pastime in the Meadows. The Birds had many of them golden Beaks, and human Voices. The Flowers perfumed the Air.

with Smells of Incense, Amber greese, and Pulvillios<sup>1</sup> and were so interwoven with one another, that they grew up in Pieces of Embroidery. The Winds were filled with Sighs and Messages of distant Lovers. As I was walking to and fro in this enchanted Wilderness, I could not forbear breaking out into Soliloquies upon the several Wonders which lay before me, when, to my great Surprise, I found there were artificial Echoes in every Walk, that by Repetitions of certain Words which I spoke, agreed with me, or contradicted me, in every thing I said. In the midst of my Conversation with these invisible Companions, I discovered in the Centre of a very dark Grove a monstrous Fabrick built after the Gothick manner, and covered with innumerable Devices in that barbarous kind of Sculpture. I immediately went up to it, and found it to be a kind of Heathen Temple consecrated to the God of Dullness. Upon my Entrance I saw the Deity of the Place dressed in the Habit of a Monk, with a Book in one Hand and a Rattle in the other. Upon his right Hand was Industry, with a Lamp burning before her and on his left Caprice, with a Monkey sitting on her Shoulder. Before his Feet there stood an Altar of a very odd Make, which, as I afterwards found, was shap'd in that manner to comply with the Inscription that surrounded it. Upon the Altar there lay several Offerings of Axes, Wings, and Eggs, cut in Paper, and inscribed with Verses. The Temple was filled with Votaries, who applied themselves to different Diversions, as their Fancies directed them. In one part of it I saw a Regiment of Anagrams, who were continually in motion, turning to the Right or to the Left, facing about, doubling their Ranks, shifting their Stations, and throwing themselves into all the Figures and Counter marches of the most changeable and perplexed Exercise.

Not far from these was a Body of Acrosticks, made up of very disproportioned Persons. It was disposed into three Columns, the Officers planting themselves in a Line on the left Hand of each Column. The Officers were all of them at least Six Foot high, and made three Rows of very proper Men but the Common Soldiers, who filled up the Spaces between the Officers, were such Dwarfs, Cripples, and Scarcerous, that one could hardly look upon them without laughing. There were behind the Acrosticks two or three Files of Chronograms, which differed only from the former, as their Officers were equipped (like the Figure of Time) with an Hour glass in one Hand, and a Seythe in the other, and took their Posts promiscuously among the private Men whom they commanded.

In the Body of the Temple, and before the very Face of the Deity, methought I saw the Phantom of Tyrphodorus the Litopogrammist, engaged in a Bill with four and twenty Persons, who pursued him by Turns thro' all the Intricacies and Labyrinths of a Country Dance, without being able to overtake him.

Observing several to be very basic at the Western End of the Temple, I inquired into what they were doing, and found there was in that Quarter the great Magazine of Rebus's. These were several Things of the most different Natures tied up in Bundles, and thrown upon one another in heaps like Faggots. You might behold an Anchor, a Night rail, and a Hobby horse bound up together. One of the Workmen seeing me very much surprized, told me, there was an infinite deal of Wit in several of those Bundles, and that he would explain them to me if I pleased. I thanked him for his Civility, but told him I was in very great haste at that time. As I was going out of the Temple, I observed in one Corner of it a Cluster of Men and Women hugging very heartily, and diverting themselves at a Game of Crambo. I heard several Double Rhymes as I passed by them, which roused a great deal of Mirth.

Not far from these was another Set of merry People engaged at a Diversion, in which the whole Jest was to mistake one Person for another. To give Occasion for these ludicrous Mistakes, they were divided into Pairs, every Pair being covered from Head to Foot with the same kind of Dress, though perhaps, there was not the least Resemblance in their Faces. By this means an old Man was sometimes mistaken for a Boy, a Woman for a Man, and a Black a moor for an European, which very often produced great Perls of Laughter. These I guessed to be a Party of Puns. But being very desirous to get out of this World of Magic, which had almost turned my Brain, I left the Temple, and crossed over the Fields that lay about it with all the Speed I could make. I was not gone far before I heard the Sound of Trumpets and Alarms, which seemed to proclaim the March of an Enemy and as I afterwards found, was in reality what I apprehended it. There appeared at a great Distance a very shining Light, and, in the midst of it a Person of a most beautiful Aspect her Name was TRUTH. On her right Hand there marched a Male Deity, who bore several Quivers on his Shoulders, and grasped several Arrows in his Hand. His Name was WIT. The Approach of these two Enemies filled all the Territories of False Wit with an unspeakable Consternation, insomuch that the Goddess of those Regions, appeared in Person upon her Frontiers, with the several inferior Deities, and the different Bodies of Forces which I had before seen in the Temple, who were now drawn up in Array, and prepared to give their Foes a warm Reception. As the March of the Enemy was very slow, it gave time to the several Inhabitants who bordered upon the Regions of FALSEHOOD to draw their Forces into a Body with a Design to stand upon their Guard as Sentinels, and attend the Issue of the Combat.

I must here inform my Reader, that the Frontiers of the Enchanted Region which I have before described, were inhabited by the Species of MIXED WIT, who made a very odd Appearance when they were mustered together in an Army. There were Men whose Bodies were stuck full of Dirt, and Women whose Eyes were Burning glasses. Men that had Harts of Fire, and

Women that had Breasts of Snow It would be endless to describe several Monsters of the like Nature, that composed this great Army which immediately fell to pieces and divided itself into two Parts, the one half throwing themselves behind the Banners of TRUTH, and the others behind those of FALSHOOD

The Goddess of FALSHOOD was of a Gigantick Stature, and advanced some Paces before the Front of her Army but as the dazling Light, which shined from TRUTH, began to shine upon her, she faded insensibly insomuch that in a little Space she looked rather like an huge Phantasm, than a real Substance At length, as the Goddess of TRUTH approached still nearer to her, she fell away entirely, and vanished amidst the Brightness of her Presence so that there did not remain the least Trace or Impression of her Figure in the Place where she had been seen

As at the rising of the Sun the Constellations grow thin, and the Stars go out one after another, till the whole Hemisphere is extinguished such was the vanishing of the Goddess And not only of the Goddess her self, but of the whole Army that attended her, which sympathized with their Leader, and shrunk into Nothing, in proportion as the Goddess disappeared At the same time the whole Temple sunk, the Fish betook themselves to the Streams, and the wild Beasts to the Woods The Fountains recovered their Murmurs, the Birds their Voices, the Trees their Leaves, the Flowers their Scents, and the whole Face of Nature its true and genuine Appearance Tho' I still continued asleep, I fancied myself as it were awakened out of a Dream, when I saw this Region of Prodiges restored to Woods and Rivers, Fields and Meadows

Upon the removal of that wild Scene of Wonder, which had very much disturbed my Imagination, I took a full Survey of the Persons of WIT and WITNESS for indeed it was impossible to look upon the first without seeing the other at the same time There was behind them a strong and compact Body of Figures The Genius of Heroic Poetry appeared with a Sword in her Hand, and a Laurel on her Head Tragedy was crowned with Cypress, and covered with Robes dipped in Blood Satyr had Smiles in her Look, and a Dagger under her Garment Rhetorick was known by her Thunderbolt and Comedy by her Mask After several other Figures, Epicram marched up in the Rear, who had been posted there at the Beginning of the Expedition, that he might not revolt to the Enemy, whom he was suspected to favour in his Heart I was very much moved and delighted with the Appearance of the God of WIT there was something so amiable and yet so piercing in his Looks, as inspired me at once with Love and Terror As I was gazing on him, to my insupportable Joy, he took a Quiver of Arrows from his Shoulder, in order to make me a Present of it, but as I was reaching out my Hand to receive it of him, I knocked it against a Chair, and by that means awaked

THE most improper things we commit in the Conduct of our Lives, we are led into by the Force of Fashion Instances might be given, in which a prevailing Custom makes us set against the Rules of Nature, Law and common Sense but at present I shall confine my Consideration of the Effect it has upon Men's Minds, by looking into our Behaviour when it is the Fashion to go into Mourning The Custom of representing the Grief we have for the Loss of the Dead by our Habits, certainly had its Rise from the real sorrow of such as were too much distressed to take the proper Cure they ought of their Dress By Degrees it prevailed, that such as had this inward Oppression upon their Minds, made an Apology for not joining with the rest of the World in their ordinary Diversions, by a Dress suited to their Condition This therefore was at first assumed by such only as were under real Distress to whom it was a Relief that they had nothing about them so light and gay as to be irksome to the Gloom and Melancholy of their inward Reflections, or that might misrepresent them to others In process of time this laudable Distinction of the Sorrowful was lost and Mourning is now worn by Heirs and Widows You see nothing but Magnificence and Solemnity in the Equipage of the Heir, and an Air [of] Release from Servitude in the Pomp of a Son who has lost a wealthy Father This Fashion of Sorrow is now become a generous Part of the Ceremonial between Princes and Sovereigns, who in the Language of all Nations are stiled Brothers to each other, and put on the Purple upon the Death of any Potentate with whom they live in Amity Courtiers, and all who wish themselves such, are immediately seized with Grief from Head to Foot upon this Disaster to their Prince so that one may know by the very Buckles of a Gentleman's Usher, what Degree of Friendship any deceased Monarch maintained with the Court to which he belongs A good Courtier's Habit and Behaviour is hieroglyphical on these Occasions He dwells much in Whispers, and you may see he dresses accordingly to the best Intelligence

The general Affectation among Men, of appearing greater than they are, makes the whole World run into the Habit of the Court You see the Lady, who the Day before was as various as a Rainbow, upon the Time appointed for beginning to mourn, as dark as a Cloud This Humour does not prevail only on those whose Fortunes can support any Change in their Equipage, not on those only whose Incomes demand the Wantonness of new Apparels but on such also who have just enough to cloath them An old Acquaintance of mine, of Ninety Pounds a Year, who has naturally the Vanity of being a Man of Fashion deep at his Heart, is very much put to it to bear the Mortality of Princes. He made a new black Suit upon the Death of the King of Spain, he turned it for the King of Portugal, and he now keeps his Chamber while it is scouring for the Emperor. He is a good Oeconomist in his Extravagance, and makes only a fresh black Button upon his Iron-gray Suit for any Potentite of small Territories: he indeed adds his Cripe Hatband for a Prince whose Exploits he has adured in the Gazette. But whatever Compliments may be made on these Occasions, the true Mourners are the Mercers, Silkmens, Lacemen and Millners. A Prince of merciful and royal Disposition would reflect with great Anxiety upon the Prospect of his Death, if he considered what Numbers would be reduced to Misery by that Accident only. He would think it of Moment enough to direct, that in the Notification of his Departure, the Honour done to him might be restrined to those of the Household of the Prince to whom it should be signified. He would think a general Mourning to be in a less Degree the same Ceremony which is practised in barbarous Nations, of killing their Slaves to attend the Obsequies of their Kings.

I had been wonderfully at a Loss for many Months together, to guess at the Character of a Man who came now and then to our Coffee-house. He ever ended a News paper with this Reflection, Well, I see all the Foreign Princes are in good Health. If you asked, Pray, Sir, what says the Postman from Vienna? he answered, Make us thankful, the German Princes are all well. What does he say from Barcelona? He does not speak but that the Country agrees very well with the new Queen. After very much Enquiry, I found this Man of universal Loyalty was a wholesale Dealer in Silks and Ribbons. His Way is, it seems, if he hires a Weaver, or Workman, to have it inserted in his Articles, 'That all this shall be well and truly performed, provided no foreign Potentate shall depart this Life within the Time above-mentioned.' It happens in all publick Mourning, that the many Trades which depend upon our Habits, are during that Folly either pinched with present Want, or terrified with the apparent Approach of it. All the Atonement which Men can make for wintion Expences (which is a sort of insulting the Scarcity under which others labour) is, that the Superfluities of the Wealthy give Supplies to the Necessities of the Poor: but instead of any other Good arising from the Affectation of being in courtly Habits of Mourning, all Order seems to be destroyed by it and the true Honour which one Court does to another on that Occasion, loses its Force and Efficacy. When a foreign Minister beholds the Court of a Nation (which flourishes in Riches and Plenty) lay aside, upon the Loss of his Master, all Marks of Splendor and Magnificence, though the Head of such a joyful People, he will conceive greater Idea of the Honour done his Master, than when he sees the Generosity of the People in the same Habit. When one is afraid to ask the Wife of a Tradesman whom she has lost of her Family and after some Preparation endeavours to know whom she mourns for, how ridiculous is it to hear her explain her self, 'That we have lost one of the House of Austria.' Princes are elevated so highly above the rest of Mankind, that it is a presumptuous Distinction to take a Part in Honours done to their Memories, except we have Authority for it, by being related in a particular Manner to the Court which pays that Veneration to their Friendship, and seems to express on such an Occasion the Sense of the Uncertainty of human Life in general, by assuming the Habit of Sorrow though in the full possession of Triumph and Royalty. AFTER having at large explained what Wit is, and described the false Appearances of it, all that Labour seems but an useless Enquiry, without some Time be spent in considering the Application of it. The Seat of Wit, when one speaks as a Man of the Town and the World, is the Play house. I shall therefore fill this Paper with Reflections upon the Use of it in that Place. The Application of Wit in the Theatre has as strong an Effect upon the Manners of our Gentlemen, as the Taste of it has upon the Writings of our Authors. It may, perhaps, look like a very presumptuous Work, though not foreign from the Duty of a SPECTATOR, to tax the Writings of such as have long had the general Applause of a Nation. But I shall always make Reason, Truth, and Nature the Measures of Praise and Dispraise, if those are for me, the Generality of Opinion is of no Consequence against me: if they are against me, the general Opinion cannot long support me.

Without further Preface, I am going to look into some of our most applauded Plays, and see whether they deserve the Figure they at present bear in the Imagination of Men, or not.

In reflecting upon these Works, I shall chiefly dwell upon that for which each respective Play is most celebrated. The present Paper shall be employed upon Sir Fopling Flutter. The received Character of this Play is, that it is the

* The death of Charles II. of Spain, which gave occasion for the general war of the Spanish succession, took place in 1700. John V. King of Portugal, died in 1706, and the Emperor Joseph I. died on the 17th of April, 1711, less than a month before this paper was written. The black suit that was now 'scouring for the Emperor' was, therefore, more than ten years old, and had been turned five years ago.

* The Man of Mode, or Sir Fopling Flutter, by Sir George Etherege, produced in 1676. Etherege painted accurately the life and morals of the Restoration, and is said to have represented himself in Bellair Beau Hewit, the son of a Herefordshire Baronet, in Sir Fopling: and to have formed Donnam upon the model of the Earl of Rochester.

Pattern of Genteel Comedy. Dorinda and Husband are the Character of pre-est Consequence, and if these are Low and Mean, the Reputation of the Play is very Unjust.

I will take for granted, that a fine Gentleman should be honest in his Actions, and refined in his Language. Instead of this, our Hero in this Piece is a direct Knave in his Designs, and a Clown in his Language. Fellow is his Admirer and Friend, in return for which, because he is forsooth a greater Wit than his said Friend, he thinks it reasonable to persuade him to marry a young Lady, whose Virtue he thinks, will last no longer than till she is a Wife, and till she cannot but fall to his Share, as he is an irresistible fine Gentleman. The Isthod to Mrs. Leath, and the Paragon of Compliments, over her Atguish for losing him, is another Instance of his Honesty, as well as his Good nature. As to his Language, he calls the Orange-Woman, who, it seems, is inclined to grow fat. At Orange's Fair, till a Taste of Guts to fore her, and salutes her with a prett Phrase of How's it, De little Frisk! Upon the mention of a Country Gentlewoman, whom he knows nothing of, (no one can imagine why) he says by his Wife she is some Archward in the last County. Tea, 'tis not her name above four Dozen of Hours on her Head has adorned her Baldness with a large white Frizz, but she may be Spiritual in the Forefront of the Kitchen box at an old Play. Unnatural Mixture of senseless Common-Place!

As to the Generosity of his Temper he tells his poor Footman, If he did not wait better—he would turn him away, in the insolent Phrase of, I'll wait on you.

Now for Mrs. Hart. She laughs at Obedience to an absent Mother, whose tenderness husband describes to be very exquisite, for that she is so pleased to find me Harriet again, that she can't let her go being out of the way. This witty Daughter, and fine Lady, has so little Respect for this good Woman, that she ridicules her Air in taking Leave and cries In what Struggle is my poor Mother for her? See, see, her Heart tottering, her Eyes staring, and her under Lip trembling. But all this is rationed for, because she has more Wit than is usual in her Sex, and as much Malice, 'tho' she is as wild as you could wish her, and has a Devil in her in her Lee's that it is not to be surpris'd. Then to recommend her as a fit Spouse for his Hero, the Poet makes her speak her Sense of Marriage very ingeniously. I think, says she, I might be brought to endure you, and that it is a reasonable Woman should expect an ill Husband. It is, methinks, unnatural that we are not made to understand how she that was bred under a silly pious old Mother, that would never trust her out of her sight, came to be so Poite.

It cannot be denied, but that the Negligence of every thing, which engages the Attention of the sober and valuable Part of Mankind, appears very well drawn in this Piece. But it is denied, that it is necessary to the Character of a fine Gentleman, that he should in that manner trample upon all Order and Decency. As for the Character of Dorinda, it is more of a Corcomb than that of Fellow. He says of one of his Companions, that a good Correspondence between them is their natural Interest. Speaking of that friend, he declares, their being much together makes the World the better of his Undertaking, as I judge it is for the sake of my Reputation. It makes him pass upon some for a Man of very rare Sense, and he is upon others for a very civil Person.

This whole celebrated Piece is a perfect Contradiction to good Manners, good Sense, and common Honesty, and as there is nothing in it but what is built upon the Ruin of Virtue and Innocence, according to the Notion of Men in this Comedy, I take the Showmaker to be, in reality, the fine Gentleman of the Play. For it seems he is an Atheist, if we may depend upon his Character as given by the Orange-Woman, who is her self far from being the lowest in the Play. She says of a fine Man who is Dorinda's Companion, There is not such another Heathen in the Town, except the Shoe-maker. His Pretension to be the Hero of the Drama appears still more in his own Description of his way of living with his Lady. *There is, says he, never a Man in Town lives more like a Gentleman with his Wife than I do. I never mind her Actions, she never enquires into mine. We speak to one another civilly, but one at other heartily, and because it is vulgar to Lye and Soak together, we lay each of us our several Settle-Bed that of Soak together is as good as if Dorinda had spoken it himself, and, I think, since he puts Human Nature in a ugly a Form as the Circumstances will bear, and is a staunch Unbeliever, he is very much Wronged in having no part of the good Fortune bestowed in the last Act.*

To speak plainly of this whole Work, I think nothing but being lost to a sense of Innocence and Virtue can make any one see this Comedy, without observing more frequent Occasion to move Sorrow and Indignation, than Mirth and Laughter. At the same time I allow it to be Nature, but it is Nature in its utmost Corruption and Degeneracy. R

THREE following Letters are upon a Subject of very great Importance, tho' expressed without an Air of Gravity

To this number of the Spectator is appended the first advertisement of Pope's Essay on Criticism

This Day is published
AN ESSAY ON CRITICISM. Printed for W. Lewis in Russell street Covent Garden and Sold by W. Taylor, at the Ship in Peter Noster Row. T. Osborn, in Gray's Inn near the Walks, J. Graves, in St. James's Street, and T. Morpheus, near Stationers-Hall. Price 2s.

Letter, which, I suppose, is sent me by some substantial Tradesman about Change

SIR,

I am a Man in Years, and by an honest Industry in the World have acquired enough to give my Children a liberal Education, tho' I was an utter Stranger to it myself. My eldest Daughter, a Girl of Sixteen, has for some time been under the Tuition of Monsieur Rigadeon, a Dancing Master in the City, and I was prevailed upon by her and her Mother to go last Night to one of his Balls. I must own to you, Sir, that having never been at any such Place before, I was very much pleased and surprised with that Part of his Entertainment which he called French Dancing. There were several young Men and Women, whose Limbs seemed to have no other Motion, but purely what the Musick gave them. After this Part was over, they began a Diversion which they call Country Dancing, and wherein there were also some things not disagreeable, and divers Emblematical Figures, Compos'd, as I guess, by Wise Men, for the Instruction of Youth.

Among the rest, I observed one, which, I think, they call Hunt the Squirrel, in which while the Woman flies the Man pursues her but as soon as she turns, he runs away, and she is obliged to follow.

The Moral of this Dance does, I think, very aptly recommend Modesty and Discretion to the Female Sex.

But as the best Institutions are liable to Corruptions, so, Sir, I must acquaint you, that very great Abuses are crept into this Entertainment. I was amazed to see my Girl handed by, and finding young Fellows with so much Familiarity and I could not have thought it had been in the Child. They very often made use of a most impudent and lascivious Step called Setting, which I know not how to describe to you, but by telling you that it is the very reverse of Back to Back. At last an impudent young Dog bid the Fiddlers play a Dance called Mol Patsy, and after having made two or three Capers, ran to his Partner, locked his Arms in hers, and whistled her round cleverly above Ground in such manner, that I, who sat upon one of the lowest Benches, saw further above her Shoe than I can think fit to acquaint you with. I could no longer endure these Norminities wherefore just as my Girl was going to be made a Whirligig, I ran in, seized on the Child, and carried her home.

Sir, I am not yet old enough to be a Fool. I suppose this Diversion might be at first invented to keep up a good Understanding between young Men and Women, and so far I am not against it but I shall never allow of these things. I know not what you will say to this Case at present, but am sure that had you been with me you would have seen matter of great Speculation.

I am

Yours, &c.

I must confess I am afraid that my Correspondent had too much Reason to be a little out of Humour at the Treatment of his Daughter, but I conclude that he would have been much more so, had he seen one of those hissing Dances in which Will Honeycomb assures me they are obliged to dwell almost a Minute on the Fair One's Lips, or they will be too quick for the Musick, and dance quite out of Time.

Moll Fentle, was a popular and vigorous dance, dating, at least from 1622

I am not able however to give my final Sentence against this Diversion and am of Mr Covley's Opinion, that so much of Dancing at least as belongs to the Behaviour and an handsome Carriage of the Body, is extremely useful, if not absolutely necessary.

We generally form such Ideas of People at first Sight, as we are hardly ever persuaded to lay aside afterwards. For this Reason, a Man would wish to have nothing disagreeable or uncomely in his Approaches, and to be able to enter a Room with a good Grace.

I might add, that a moderate Knowledge in the little Rules of Good breeding gives a Man some Assurance, and makes him easier in all Companies. For want of this, I have seen a Professor of a Liberal Science at a Loss to salute a Lady and a most excellent Mathematician not able to determine whether he should stand or sit while my Lord drank to him.

It is the proper Business of a Dancing Master to regulate these Matters, tho' I take it to be a just Observation, that unless you add something of your own to what these fine Gentlemen teach you, and which they are wholly ignorant of themselves, you will much sooner get the Character of an Affected Fop, than of a Well bred Man.

As for Country Dancing, it must indeed be confessed, that the great Familiarities between the two Sexes on this Occasion may sometimes produce very dangerous Consequences. I have often thought that few Ladies Hearts are so obdurate as not to be melted by the Charms of Musick, the Force of Motion, and an handsome young Fellow who is continually playing before their Eyes, and convincing them that he has the perfect Use of all his Limbs.

But as this kind of Dance is the particular Invention of our own Country, and as every one is more or less a Proficient in it, I would not discountenance it but rather suppose it may be practised innocently by others, as well as myself, who am often Partner to my Landlady's Eldest Daughter.

Having heard a good Character of the Collection of Pictures which is to be Exposed to Sale on Friday next and concluding from the following Letter, that the Person who Collected them is a Man of no unequal Taste, I will be so much his

* In his scheme of a College and School, published in 1667, is 'a Proposition for the Advancement of Experimental Philosophy,' among the ideas for training boys in the school is this, that 'in foul weather it would not be amiss for them to learn to Dance, that is, to learn just so much (for all beyond is superfluous, if not worse) as may give them a graceful comportment of their bodies.'

with Pleasure.<sup>1</sup> With what Strength of Allusion and Force of Thought, has he described the Breaches and Violations of Friendship? Whoso casteth a Stone at the Birds frayeth them away, and he that upbraiddeth his Friend, breaketh Friendship. Tho thou drivest a Sword at a Friend yet despair not, for there may be a returning to Favour. If thou hast opened thy Mouth against thy Friend fear not, for there may be a Reconciliation, except for Upbraiding, or Pride, or disclosing of Secrets, or a treacherous Wound for, for these things every Friend will depart.<sup>2</sup> We may observe in this and several other Precepts in this Author, those little familiar Instances and Illustrations which are so much admired in the moral Writings of Horace and Epictetus. There are very beautiful Instances of this Nature in the following Passages, which are likewise written upon the same Subject. Whoso discovereth Secrets, loseth his Credit, and shall never find a Friend to his Mind. Love thy Friend, and be faithful unto him, but if thou betrayest his Secrets, follow no more after him. For as a Man hath destroyed his Lumy, so hast thou lost the Love of thy Friend, as one that letteth a Bird go out of his Hand, so hast thou let thy Friend go, and shalt not get him again. Follow after him no more for he is too far off, he is as a Roe escaped out of the Snare. As for a Wound it may be bound up, and after healing there may be Reconciliation, but he that betrayeth Secrets is without Hope.<sup>3</sup>

Among the several Qualifications of a good Friend, this wise Man has very justly singled out Constancy and Faithfulness as the principal. To these, others have added Virtue, Knowledge, Discretion, Equality in Age and Fortune, and as Cicero calls it, Morum Comitas, a Pleasantness of Temper.<sup>4</sup> If I were to give my Opinion upon such an exhausted Subject, I should join to these other Qualifications a certain Equality or Evenness of Behaviour. A Man often contracts a Friendship with one whom perhaps he does not find out till after a Year's Conversation. When on a sudden some latent ill Humour breaks out upon him, which he never discovered or suspected at his first entering into an Intimacy with him. There are several Persons who in some certain Periods of their Lives are inexpressibly agreeable, and in others as odious and detestable. Martial has given us a very pretty Picture of one of this Species in the following Epigram

*Difficilis, fucilis, juvenidus, acribus es idem, Nec tecum possum vivere, nec sine te
In all thy Humours, whether grave or mellow,
Thou art such a touchy, testy, pleasant Fellow,
Hast so much Wit, and Mirth, and Spleen about thee
There is no living with thee, nor without thee
It is very unlucky for a Man to be entangled in* a Friendship with one, who by these Changes and Vicissitudes of Humour is sometimes amiable and sometimes odious. And as most Men are at some Times in an admirable Frame and Disposition of Mind, it should be one of the greatest Tasks of Wisdom to keep our selves well when we are so, and never to go out of that which is the agreeable Part of our Character. THERE is no Place in the Town which I so much love to frequent as the Royal-Exchange. It gives me a secret Satisfaction, and in some measure, gratifies my Vanity, as I am an Englishman, to see so rich an Assembly of Countrymen and Foreigners consulting together upon the private Business of Mankind, and making this Metropolis a kind of Liporum for the whole Earth. I must confess I look upon High Change to be a great Council, in which all considerable Nations have their Representatives. Factors in the Trading World are what Ambassadors are in the Politick World: they negotiate Affairs, conclude Treaties, and maintain a good Correspondence between those wealthy Societies of Men that are divided from one another by Seas and Oceans, or live on the different Extremities of a Continent. I have often been pleased to hear Disputes adjusted between an Inhabitant of Japan and an Alderman of London, or to see a Subject of the Great Mogul entering into a League with one of the Czar of Muscovy. I am infinitely delighted in mixing with these several Ministers of Commerce, as they are distinguished by their different Walks and different Languages. Sometimes I am justled among a Body of Armenians. Sometimes I am lost in a Crowd of Jews, and sometimes make one in a Groupe of Dutchmen. I am a Dane, Swede, or Frenchman at different times or rather take my self like the old Philosopher, who upon being asked what Country in he was, replied, That he was a Citizen of the World.

Though I very frequently visit this busy Multitude of People, I am known to no Body there but my Friend, Sir ANDREW, who often smiles upon me as he sees me bustling in the Crowd but at the same time comes at my Presence without taking any further Notice of me. There is indeed a Merchant of Egypt, who just knows me by sight, having formerly remitted me some Money to Grand Cairo;<sup>1</sup> but as I am not versed in the Modern Coffee, our Conferences go no further than a Pew and a Grinace.

This grand Scene of Business gives me an infinite Variety of solid and substantial entertainments. As I am a great Lover of Mankind, my Heart naturally overflows with Pleasure at the sight of a prosperous and happy Multitude, insomuch that at many publick Societies I cannot forbear expressing my Joy with Tears that have stolen down my Cheeks. For this Reason I am wonderfully delighted to see such a Body of Men thriving in their own private Fortunes, and at the same time promoting the Publick Good, or in other Words, rising, I state for their own Liberties, by bringing into their Country whatever is wanting, and carrying out of it whatever is superfluous.

Nature seems to have taken a particular Care to disseminate her Blessings among the different Regions of the World, with an Eye to this mutual Intercourse and Traffick among Men, and that the Natives of the several Parts of the Globe might have a kind of Dependence upon one another, and be united together by their common Interest. Almost every Difference produces something peculiar to it. The Food often grows in one Country, and the Sweet in another. The Fruits of Portugal are corrected by the Products of Arabia; the Infusion of a China Plant sweetened with the Pitch of an Indian Cane. The Philippine Islands give a Flavour to our European Wines. The single Dress of a Woman of Quality is often the Product of a hundred Climates. The Muss and the Fan come together from the different Ends of the Earth. The Scarf is sent from the Torrid Zone, and the Upper from beneath the Pole. The Brocade Petticoat rises out of the Mines of Pera, and the Diamond Necklace out of the Bowels of Indostan.

If we consider our own Country in its natural Prospect, without any of the Benefits and Advantages of Commerce, what a barren uncomfortable Spot of Earth falls to our Share! Natural Historians tell us, that no Fruit grows Originally among us, besides Hips and Haws, Acorns and Pignuts, with a few Delicates of the like Nature. But our Climate of itself and without the Assistances of Art, can make no further Advances towards a Plumb than to a Sloe, and carries in Apple to no greater a Perfection than a Crisp. That sour Melons, our Peaches, our Figs, our Apricots and Cherries, are Strangers among us, imported in different Ages, and naturalized in our English Gardens, and that they would all degenerate and fall away into the Trash of our own Country, if they were wholly neglected by the Planter, and left to the Mercy of our Sun and Soil. Nor has Traffick more enriched our Vegetable World, than it has improved the whole Race of Nature among us. Our Ships are laden with the Harvest of every Climate. Our Tables are stored with Spices, and Oils, and Wines. Our Rooms are filled with Pyramids of China, and adorned with the Workmanship of Japan. Our Morning's Draught comes to us from the remotest Corners of the Earth. We repair our Bodies by the Drugs of America, and repose ourselves under Indian Canopies. My Friend Sir Andrew calls the Viney rids of France our Gardens, the Spice-Islands our Hot beds, the Persians our Silk-Weavers, and the Chinese our Potters. Nature indeed furnishes us with the bare Necessaries of Life, but Traffick gives us greater Variety of what is Useful, and at the same time supplies us with every thing that is Convenient and Ornament. Nor is it the least Part of this our Happiness, that whilst we enjoy the remotest Products of the North and South, we are free from those Incumbrances of Weather [which<sup>1</sup>] give them Birth. That our Eyes are refreshed with the green Lights of hithum, at the same time that our Palates are forested with Fruits that rise between the Tropicks.

For these Reasons there are no more useful Members in a Commonwealth than Merchants. They knit Mankind together in a mutual Intercourse of good Offices, distribute the Gifts of Nature, find Work for the Poor, add Wealth to the Rich, and Magnificence to the Great. Our English Merchant converts the Tin of his own Country into Gold, and exchanges his Wool for Rubies. The Mohometans are clothed in our British Manufacture, and the Inhabitants of the frozen Zone warmed with the Fleeces of our Sheep.

When I have been upon the Change, I have often fancied one of our old Kings strutting in Person, where he is represented in Effigy, and looking down upon the wealthy Concourse of People with which that Place is every Day filled. In this Case, how would he be surprized to hear all the Languages of Europe spoken in this little Spot of his former Dominions, and to see so many private Men, who in his Time would have been the Vassals of some powerful Baron, negotiating like Princes for greater Sums of Money than were formerly to be met with in the Royal Treasury! Trade, without enlarging the British Territories, has given us a kind of additional Empire. It has multiplied the Number of the Rich, made our Landed Estates infinitely more Valuable than they were formerly, and added to them an Accession of other Estates as Valuable as the Lands themselves.

Interdum vulgus rectum videt Hor

WHEN I travelled, I took a particular Delight in hearing the Songs and Fables that are come from I rather to Son, and are most in Vogue among the common People of the Countries through which I passed, for it is impossible that any thing should be universally tasted and approved by a Multitude, tho' they are only the Rabble of a Nation, which hath not in it some peculiar Aptness to please and gratify the Mind of

Man Human Nature is the same in all reasonable Creatures and whatever falls in with it, will meet with Admirers amongst Readers of all Qualities and Conditions. Molière, as we are told by Monsieur Boucau, used to read all his Comedies to [an'] old Woman [who?] was his Housekeeper, as she sat with him at her Work by the Chimney Corner and could forget the Success of his Play in the Theatre, from the Reception it met at his Fire-side. For he tells us the Audience always followed the old Woman, and never failed to laugh in the same Place.<sup>3</sup>

I know nothing which more shews the essential and inherent Perfection of Simplicity of Thought, above that which I call the Gothic Manner in Writing, than this, that the first pleasures all kinds of Palates, and the latter only such as have formed to themselves a wrong artificial Taste upon little fanciful Authors and Writers of Epigram Horace, Virgil, or Milton, so far as the Language of their Poems is understood, will please a Reader of plain common Sense, who would neither relish nor comprehend an Epigram of Martial or a Poem of Cowley. So, on the contrary, an ordinary Song or Ballad that is the Delight of the common People, cannot fail to please all such Readers as are not unqualified for the Entertainment by their Affectation or Ignorance and the Reason is plain, because the same Paintings of Nature which recommend it to the most ordinary Reader, will appear Beautiful to the most refined.

The old Song of Chevy Chase is the favourite Ballad of the common People of England, and Ben Jonson used to say he had rather have been the Author of it than of all his Works. Sir Philip Sidney, in his Discourse of Poetry<sup>4</sup> speaks of it in the following Words: I never heard the old Song of Percy and Douglas, that I found not my Heart more moved than with a Trumpet, and yet it is sung by some blind Crowder with no rougher Voice than rude Stile, which being so evil apparelled in the Dust and Cobweb of that uncivil Age, what would it work trimmed in the gorgeous Eloquence of Pindar? For my own part I am so possessed in Admire<sup>1</sup> of this untutored Song, that I shall give my Reader a Critique upon it, without any further Apology for so doing.

The greatest Modern Critics have laid it down as a Rule, that an Heroick Poem should be founded upon some important Precept of Morality, adapted to the Constitution of the Country in which the Poet writes. Horace and Virgil have formed their Plans in this View. As Greece was a Collection of many Governments, who suffered very much among themselves, and gave the Persian Emperor, who was their common Enemy, many Advantages over them by their mutual Jealousies and Animosities. Horace, in order to establish among them an Union, which was so necessary for their Safety, grounds his Poem upon the Discords of the several Grecian Princes who were engaged in a Confederacy against an Asiatick Prince, and the several Advantages which the Enemy gained by such their Discords. At the same time the Poem we are now treating of was written, the Dissensions of the Barons, who were then so many petty Princes, ran very high, whether they quarrelled among themselves, or with their Neighbours, and produced insupportable Calamities to the Country.<sup>2</sup> The Poet, to deter Men from such unnatural Contentions, describes a bloody Battle and dreadful Scene of Death, occasioned by the mutual Feuds which reigned in the Families of an English and Scotch Nobleman. That he designed this for the Instruction of his Poem, we may learn from his four last Lines, in which, after the Example of the modern Imaginings, he draws from it a Precept for the Benefit of his Readers.

*God save the King, and bless the Land
In Plenty, Joy, and Peace.
And grant henceforth that foul Debate
Twixt Nobles may cease*

The next Point observed by the greatest Heroic Poets, hath been to celebrate Persons and Actions which do Honour to their Country. This Virgil's Hero was the Founder of Rome, Horace's a Prince of Greece, and for this Reason Valerius Flaccus and Statius, who were both Romans, might be justly derided for having chosen the Expedition of the Golden Fleece, and the Wars of Liber for the Subjects of their Epic Writings.

The Poet before us has not only found out an Hero in his own Country, but raises the Reputation of it by several beautiful Incidents. The English are the first [who?] take the Field, and the last [who?] quit it. The English bring only fifteen hundred to the Battle, the Scotch two thousand. The English keep the Field with fifty three. The Scotch return with fifty five. All the rest on each side being slain in battle. But the most remarkable Circumstance of this kind, is the different Manner in which the Scotch and English Kings [receive<sup>4</sup>] the News of this Fight, and of the great Men's Deaths who commanded in it.

*This News was brought to Edinburgh,
When Scotland's King did reign,
That brave Earl Douglas suddenly
Was with an Arrow slain*

<sup>1</sup> The author of Chevy Chase was not contemporary with the dissensions of the Barons, even if the ballad of the Hunting of the Cheviot was a celebration of the Battle of Otterbourne, fought in 1388, some 30 miles from Newcastle. The battle of Chevy Chase, between the Percy and the Douglas, was fought in Tewkesdale, and the ballad which moved Philip Sidney's heart was written in the fifteenth century. It may have referred to a Battle of Pepperden, fought near the Cheviot Hills, between the Earl of Northumberland and Earl William Douglas of Angus, in 1436.

The ballad quoted by Addison is not that of which Sidney spoke, but a version of it written after Sidney's death, and after the best plays of Shakespeare had been written.

Dear Creature,

Can you then neglect him who has forgot all his Recreations and Enjoyments, to pursue every appear more valuable to me than Penus does in the most beautiful Description that ever was made of her All this Kindness you return with an Accusation, that I do not love you! But the contrary is so manifest, that I cannot think you in earnest. But the Certainty given me in your Message by Molly, that you do not love me, is what robs me of all Comfort She says you will not see me If you can have so much Cruelty, at least write to me, that I may kiss the Impression made by your fair Hand I love you above all things and, in my Condition, what you look upon with Indifference is to me the most exquisite Pleasure or Pain Our young Lady, and a fine Gentleman from London, who are to marry for mercenary Ends, walk about our Gardens, and hear the Voice of Evening Nightingales, as if for Fashion-sake they courted those Solitudes, because they have heard Lovers do so Oh Betty! could I hear these Rivulets murmur, and Birds sing while you stood near me, how little sensible should I be that we are both Servants that there

HAVING already given my Reader an Account of several extraordinary Clubs both ancient and modern, I did not design to have troubled him with any more Narratives of this Nature but I have lately received Information of a Club which I can call neither ancient nor modern, that I dare say will be no less surprising to my Reader than it was to my self, for which Reason I shall communicate it to the Publick as one of the greatest Curiosities in its kind

A Friend of mine complimenting of a Tradesman who is related to him, after having represented him as a very ill worthless Fellow, who neglected his Family, and spent most of his Time over a Bottle, told me, to conclude his Character, that he was a Member of the E-verlasting Club. So very odd a Title raised my Curiosity to enquire into the Nature of a Club that had such a strange Name upon which my Friend gave me the following Account

The E-verlasting Club consists of a hundred Members, who divide the whole twenty four Hours among them in such a Manner, that the Club sits Day and Night from one end of the Year to [another<sup>1</sup>] no Party presuming to rise till they are relieved by those who are in course to succeed them By this means a Member of the E-verlasting Club never wants Company for tho' he is not upon Duty himself, he is sure to find some [who<sup>2</sup>] are so that if he be disposed to take a Whet, or a Nodding, an Evening's Draught, or a Bottle after Midnight, he goes to the Club and finds a Knot of Friends to his Mind

It is a Maxim in this Club that the Steward never dies, for as they succeed one another by way of Rotation, no Man is in quit the great Elbow-chair [which<sup>3</sup>] stands at the upper End of the Table, till his Successor is in a Readiness to fill it inasmuch that there has not been a Sedacante in the Memory of Man

This Club is instituted towards the End (or as some of them say, about the Middle) of the Civil Wars, and continued without Interruption till the Time of the Great Fire,<sup>4</sup> which burnt them out and dispersed them for several Weeks The Steward at that time maintained his Post till he had like to have been blown up with a neighbouring House, (which was demolished in order to stop the Fire) and would not leave the Chair at last, till he had emptied all the Bottles upon the Table, and received repeated Directions from the Club to withdraw himself This Steward is frequently talked of in the Club, and looked upon by every Member of it as a greater Man, than the famous Capt in [mentioned in my Lord Clarendon, who<sup>5</sup>] was burnt in his Ship because he

But as this Passion for Admiration, when it works according to Reason, improves the beautiful Part of our Species in every thing that is Laudable, so nothing is more Destructive to them when it is governed by Vanity andolly. What I have therefore here to say, only regards the vain Part of the Sex, whom for certain Reasons, which the Reader will hereafter see at large, I shall distinguish by the Name of Idols. An Idol is wholly taken up in the Adorning of her Person. You see in every Posture of her Body, Air of her Face, and Motion of her Head, that it is her Business and Employment to gain Adorers. For this Reason your Idols appear in all publick Places and Assemblies, in order to seduce Men to their Worship. The Play house is very frequently filled with Idols, several of them are carried in Procession every Evening about the Ring, and several of them set up their Worship even in Churches. They are to be toasted in the Language proper to the Deity. Life and Death are in their Power. Joys of Heaven and Pains of Hell are at their Disposal. Paradise is in their Arms, and Lernity in every Moment that you are present with them. Raptures, Transports, and Ecstasies, are the Rewards which they confer. Sights and Fears, Prayers and broken Hearts, are the Offerings which are paid to them. Their Smiles make Men happy, their Frowns drive them to Despair. I shall only add under this Head, that Ovid's Book of the Art of Love is a kind of Heathen Ritual, which contains all the forms of Worship which are made use of to an Idol.

It would be as difficult a Task to reckon up these different kinds of Idols, as Milton's was<sup>1</sup> to number those that were known in Canaan, and the Lands adjoining. Most of them are worshipped, like Moloch, in Fire and Flames. Some of them, like Baal, love to see their Votaries cut and slashed, and shedding their Blood for them. Some of them, like the Idol in the Apotheca, must have Treats and Collations prepared for them every Night. It has indeed been known, that some of them have been used by their unenlightened Worshipers, like the Chinese Idols, who are whipped and scourged when they refuse to comply with the Prayers that are offered to them.

I must here observe, that those Idolaters who devote themselves to the Idols I am here speaking of, differ very much from all other kinds of Idolaters. For as others fall out because they Worship different Idols, these Idolaters quarrel because they Worship the same.

The Intention therefore of the Idol is quite contrary to the wishes of the Idolater, as the one desires to confine the Idol to himself, the whole Business and Ambition of the other is to multiply Adorers. His Humour of an Idol is prettily described in a Tale of Chaucer. He represents one of them sitting at a Table with three of her Votaries about it, who are all of them courting her Favour, and paying their Adorations. She smiled upon one, drank to another, and trod upon the other's Foot which was under the Table. Now which of these three, says the old Bard, do you think was the Favourite? In troth, says he, not one of all the three.

The Behaviour of this old Idol in Chaucer, puts me in mind of the Beautiful Clarinda, one of the greatest Idols among the Moderns. She is worshipped once a Week by Candle light, in the midst of a large Congregation generally called an Assembly. Some of the gayer Youth in the Nation endeavour to plant the Idol in her Eye, whilst she sits in form with multitudes of Tapers burning about her. To encourage the Zeal of her Idolaters, she bestows a Mark of her Favour upon every one of them, before they go out of her Presence. She asks a Question of one, tells a Story to another, glances an Ogle upon a third, takes a Pinch of Snuff from the fourth, lets me I indrop by accident to give the fifth an Occasion of taking it up. In short, every one goes away satisfied with his Success, and encouraged to renew his Devotions on the same Canonical Hour that Day Sevennight.

An Idol may be Undesired by many accidental Causes. Marriage in particular is a kind of Counter-Apotheca, or a Dedicacion inverted. When a Man becomes familiar with his Goddess, she quickly sink into a Woman.

Old Age is likewise a great Decayer of your Idol. The Truth of it is, there is not a more unhappy Being than a Superannuated Idol, especially when she has contracted such Aims and Behaviour as are only Gracesful when her Worshipers are about her.

Considering therefore that in these and many other Cases the Woman generally outlives the Idol, I must return to the Moral of this Paper, and desire my fair Reader to give a proper Direction to their Passion for being admired. In order to which, they must endeavour to make themselves the Objects of a reasonable and lasting Admiration. This is not to be hoped for from Beauty, or Dress, or Fashion, but from those inward Ornaments which are not to be defaced by Time or Sickness, and which appear most amiable to those who are most acquainted with them. IN my last Monday's Paper I gave some general Instances of those beautiful Strokes which please the Reader in the old Song of Cherry-Chase, I shall here, according to my Promise, be more particular, and show that the Sentiments in that Ballad are extremely natural and poetical, and full of the most mystick Sunshiny which we admire in the greatest of the ancient Poets. For which Reason I shall quote several Passages of it, in which the Thought is altogether the same with what we meet in several Passages of the Aeneid; not that I would infer

So right his Shaft he set,
The Grygoose Wung that was then on
In his Heart-Blowd was set
This Fight did last from Brn-k of Day
Till setting of the Sun,
For when they run & the Drum is Bell
The Battle scarce was done.*

One may observe likewise, that in the Catalogue of the Shun the Author has followed the Example of the greatest ancient Poets, not only in giving a long List of the Dead, but by diversifying it with little Characters of particular Persons

*And with Earl Dowglas ere was slain

The familiar Sound in these Names destroys the Majesty of the Description for this Reason I do not mention this Part of the Poem but to shew the natural Cast of the Poet which appears in it, as the two last Verses look almost like a Translation of Virgil

In the Catalogue of the English [who?] fell, Witherington's Behaviour is in the same manner particularized very artfully, as the Reader is prepared for it by that Account which is given of him in the Beginning of the Battle [though I am satisfied your little Buffoon Readers (who have seen that Passage ridiculed in Indubious) will not be able to take the Beauty of it For which Reason I dare not so much as quote it]

*Then slept a gallant Squire forth, Witherington was his Name,
Who said, I would not have it told
To Henry our King for Shame,
That e'er my Captain fought on Foot,
And I stood looking on*

We meet with the same Heroic Sentiments in Virgil

Non pudet, O Rutuli, cunctis pro talibus unam Obsecrare animam? numerum an viribus agni Non minus—?

What can be more natural or more moving than the Circumstances in which he describes the Behaviour of those Women who had lost their Husbands on this fatal Day?

Next Day did many Widows come Their Husbands to bewail,

*They wash'd their Wounds in brinish Tears,
But all would not prevail
Their Bodies bath'd in purple Blood,
They bore with them away,
They kiss'd them dead a thousand Times,
When they were clad in Clay*

Thus we see how the Thoughts of this Poem, which naturally arise from the Subject, are always simple, and sometimes exquisitely noble that the Language is often very sound, and that the whole is written with a true poetical Spirit

If this Song had been written in the Gothic Manner, which is the Delight of all our little Wits, whether Writers or Readers, it would not have hit the Taste of so many Ages, and have pleased the Readers of all Ranks and Conditions I shall only beg Pardon for such a Profusion of Latin Quotations which I should not have made use of, but that I feared my own Judgment would have looked too singular on such a Subject, had not I supported it by the Practice and Authority of Virgil

I was with some Mortification that I suffered the Rallery of a Fine Lady of my Acquaintance, for calling, in one of my Papers, Dormant a Clown She was so unmerciful as to take Advantage of my invincible Faciturnity, and on that occasion, with great Freedom to consider the Air, the Height, the Face, the Gesture of him who could pretend to judge so arrogantly of Gallantry She is full of Mot on, Janty and lively in her Impertinence, and one of those that commonly pass, among the Ignorant, for Persons who have a great deal of Humour She had the Play of Sir Topham in her Hand, and after she had said it was happy for her there was not so charming a Creature as Dormant now living, she began with a Theatrical Air and Tone of Voice to Read, by way of Triumph over me, some of his Speeches 'Tis she, that lovely Hair, that easy Snake, those wanton Eyes, and all those melting Charms about her Mouth, which Medley spoke of, I'll follow the Lottery, and put in for a Prize with my Friend Bellur

Oh the Fine Gentleman! But here, continues she, is the Passage I admire most, where he begins to Teize Lovett, and mimic Sir Topham Oh the pretty Satyr, in his resolving to be a Coxcomb to please, since Noise and Nonsense have such powerful Charms!

It would have been a very wild Endeavour for a Man of my Temper to offer any Opposition to so nimble a Spealer as my Fur Enemy is but her Discourse gave me very many Reflections, when I had left her Company Among others, I could not but consider, with some Attention, the false Impressions the generality (the Fur Sex more especially) have of what should be intended, when they say a Fine Gentleman, and could not help revolving that Subject in my Thoughts, and settling, as it were, an Idea of that Character in my own Imagination

No Man ought to have the Esteem of the rest of the World, for any Actions which are disagreeable to those Maxims which prevail, as the Standards of Behaviour, in the Country wherein he lives What is opposite to the eternal Rules of Reason and good Sense, must be excluded from any Place in the Carriage of a Well bred Man I did not, I confess, explain myself enough on this Subject, when I called Dorimant a Clown, and made it an Instance of it, that he called the Orange Wench, Double Trife I should have shewed, that Humrinity obliges a Gentleman to give no Part of Humankind Reproach, for what they, whom they Reprove, may possibly have in Common with the most Virtuous and Worthy amongst us When a Gentleman speaks Coarsely, he has dressed himself Clean to no purpose The Cloathing of our Minds certainly ought to be regarded before that of our Bodies To betray in a Man's Talk a corrupted Imagination, is a much greater Offence against the Conversation of Gentlemen, than any Negligence of Dress imaginable But this Sense of the Matter is so far from being received among People even of Condition, that Vocifer passes for a fine Gentleman He is Loud, Haughty, Gentle, Soft, I c wd, and Obscure by turns, just as a little Understanding and great Impudence prompt him at the present Moment He passes among the Silly Part of our Women for a Man of Wit, because he is generally in Doubt He contradicts with a Shrug, and confutes with a certain Sufficiency, in professing such and such a Thing is above his Capriety What makes his Character the pleasanter is, that he is a professed Deluder of Women and because the empty Coveomb has no Regard to any thing that is of it self Sacred and Inviolable, I have heard an unmarried Lady of Fortune say, It is pity so fine a Gentleman as Vocifer is so great an Atheist. The Crowd of such inconsiderable Creatures that infest all Places of Assembling, every Reader will have in his Eye from his own Observation but would it not be worth considering what sort of Figure a Man who formed himself upon those Principles among us, which are agreeable to the Dictates of Honour and Religion, would make in the familiar and ordinary Occurrences of Life I hardly have observed any one fill his several Duties of Life better than Ignotus All the under

Parts of his Behaviour and such as are exposed to common Observation, have their Rise in him from great and noble Motives A firm and unshaken Expectation of another Life, makes him become this, Humrinity and Good nature, fortified by the Sense of Virtue, has the same Effect upon him, as the Neglect of all Goodness has upon many others Being firmly established in all Matters of Importance, that certain Intention which makes Men's Actions look easie appears in him with greater Beauty By a thorough Contempt of little Excellencies, he is perfectly Master of them The Temper of Mind leaves him under no Necessity of Studying his Air, and he has thus peculiar Discretion, that his Negligence is unobserved

He that can work himself into a Pleasure in considering this Being as an uncertain one, and think to reap an Advantage by its Discontinuanee, is in a fur way of doing all things with a graceful Unconcern, and Gentleman like Ease Such a one does not behold his Life as a short, transient, perplexing State, made up of trifling Pleasures, and great Anxieties but sees it in quite another Light his Griefs are Momentary, and his Joys Immortal Reflection upon Death is not a gloomy and sad I thought of Resuming every Thing that he Delights in, but it is a short Night followed by an endless Day What I would here contend for is, that the more Virtuous the Man is, the neverer he will naturally be to the Character of Gentle and Agreeable A Man who e Fortune is Pleasurful, shews in Case in his Countenance, and Confidence in his Behaviour, which he that is under Wants and Difficulties cannot assume It is thus with the State of the Mind he that governs his Thoughts with the everlasting Rules of Reason and Sense, must have something so inexpressibly Gracifull in his Words and Actions, that every Circumstance must become him The Change of Persons or Things around him do not at all alter his Situation, but he looks disinterested in the Occurrences with which others are distracted, because the greatest Purpose of his Life is to maintain an Indifference both to it and all its Enjoyments In a word, to be a Fine Gentleman, is to be a Generous and a Brave Man What can make a Man so much in constant Good humour and Shine, as we call it, than to be supported by what can never fail him, and to believe that whatever happens to him was the best thing that could possibly befall him, or else he on whom it depends would not have permitted it to have befallen him at all?

Ut tu Fortunam, sic nos te, Celse, feris. Hor

THERE is nothing so common as to find a Man whom in the general Observations of his Carriage you take to be of an uniform Temper, subject to such unaccountable Starts of Humour and Passion, that he is as much unlike himself and differs as much from the Man you at first thought him, as any two distinct Persons can differ from each other. This proceeds from the Want of forming some Law of Life to our selves, or fixing some Nation of things in general, which may affect us in such Manner as to create proper Habits both in our Minds and Bodies. The Negligence of this, leaves us exposed not only to an unbecoming Levity in our usual Conversation, but also to the same Instability in our Friendships, Interests, and Alliances. A Man who is but a mere Spectator of what passes round him, and not engaged in Consequences of any Consideration, is but an ill Judge of the secret Motions of the Heart of Man, and by what Degrees it is actuated to make such visible Alterations in the same Person. But at the same Time, when a Man is not so concerned in the Effects of such Inconsistencies in the Behaviour of Men of the World, the Speculation must be in the utmost Degree both diverting and instructive: yet to enjoy such Observations in the highest Relish, he ought to be placed in a Post of Direction, and have the dealing of their Fortunes to them. I have therefore been wonderfully diverted with some Pieces of secret History, which an Antiquary, my very good Friend, lent me. A Curiosity. They are memoirs of the private Life of Pharamond of France. Pharamond, says my Author, was a Prince of infinite Humility and Generosity, and at the same time the most pleasant and facetious Companion of his Time. He had a peculiar Taste in him (which would have been unlucky in any Prince but himself,) he thought there could be no exquisite Pleasure in Conversation but among Equals and would pleasantly bewail himself that he always lived in a Crowd, but was the only man in France that never could get into Company. This Turn of Mind made him delight in Midnight Rambles, attended only with one Person of his Bed-chamber. He would in these Excursions get acquainted with Men (whose Temper he had a Mind to try) and recommend them privately to the particular Observation of his first Minister. He generally found himself neglected by his new Acquaintance as soon as they had Hopes of growing great, and used on such Occasions to remark, that it was a great Injustice to the Princes of forgetting themselves in their high Fortunes, when there were so few that could with Constancy bear the Favour of their very Creatures. My Author in these loose Hints has one Passage that gives us a very lively Idea of the uncommon Genius of Pharamond. He met with one Man whom he had put to all the usual Proofs he made of those he had a mind to know thoroughly, and found him for his Purpose. In Discourse with him one Day, he gave him Opportunity of saying how much would satisfy all his Wishes. The Prince immediately revealed himself, doubled the Sum, and spoke to him in this manner: 'Sir, You have twice what you desired, by the Favour of Pharamond, but look to it, that you are satisfied with it, for 'tis the last you shall ever receive I from this Moment consider you as mine, and to make you truly so, I give you my Royal Word you shall never be greater or less than you are at present. Answer me not, (concluded the Prince smiling) but enjoy the Fortune I have put you in, which is above my own Condition, for so I have hereafter nothing to lose or to fear.

His Majesty having thus well chosen and bought a Friend and Companion, he enjoyed alternately all the Pleasures of an agreeable private Man and a great and powerful Monarch. He gave himself, with his Companion, the Name of the merry Tyrant, for he punished his Courtiers for their Insolence and Folly, not by any Act of Publick Disfavour, but by humorously pretending upon their Irriginations. If he observed a Man untractable to his Inferiors, he would find an Opportunity to take some favourable Notice of him, and render him insupportable. He knew all his own Looks, Words and Actions had their Interpretations, and his Friend Monsieur Lucrate (for so he was call'd) having a great Soul without Ambition, he could communicate all his Thoughts to him, and turn no artful Use would be made of that Freedom. It was no small Delight when they were in private to reflect upon all which had passed in publick.

Pharamond would often, to satisfy a vain Fool of Power in his Country, talk to him in a full Court, and with one Whisper make him despise all his old Friends and Acquaintance. He was come to that Knowledge of Men by long Observation, that he could profess altering the whole Mass of Blood in some Tempers, by three speaking to them. As Fortune was in his Power, he gave himself constant Entertainment in managing the mere Followers of it with the Treatment they deserved. He would, by a skilful Cast of his Eye and half a Smile, make two Fellows who hated, embrace and fall upon each other's Neck with as much Eagerness, as if they followed their real Inclinations, and intended to suffice one another. When he was in high good Humour, he would lay the Scene with Lucrate, and on a publick Night exercise the Passions of his whole Court. He was pleased to see an haughty Beauty with the Looks of the Man she had long despised, from Observation of his being taken notice of by Pharamond, and the Lover conceive higher Hopes, than to follow the Woman he was dying for the Day before. In a Court where Men speak Affection in the strongest Terms, and Dislike in the faintest, it was a comical Mixture of Incidents to see Disguises thrown aside in one Case and encreased on the other, according as Favour or Disgrace attended the respective Objects of Men's Approbation or Disesteem. Pharamond in his Mirth upon the Meanness of Mankind used to say, 'As he could take away a Man's Five Senses, he could give him an Hundred. The Man in Disgrace shall immediately lose all his natural Endowments, and he that finds Favour have the Attributes of an Angel.' He would carry it so far as to say, 'It should not be only so in the Opinion of the lower Part of his Court, but the Men themselves shall think thus meanly or

'greatly of themselves, as they are out or in the 'good Graces of a Court'

A Monarch who had Wit and Humour like Pharamond, must have Pleasures which no Man else can ever have Opportunity of enjoying. He gave Fortune to none but those whom he knew could receive it without Transport. He made a noble and generous Use of his Observations, and did not regard his Ministers as they were agreeable to himself, but as they were useful to his Kingdom. By this means the King appeared in every Officer of State, and no Man had a Participation of the Power, who had not a Similitude of the Virtue of Pharamond R.

Non convivere licet, nec urbe tota Quisquam est tam profè tam proculque nobis
M 171

MY Friend WILL HOVEYCOMB is one of those Sort of Men who are very often absent in Conversation, and what the French call a re-curr and a distract. A little before our Club-time last Night we were walking together in Somerset Garden, where WILL had picked up a small Pebble of so odd a Make, that he said he would present it to a Friend of his, an eminent Virtuoso. After we had walked some time, I made a full stop with my Face towards the West, which WILL knowing to be my usual Method of asking what's a Clock, in an Afternoon, immediately pulled out his Watch and told me we had seven Minutes good. We took a turn or two more, when, to my great Surprise, I saw him squint away his Watch a considerable way into the Thames, and with great Sedateness in his Looks put up the Pebble, he had before found, in his Fob. As I have naturally an Aversion to much Speaking, and do not love to be the Messenger of ill News, especially when it comes too late to be useful, I left him to be convinced of his Mistake in due time, and continued my Walk, reflecting on these little Absences and Distractions in Mankind, and resolving to make them the Subject of a future Speculation.

I was the more confirmed in my Design, when I considered that they were very often Blemishes in the Characters of Men of excellent Sense and helped to keep up the Reputation of that Latin Proverb,* which Mr Dryden has Translated in the following Lines

*Great Wit to Madness sure is near ally'd,
And thin Partitions do their Bounds divide*

My Reader does, I hope, perceive, that I distinguish a Man who is Absent, because he thinks of something else, from one who is Absent, because he thinks of nothing at all. The latter is too innocent a Creature to be taken notice of but the Distractions of the former may, I believe, be generally accounted for from one of these Reasons.

Either their Minds are wholly fixed on some particular Science, which is often the Case of Mathematicians and other learned Men or are wholly taken up with some violent Passion, such as Anger, Fear, or Love, which takes the Mind to some distant Object, or, lastly, these Distractions proceed from a certain Vagueness and Fickleness in a Man's Temper, which while it raises up infinite Numbers of Ideas in the Mind, is continually pushing it on, without allowing it to rest on any particular Image. Nothing therefore is more unnatural than the Thoughts and Conceptions of such a Man, which are seldom occasioned either by the Company he is in, or any of those Objects which are placed before him. While you fancy he is admiring a beautiful Woman, 'tis in even Wager that he is solving a Proposition in Euclid and while you may imagine he is reading the Paris Gazette, it is far from being impossible, that he is pulling down and rebuilding the Front of his Country house.

At the same time that I am endeavouring to expose this Weakness in others, I shall readily confess that I once laboured under the same Infirmary myself. The Method I took to conquer it was a firm Resolution to learn something from whatever I was obliged to see or hear. There is a way of Thinking if a Man can attain to it, by which he may strike somewhat out of any thing. I can at present observe those Starts of good Sense and Struggles of unimproved Reason in the Conversation of a Clown, with as much Satisfaction as the most shining Periods of the most finished Orator and can make a shift to command my Attention at a Puffet-Shoe or an Opera, as well as at Hamlet or Othello. I always make one of the Company I am in for though I say little myself, my Attention to others, and those Nods of Approbation which I never bestow unmerited, sufficiently shew that I am among them. Whereas WILL HOVEYCOMB, tho' a Fellow of good Sense, is every Day doing and saying an hundred Things which he afterwards confesses, with a well bred Frankness, were somewhat mal à propos, and undesigned.

I chanced the other Day to go into a Coffee-house, where WILL was standing in the midst of several Auditors whom he had gathered round him, and was giving them an Account of the Person and Character of Moll Hinton. My Appearance before him just put him in mind of me, without making him reflect that I was usually present. So that keeping his Eyes full upon me, to the great Surprise of his Audience, he broke off his first Harangue, and proceeded thus,—'Why now there's my Friend (mentioning me by my Name) he is a Fellow that thinks a great deal, but never opens his Mouth. I warrant you he is now thrusting his short I see into some Coffee house about Change. I was his Jail in the time of the Popish Plot, when he was taken up for a Jesuit.' If he had looked on me a little longer, he had certainly described me so particularly, without ever considering what led him into it, that the whole Company must necessarily have found me out for which Reason, remembering

Mr SPECTATOR,

'I Write this to acquaint you, that very many Ladies, as well as myself, spend many Hours more than we used at the Glass, for want of the Female Library of which you promised us a Catalogue. I hope, Sir, in the Choice of Authors for us, you will have a particular Regard to Books of Devotion. What they are, and how many, must be your chief Care for upon the Propriety of such Writings depends a great deal. I have known those among us who think, if they every Morning and Evening spend an Hour in their Closet, and read over so many Prayers in six or seven Books of Devotion, all equally nonsensical, with a sort of Warmth, (that might as well be rused by a Glass of Wine, or a Drachm of Citron) they may all the rest of their time go on in whatever their particular Passion leads them to. The benevolent Philantia, who is (in your Language) an Idol, is one of these Votaries: she has a very pretty furnished Closet, to which she retires at her appointed Hours. Thus is her Dressing-room, as well as Chapel, she has constantly before her a large Looking-glass, and upon the Table, according to a very witty Author,

*Together lye her Prayer book and Pawl,
At once improve the Sinner and the Saint*

'It must be a good Scene, if one could be present at it, to see this Idol by turns lift up her Eyes to Heaven, and steal Glances at her own dear Person. It cannot but be a pleasing Conflict between Vanity and Humiliation. When you are upon this Subject, choose Books which elevate the Mind above the World, and give a pleasing Indifference to little things in it. For want of such Instructions, I am apt to believe so many People take it in their Heads to be sullen, cross and angry, under pretence of being abstracted from the Affairs of this Life, when at the same time they betray their Fondness for them by doing their Duty as a Task, and putting off and reading good Books for a Week together. Much of this I take to proceed from the Indiscretion of the Books themselves whose very Titles of Weekly Preparations, and such limited Godliness, lead People of ordinary Capacities into great Errors, and raise in them a Mechanical Religion, entirely distinct from Morality. I know a Lady, so given up to this sort of Devotion, that tho' she employs six or eight Hours of the twenty-four at Cards, she never misses one constant Hour of Prayer, for which time another holds her Cards, to which she returns with no little Anxiousness till two or three in the Morning. All these Acts are but empty Shows, and, as it were, Compliments made to Virtue: the Mind is all the while untouched with any true Pleasure in the Pursuit of it. From hence I presume it arises that so many People call themselves Virtuous, from no other Pretence to it but an Absence of Ill. There is Dulcanara is the most insolent of all Creatures to her Friends and Domesticks, upon no other Pretence in Nature but that (as her silly Phrase is) no one can say Black is her Eye. She has no Secrets, forsooth, which should make her afraid to speak her Mind,

'and therefore she is impertinently Blunt to all her Acquaintance, and unseasonably Imperious to all her Family. Dear Sir, be pleased to put such Books in our Hands, as may make our Virtue more inward, and convince some of us that in a Mind truly virtuous the Scorn of Vice is always accompanied with the Pity of it. Thus and other things, are impatiently expected from you by our whole Sex, among the rest by,

SIA,
Your most humble Servant,

Caelum non animum mutant qui trans mare currunt—Hor

IN the Year 1688, and on the same Day of that Year, were born in Cheapside, London, two Females of exquisite Feature and Shape: the one we shall call Brunetta, the other Phyllis. A close Intimacy between their Parents made each of them the first Acquaintance the other knew in the World. They played, dressed Babies, reted Visitings, learned to Dance and make Curtesies, together. They were inseparable Companions in all the little Entertainments their tender Years were capable of. Which innocent Happiness continued till the Beginning of their fifteenth Year, when it happened that Mrs Phyllis had in Head-dress or which became her so very well, that instead of being beheld any more with Pleasure for their Amity to each other, the Eyes of the Neighbourhood were turned to remark them with Comparison of their Beauty. They now no longer enjoyed the Ease of Mind and pleasing Indolence in which they were formerly happy, but all their Words and Actions were misinterpreted by each other, and every Excellence in their Speech and Behaviour was looked upon as an Act of Emulation to surpass the other. These Beginnings of Disinclination soon improved into a Formality of Behaviour, a general Coldness, and by natural Step, into an irreconcilable Hatred.

These two Rivals for the Reputation of Beauty, were in their Stature, Countenance and Mien so very much alike, that if you were speaking of them in their Absence, the Words in which you described the one must give you an Idea of the other. They were hardly distinguishable, you would think, when they were apart, tho' extremely different when together. What made their Enmity the more entertaining to all the rest of their Sex was, that in Detraction from each other neither could fall upon Terms which did not hit herself as much as her Adversary. Their Nights grew restless with Meditation of new Dresses to outvie each other, and inventing new Devices to recal Admirers, who observed the Charms of the one rather than those of the other on the last Meeting. Their Colours faded at each other's Appearance, flushed with Pleasure at the Report of a Disadvantage, and their Countenances withered upon Instances of Applause. The Decencies to which Women are obliged, made these Virgins

My LORD,
SIMILITUDE of Manners and Studies is usually mentioned as one of the strongest motives to Affection and Esteem but the passionate Veneration I have for your Lordship, I think, flows from an Admiration of Qualities in You, of which, in the whole course of these Papers I have acknowledged myself incapable. While I busy myself as a Stranger upon Earth, and can pretend to no other than being a Looker-on, You are conspicuous in the Busy and Polite world, both in the World of Men, and that of Letters. While I am silent and unobserv'd in public Meetings, You are admired by all that approach You as the Life and Genius of the Conversation. What an happy Conjunction of different Talents meets in him whose whole Discourse is at once animated by the Strength and Force of Reason, and adorned with all the Graces and Embellishments of Wit. When Learning irradiates common Life, it is then in its highest Use and Perfection and it is to such as Your Lordship, that the Sciences owe the Lustre which they have with the active Part of Mankind. Knowledge of Books in reclusive Men, is like that sort of Lanthorn which hides him who carries it, and serves only to pass through secret and gloomy Paths of his own but in the Possession of a Man of Business, it is as a Torch in the Hand of one who is willing and able to shew those, who are bewildered, the Way which leads to their Prosperity and Welfare. A generous Concern for your Country, and a Passion for every thing which is truly Great and Noble, are what retrieve all Your Life and Actions and I hope You will forgive me that I have an Ambition this Book may be placed in the Library of so good a Judge of what is valuable, in that Library where the Choice is such, that it will not be a Disparagement to be the meanest Author in it. Forgive me, my Lord, for taking this Occasion of telling all the World how ardently I Love and Honour You, and that I am, with the utmost Gratitude for all Your Favour,

My Lord,
Your Lordship's Most Obedt,
Most Obedt, and Most Humble Servant,
JHL SPECTATOR

Charles Montague, at the time of the dedication fifty years old, and within four years of the end of his life, was born, in 1661, at Horton, in Northamptonshire. His father was a younger son of the first Earl of Manchester. He was educated at Westminster School and at Trinity College, Cambridge. After wit and verse he joined with his friend Prior in writing a burlesque on Dryden's Hind and Panther, 'Transferred to the Story of the Country and the City Mouse.' In Parliament in James the Second's reign, he joined in the invitation of William of Orange, and rose rapidly, a self-made man, after the Revolution. In 1691 he was a Lord of the Treasury, in April, 1694, he became Chancellor of the Exchequer, and in May, 1697, first Lord of the Treasury, retaining the Chancellorship and holding both offices till near the close of 1699. Of his dealing with the currency, see note on p. 9. In 1700 he was made Baron Halifax, and had secured the office of Auditor of the Exchequer, which was worth at least £4000 a year, and in war time twice as much. The Tories, on coming to power, made two unsuccessful attempts to fix on him charges of fraud. In October, 1714, George I made him Earl of Halifax and Viscount Sunbury. Then also he again became Prime Minister. He was married, but died childless, in May, 1715. In 1699, when Somers and Halifax were the great chiefs of the Whig minority, they joined in befriending Addison, then 27 years old, who had pleased Somers with a piece of English verse and Montague with Latin lines upon the Prince of Brunswick.

Now, therefore, having dedicated the first volume of the Spectator to Somers, it is to Halifax that Steele and he inscribe the second.

Of the defect in Charles Montague's character, Lord Macaulay writes that, when at the height of his fortune, 'He became proud even to insolence.' Old companions hardly knew their friend. Charles in the great man who could not forget for one moment that he was first Lord of the Treasury, that he was Chancellor of the Exchequer, that he had been a Regent of the kingdom, that he had founded the Bank of England, and the new East India Company, that he had restored the Currency that he had invented the Sinking Bills, that he had planned the General Mortgage, and that he had been pronounced, by a solemn vote of the Commons, to have deserved all the favours which he had received from the Crown. It was said that admiration of himself and contempt of others were indicated by all his gestures, and written in all the lines of his face.

shine them in all other Accomplishments [proper]<sup>2</sup> to the Sex, and to distinguish themselves as tender Mothers, and faithful Wives, rather than as furious Partizans. Female Virtues are of a Domestic Turn. The Family is the proper Province for Private Women to shine in. If they must be shewing their Zeal for the Publick, let it not be against those who are perhaps of the same Family, or at least of the same Religion or Nation, but against those who are the open, professed, undoubted Enemies of their Faith, Liberty, and Country. When the Romans were pressed with a Foreign Enemy, the Ladies voluntarily contributed all their Rings and Jewels to assist the Government under a publick Licence, which appeared so laudable in Action in the Eyes of their Countrymen, that from thenceforth it was permitted by a Law to pronounce publick Orations at the Funeral of a Woman in Praise of the deceased Person, which till that Time was peculiar to Men. Would our English Ladies, instead of sticking on a Patch against those of their own Country, shew themselves so truly Publick-spirited as to sacrifice every one her Necklace against the common Enemy, what Decrees ought not to be made in Favour of them?

Since I am recollecting upon this Subject such Passages as occur to my Memory out of ancient Authors, I cannot omit a Sentence in the celebrated Funeral Oration of Pericles,<sup>3</sup> which he made in Honour of those brave Alcians that were slain in a fight with the Lacedaemonians. After having addressed himself to the several Ranks and Orders of his Countrymen, and shewn them how they should behave themselves in the Publick Cause, he turns to the Female Part of his Audience, 'And as for you (says he) I shall advise you in very few Words. Aspire only to those Virtues that are peculiar to your Sex. follow your natural Modesty, and think it your greatest Commendation not to be talked of one way or other.' C thought I had somewhere heard before. Coming near to the Grate, the Prisoner called me by my Name, and desired I would throw something into the Box. I was out of Countenance for him, and did as he bid me, by putting in half a Crown. I went away, reflecting upon the strange Constitution of some Men, and how meanly they behave themselves in all Sorts of Conditions. The Person who begged of me is now, as I take it, Fifty. I was well acquainted with him till about the Age of twenty-five, at which time a good Estate fell to him by the Death of a Relation. Upon coming to this unexpected good Fortune, he ran into all the Extravagancies imaginable, was frequently in drunken Disputes, broke Drawers Heads, talked and swore loud, was unmannerly to those above him, and insolent to those below him. I could not but remark, that it was the same Baseness of Spirit which worked in his Behaviour in both Fortunes. The same little Mind was insolent in Riches, and shameless in Poverty. His Accident made me muse upon the Circumstances of being in Debt in general, and solve in my Mind what Tempers were most apt to fall into this Error of Life, as well as the Misfortune it must needs be to languish under such Pressures. As for my self, my natural Aversion to that sort of Conversation which makes a Figure with the Generality of Mankind, exempted me from any Temptations to Expence, and all my Business lies within a very narrow Compass, which is only to give an honest Man, who takes care of my Estate, proper Vouchers for his quarterly Payments to me, and observe what Linnen my Landlady brings and takes away with her once a Week. My Steward brings his Receipt ready for my Signing, and I have a pretty Implement with the respective Names of Shirts, Cravats, Handkerchiefs and Stockings, with proper Numbers to know how to reckon with my Landlady. This being almost all the Business I have in the World for the Care of my own Affairs, I am at full Leisure to observe upon what others do, with relation to their Equipage and Oeconomy. When I walk the Street, and observe the Hurry about me in this Town,

<sup>3</sup> Ludgate was originally built in 1215, by the Barons who entered London, destroyed houses of Jews and erected this gate with their ruins. It was first used as a prison in 1373, being then a free prison, but soon losing that privilege. Sir Stephen Forster, who was Lord Mayor in 1454, had been a prisoner at Ludgate and begged it the grate, where he was seen by a rich widow who bought his liberty, took him into her service, and eventually married him. To commemorate this he enlarged the accommodation for the prisoners and added a chapel. The old gate was taken down and rebuilt in 1586. That second gate was destroyed in the Fire of London. The gate which succeeded and was used, like its predecessors, as a wretched prison for debtors, was pulled down in 1760, and the prisoners removed, first to the London workhouse, afterwards to part of the Giltspur Street Compter.

Where with like Haste, tho' different Ways they run,
Some to undo, and some to be undone,<sup>2</sup>

I say, when I behold this vast Variety of Persons and Humours, with the Pains they both take for the Accomplishment of the Ends mentioned in the above Verse of De Ham, I cannot much wonder at the Endeavour after Gain, but am extremely astonished that Men can be so sensible of the Danger of running into Debt. One would think it impossible a Man who is given to contract Debts should know, that his Creditor has, from that Moment in which he transgresses Payment, destroyed in the Fire of London. The gate which succeeded and was used, like its predecessors, as a wretched prison for debtors, was pulled down in 1760, and the prisoners removed, first to the London workhouse, afterwards to part of the Giltspur Street Compter.

so much as that Demand comes to in his Debtor's Honour, Liberty, and Fortune. One would think he did not know, that his Creditor can say the worst thing imaginable of him, to wit, That he is unjust, without Defamation, and can seize his Person, without being guilty of an Assault. Yet such is the loose and abandoned turn of some Men's Minds that they can live under these constant Apprehensions, and still go on to encrease the Cause of them. Can there be a more low and servile Condition, than to be ashamed, or afraid, to see any one Man breathing? Yet he that is much in Debt, is in that Condition with relation to twenty different People. There are indeed Circumstances wherein Men of honest Natures may become liable to Debts, by some unadvised Behaviour in any great Point of their Life, or mortgaging a Man's Honesty as a Security for that of another, and the like: but these Instances are so particular and circumstantiated, that they cannot come within general Considerations. For one such Case as one of these, there are ten, where a Man, to keep up a Price of Revenue and Grandeur within his own House, shall shrink at the Expectation of such Demands at his Doors. The Debtor is the Creditor's Criminal, and all the Officers of Power and State, whom we behold make so great a Figure, are no other than so many Persons in Authority to make good his Charge against him. Human Society depends upon his having the Vengeance Law allot him, and the Debtor owes his Liberty to his Neighbour, as much as the Murderer does his Life to his Prince.

Our Gentry are, generally speaking, in Debt and many Families have put it into a kind of Method of being so from Generation to Generation. The Father mortgages when his Son is very young and the Boy is to marry as soon as he is at Age, to redeem it and find Portions for his Sisters. This, forsooth, is no great Inconvenience to him, for he may wench, keep a publick Table or feed Dogs, like a worthy English Gentleman, till he has out run half his Estate, and leave the same Incumbrance upon his First-Lorn, and so on, till one Man of more Vigour than ordinary goes quite through the Estate or some Man of Sense comes into it, and scorns to have an Estate in Partnership, that is to say, liable to the Demand or Insult of any Man living. There is my Friend Sir Andrew, tho' for many Years a great and general Trader, was never the Defendant in a Law-Suit, in all the Perplexity of Business, and the Iniquity of Mankind at present. No one had any Colour for the least Complaint against his Dealings with him. This is certainly an uncommon, and in its Proportion as huddable in a Citizen, as it is in a General never to have suffered a Disadvantage in Fight. How different from this Gentleman is Jack Truepenny, who has been in old Acquaintance of Sir Andrew and myself from Boys, but could never learn our Caution. Jack has a whorish unresisting Good-nature, which makes him incapable of having a Property in any thing. His Fortune, his Reputation, his Time and his Capacity, are at any Man's Service that comes first. When he was at School, he was whipped thrice a Week for Faults he took upon him to excuse others, since he came into the Business of the World, he has been arrested twice or thrice a Year for Debts he had nothing to do with, but as a Surety for others, and I remember when a Friend of his had suffered in the Vice of the Town, all the Physick his Friend took was conveyed to him by Jack, and inscribed, 'A Bolus or an Electuary for Mr Truepenny'. Jack had a good Estate left him, which came to nothing because he believed all who pretended to Demands upon it. This Easiness and Credulity destroy all the other Merit he has and he has all his Life been a Sacrifice to others, without ever receiving Thanks, or doing one good Action.

I will end this Discourse with a Speech which I heard Jack make to one of his Creditors, (of whom he deserved gentler Usage) after lying a whole Night in Custody at his Suit.

SIR,

'Your Ingratitude for the many Kindnesses I have done you shall not make me unthankful for the Good you have done me, in letting me see there is such a Man as you in the World. I am obliged to you for the Diffidence I shall have all the rest of my Life. I shall hereafter trust no Man so far as to be in his Debt.' R

WHEN the Weather hinders me from taking my Diversions without Doors, I frequently make a little Party with two or three select Friends, to visit any thing curious that may be seen under Cover. My principal Entertainments of this Nature are Pictures, inasmuch that when I have found the Weather set in to be very bad, I have taken a whole Days Journey to see a Gallery that is furnished by the Hands of great Masters. By this means, when the Heavens are filled with Clouds, when the Earth swims in Rain, and all Nature wears a lowering Countenance, I withdraw myself from these uncomfortable Scenes into the visionary Worlds of Art where I meet with shining Landscapes, glistering Triumphs, beautiful Feces, and all those other Objects that fill the mind with gay Ideas, and disperse that Gloominess which is apt to hang upon it in those dark disconsolate Seasons.

I was some Weeks ago in a Course of these Diversions, which had taken such an entire Possession of my Imagination, that they formed in it a short Morning's Dream, which I shall communicate to my Reader, rather as the first Sketch and Outlines of a Vision, than as a finished Piece.

I dreamt that I was admitted into a long spacious Gallery, which had one Side covered with Pieces of all the Famous Painters who are now living, and the other with the Works of the greatest Masters that are dead.

On the side of the Living, I saw several Persons busy in Drawing, Colouring, and Designing, on the side of the Dead Painters, I could not discover more than one Person at Work, who was down by way of Table-Book, I found many things which gave me great Delight and as human Life turns upon the same Principles and Passions in all Ages, I thought it very proper to take Minutes of what passed in that Age, for the Instruction of this The Antiquary, who lent me these Papers, gave me a Character of Eucrate, the Favourite of Pharamond, extracted from an Author who lived in that Court. The Account he gives both of the Prince and this his faithful Friend, will not be improper to insert here, because I may have Occasion to mention many of their Conversations, into which these Memorials of them may give Light.

Pharamond, when he had a Mind to retire for an Hour or two from the Hurry of Business and Fatigue of Ceremonies, made a Signal to Eucrate, by putting his Hand to his Face placing his Arm negligently on a Window, or some such Action as appeared indifferent to all the rest of the Company. Upon such Notice, unobserved by others, (for their entire Intimacy was always a Secret) Eucrate repaired to his own Apartment to receive the King. There as a secret Access to this Part of the Court, at which Eucrate used to admit many whose mean Appearance in the Eyes of the ordinary Waiters and Doorkeepers made them be repulsed from other Parts of the Palace. Such as these were let in here by Order of Eucrate, and had Audiences of Pharamond. This Entrance Pharamond called The Gate of the Unlucky, and the Tears of the Afflicted who came before him, he would save were Prizes received by Eucrate for Eucrate had the most compassionate Spirit of all Men living, except his generous Master, who was always indled at the least affliction which was communicated to him. In the Regard for the Miserable, Eucrate took particular Care, that the common Torments of Distress, and the idle Pretences to Sorrow, about Courts, who wanted only Supplies to Luxury, should never obtain Favour by his Means. But the Distresses which arise from the many inexplicable Occurrences that happen among Men, the unaccountable Alienation of Parents from their Children, Cruelty of Husbands to Wives, Poverty occasioned from Shipwreck, or Fire, the falling out of Friends, or such other terrible Disasters, to which the Life of Man is exposed. In Cases of this Nature, Eucrate was the Patron, and enjoyed this Part of the Royal Favour so much without being envied, that it was never inquired into by whose Means, almost no one else cared for doing, was brought about.

One Evening when Pharamond came into the Apartment of Eucrate, he found him extremely dejected upon which he asked (with a Smile which was natural to him) "What, is there any one too miserable to be relieved by Pharamond," that Eucrate is melancholy? I fear there is, answered the Favourite, a Person without, of a good Air, well Dressed, and tho' a Man in the Strength of his Life, seems to faint under some inconsolable Calamity. All his Features seem suffused with Agony of Mind but I can observe in him, that it is more inclined to break away in Tears than Rage. I asked him what he would have he said he would speak to Pharamond. I desired his Business he could hardly say to me, Eucrate, carry me to the King, my Story is not to be told twice, I fear I shall not be able to speak it at all." Pharamond commended Eucrate to let him enter he did so, and the Gentleman approached the King with an Air which spoke [him under the greatest Concern in what Manner to demean himself.] The King, who had a quick Discerning, relieved him from the Oppression he was under and with the most beautiful Complacency said to him, "Sir, do not add to that Lord of Sorrow I see in your Countenance, the Ave of my Presence. Think you are speaking to your Friend if the Circumstances of your Distress will admit of it, you shall find me so." To whom the Stranger "Oh excellent Pharamond, name not a Friend to the unfortunate Spinamont. I had one, but he is dead by my own Hand<sup>2</sup> but, oh Pharamond, tho' it was by the Hand of Spinamont, it was by the Guilt of Pharamond. I come not, oh excellent Prince, to implore your Pardon I come to relate my Sorrow, a Sorrow too great for human Life to support. From henceforth shall all Occurrences appear Dreams or short in Trials of Amusement, from this one Affliction which has seized my very Being. Pardon me, oh Pharamond, if my Griefs give me Leave, that I lay before you, in the Anguish of my wounded Mind, that you, good as you are, are guilty of the generous Blood spilt this Day by this unhappy Hand. Oh that it had perished before that Instant!" Here the Stranger

'praised, and recollecting his Mind, after some little Meditation, he went on in a calmer Tone and Gesture as follows:

"There is an Authority due to Distress and as none of human Race is above the Reach of Sorrow, none should be above the Hearing the Voice of it. I am sure Pharamond is not 'know then, that I have this Morning unfortunately killed in a Duel, the Man whom of all Men living I most loved. I command my self too much in your royal Presence, to say, Pharamond, give me my Friend! Pharamond has taken him from me! I will not say, shall the merciful Pharamond destroy his own Subjects? Will the Father of his Country murder his People? But, the merciful Pharamond does destroy his Subjects, the Father of his Country does murder his People. Fortune is so much the Pursuit of Mankind, that all Glory and Honour is in the Power of a Prince, because he has the Distribution of their Fortunes. It is therefore the Inadvertency, Negligence, or Guilt of Princes, to let any thing grow into Custom which is against their Laws. A Court can make Fashion and Duty walk together: it can never, without the Guilt of a Court, happen, that it shall not be unfashionable to do what is unlawful. But alas! in the Dominions of Pharamond, by the Force of a tyrant Custom, which is misnamed a Point of Honour, the Duellist kills his Friend whom he loves and the Judge condemns the Duellist, while he approves his Behaviour. Shame is the greatest of all Evils: what cruel Laws, when Death only attends the Breach of them, and Shame Obedience to them? As for me, oh Pharamond, were it possible to describe the nameless Kinds of Compunctions and Tendernesses I feel, when I reflect upon the little Accidents in our former Familiarity, my Mind swells into Sorrow which cannot be resisted enough to be silent in the Presence of Pharamond. With that he fell into a Flood of Tears, and wept loud. Why should not Pharamond hear the Anguish he only can relieve others from in Time to come? Let him hear from me, what they feel who have given Death by the false Mercy of his Administration, and form to himself the Vengeance call'd for by those who have perished by his Negligence. R

I am the Custom of the Mal'emetals, if they see any printed or written Paper upon the Ground to rub it up and by it ride carefully, as no knowing, but it may contain some Piece of their Allegory. I must confess I have so much of the Mal'emetals in me that I can at forbear smiling in every printed Paper which comes in my Way, under whatsoever despicable Circumstances it may appear, for as no mortal Author, in the ordinary Rate and Vicissitude of Things, knows to what Use his Works may, some time or other, be applied, a Man may often meet with very celebrated Names in a Paper of Tobacco. I have lighted my Pipe more than once with the Writings of a Prelate, and know a Friend of mine, who, for these several Years has converted the Essays of a Man of Quality into a kind of Fringe for his Candlesticks. I remember in particular, after having read over a Poem of an Eminent Author on a Victory, I met with several Fragments of it upon the next rejoicing Day, which had been employ'd in Squibs and Crackers, and by that means celebrated its Subject in a double Capacity. I once met with a Page of Mr Baxter under a Christmas Pye. Whether or no the Pastry-Cook had made use of it through Chance or Waggery, for the Defence of that superstitious Vande, I know not but upon the Perusal of it, I conceived so good an Idea of the Author's Piety, that I bought the whole Book. I have often profited by these accidental Readings, and have sometimes found very Curious Pieces, that are either out of Print, or not to be met with in the Shops of our London Booksellers. For this Reason, when my Friends take a Survey of my Library, they are very much surpris'd to find, upon the Shelf of Folios, two long Band-Boxes standing upright among my Books, till I let them see that they are both of them lined with deep Erudition and abstruse Literature. I might likewise mention a Paper-Kite, from which I have received great Improvement and a Hat Case, which I would not exchange for all the Beavers in Great Britain. This my inquisitive Temper, or rather impertinent Humour of prying into all Sorts of Writing, with my natural Aversion to Loquacity, give me a good deal of Employment when I enter my House in the Country for I cannot for my Heart leave a Room, before I have thoroughly studied the Walls of it, and examined the several printed Papers which are usually pasted upon them. The last Piece that I met with upon this Occasion gave me a most exquisite Pleasure. My Reader will think I am not serious, when I recount him that the Piece I am going to speak of was the old Ballad of the Two Children in the Wood, which is one of the darling Songs of the common People, and has been the Delight of most Englishmen in some Part of their Age.

This Song is a plain simple Copy of Nature, destitute of the Helps and Ornaments of Art. The Tale of it is a pretty Tragicall Story, and pleases for no other Reason but because it is a Copy of Nature. There is even a despicable Simplicity in the Verse and yet because the Sentiments appear genuine and unaffected, they are able to move the Mind of the most polite Reader with inward Meltings of Humanity and Compassion. The Incidents grow out of the Subject, and are such as are the most proper to excite Pity, for which Reason the whole Narration has something in it very moving, notwithstanding the Author of it (whoever he was) has deliver'd it in such an object Phrase and Poorness of Expression, that the quoting any part of it would look like a Design of turning it into Ridicule. But though the Language is mean, the Thoughts, as I have before said, from one end to the other are natural,<sup>1</sup> and therefore cannot fail to please those who are not Judges of Language, or those who, notwithstanding they are Judges of Language, have a true<sup>2</sup> and unprejudiced Taste of Nature. The Condition, Speech, and the Behaviour of the dying Parents, with the Age, Innocence, and Distress of the Children, are set forth in such tender Circumstances, that it is impossible for a Reader of common Humanity<sup>3</sup> not to be affected with them. As for the Circumstance of the Robin and the Gray, it is indeed a little Puerile Ornament, and to show [the Genius of the Author<sup>4</sup>] amidst all his Simplicity, it is just the same kind of Fiction which one of the greatest of the Latin Poets has made use of upon a parallel Occasion. I mean that Passage in Horne, where he describes himself when he was a Child, fallen asleep in a desert Wood and covered with Leaves by the Turtles that took pity on him.

I have heard that the late Lord Dorset, who had the greatest Wit temper'd with the greatest Candour,<sup>5</sup> and was one of the finest Cruicks as well as the best Poets of his Age, had a numerous collection of old English Ballads, and took a particular Pleasure in the Reading of them. I can affirm the same of Mr Dryden, and know several of the most refined Writers of our present Age who are of the same Humour.

I might likewise refer my Reader to Moliere's Thoughts on this Subject, as he has expressed them in the Character of the Misanthrope, but those only who are endowed with a true Greatness of Soul and Genius can divest themselves of the little Images of Ridicule, and admire Nature in her Simplicity and Nakedness. As for the little conceited Wits of the Age, who can only shew their Judgment by finding Fault, they cannot be supposed to admire these Productions [which<sup>6</sup>] have nothing to recommend them but the Beauties of Nature, when they do not know how to relish even those Compositions that, with all the Beauties of Nature, have also the additional Advantages of Art.

THERE are several Arts which [all Men are]<sup>1</sup> in some measure [Masters<sup>2</sup>] of, without having been at the Pains of learning them. Every one that speaks or reasons is a Grammarian and a Logician, tho' he may be wholly unacquainted with the Rules of Grammar or Logic, as they are delivered in Books and Systems. In the same Manner, every one is in some Degree a Master of that Art which is generally distinguished by the Name of Physiognomy, and naturally forms to himself the Character or Fortune of a Stranger, from the Features and Linaments of his Face. We are no sooner presented to any one we never saw before, but we are immediately struck with the Idea of a proud, a reserved, an affable, or a good-natured Man, and upon our first going into a Company of [Strangers,<sup>3</sup>] our Benevolence or Aversion, Love or Contempt, rises naturally towards several particular Persons before we have heard them speak a single Word, or so much as know who they are.

Every Passion gives a particular Cast to the Countenance, and is apt to discover itself in some Feature or other. I have seen an Eye-curse for half an Hour together, and an Eye-brow call a Man Scoundrel. Nothing is more common than for Lovers to complain, resent, languish, despair, and die in dumb Show. For my own part, I am so apt to frame a Notion of every Man's Humour or Circumstances by his Looks, that I have sometimes employed my self from Charing-Cross to the Royal-Exchange in drawing the Characters of those who have passed by me. When I see a Man with a sour riddled Face, I cannot forbear pitying his Wife, and when I meet with an open ingenious Countenance, think on the Happiness of his Friends, his Family, and Relations.

I cannot recollect the Author of a famous Saying to a Stranger who stood silent in his Company, Speak that I may see thee.<sup>4</sup> But, with Submission, I think we may be better known by our Looks than by our Words, and that a Man's Speech is much more easily disguised than his Countenance. In this Case, however, I think the Air of the whole Face is much more expressive than the Lines of it. The Truth of it is, the Air is generally nothing else but the inward Disposition of the Mind made visible.

Those who have established Physiognomy into an Art, and laid down Rules of judging Mens Tempers by their Faces, have regarded the Features much more than the Air. Martial has a pretty Epigram on this Subject.

What Addison thought of the 'little images of Ridicule' set up against him, the last paragraph of this Essay shows, but the collection of texts shows that he did flinch a little. We now see how he modified many expressions in the reprint of this Essay upon the Babes in the Wood.<sup>5</sup> [every Man is]

IT has been the Purpose of several of my Speculations to bring People to an unconcerned Behaviour, with relation to their Persons, whether beautiful or defective. As the Secrets of the Ugly Club were exposed to the Publick, that Men might see there were some noble Spirits in the Age, who were not at all displeased with themselves upon Considerations which they had no Choice in so the Discourse concerning Idols tended to lessen the Value People put upon themselves from personal Advantages, and Gifts of Nature. As to the latter Species of Mankind, the Beauties, whether Male or Female, they are generally the most untractable People of all others. You are so excessively perplexed with the Particularities in their Behaviour, that, to be at Ease, one would be apt to wish there were no such Creatures. They expect so great Allowances, and give so little to others, that they who have to do with them find in the main a Man with a better Person than ordinary, and a beautiful Woman might be very happily changed for such a whom Nature has been less liberal. The Handsome Fellow is usually so much a Gentleman, and the Fine Woman has something so becoming that there is no enduring either of her. It has therefore been generally my Choice to mix with cheerful Ugly Creatures rather than Gentlemen who are Graceful enough to omit or do what they please or Beauties who have Charms enough to do and say what would be disoblige in any but themselves.

Diffidence and Presumption upon account of our Persons, are equal Faults and both arise from the Want of knowing, or rather endeavouring to know, our selves and for what we ought to be valued or neglected. But indeed I did not imagine these little Considerations and Coquerries could have the ill Consequences as I find they have by the following Letters of my Correspondents, where it seems Beauty is thrown into the Account, in Matters of Sale, to those who receive no Favour from the Charmers

MR SPECTATOR,

'After I have assured you I am in every respect one of the Handsomest young Girls about Town—I need be particular in nothing but the make of my Face which has the Misfortune to be exactly Oval. This I take to proceed from a Temper that naturally inclines me both to speak and hear

'With this Account you may wonder how I can have the Vanity, to offer my self as a Candidate, which I now do, to a Society, where the SPECTATOR and Hecatesa have been omitted with so much Applause. I don't want to be put in mind how very Defective I am in every thing that is Ugly. I am too sensible of my own Unworthiness in this Particular, and therefore I only propose my self as a Tool to the Club

'You see how honest I have been to confess all my Imperfections, which is a great deal to come 'from a Woman, and what I hope you will encourage with the Favour of your Interest

'I here can be no Objection made on the Side of the matchless Hecatesa, since it is certain I shall be in no Danger of giving her the least occasion of Jealousy. And her Joint-Stool in the very lowest Place at the Table, is all the Honour that is conveyed by

MR SPECTATOR, London, June 7, 1711

'Upon reading your late Dissertation concerning Idols, I cannot but comply to you that there are, in six or seven Places of this City, Coffee-houses kept by Persons of that Sisterhood. These Idols sit and receive all Day long the adoration of the Youth within such and such Districts. I know, in particular, Gnods not entered as they ought to be at the Custom house, nor Law-Reports perused at the Temple by reason of one Beauty who detains the young Merchants too long near Claire, and another Fair One who keeps the Students at her House when they should be at Study. It would be worth your while to see how the Idolaters alternately oblige to her Idols, and what Heart burnings arise in those who wait for their Turn to receive kind Aspects from those little Thrones, which all the Company, but these Lovers, call the bars. I saw a Gentleman turn as pale as Ashes because an Idol turned the Sugar in a Tea-Dish for his Rivall, and carelessly called the Boy to serve him, with a Servant. Il faut se lever pour la Gentil on the Box to please the self. Certain it is that a very hopeful young Man is taken with Leads in his Pocket below bridge, where he intended to drown himself, because his Idol would wash the Dish in which she had [but just] drank Tea, before she would let him use it.

'I am, Sir, a Person past being Amorous, and do not give this Information out of Envy or Jealousy, but I am a real Sufferer by it. These Lovers take any thing for Tea and Coffee. I saw one Yesterday sufficient to make his Court and all his Rivals at the same time, loud in the Commendation of Liquors that went against every body in the Room that was so in Love. While these young Fellows resign their Stomachs with their Hearts, and drink at the Idol in this manner—we who come to do Business, or talk Politics, are utterly poisoned. They have also Drums for those who are more enanoured than ordinary, and it is very common for such as are too low in Constitution to ogle the Idol upon the Strength of Tea to suffer themselves with warmer Liquors. Thus all Pretenders advance, as fast as they can, to a Fever or a Diabasis. I must repeat to you, that I do not look with an 'evil Eye upon the Profit of the Idols, or the Di'version of the Lovers what I hope from this 'Remonstrance, is only that we plain People may 'not be served as if we were Idolaters, but that 'from the time of publishing this in your Paper,

'the Idols would mix Ratsbane only for their 'Admirers, and tile more care of us who don't 'love them I am,

Virg*

MR SPECTATOR, May 30, 1711
I HAVE no small Value for your Labours to lay before the World what in my Escape their Observation and yet highly conduces to their Service You have, I think, succeeded very well on many Subjects and seem to have been conversant in very different Scenes of Life But in the Considerations of Mankind, as a SPECTA-TOR, you should not omit Circumstances which relate to the inferior Part of the World, any more than those which concern the greater There is one thing in particular which I wonder you have not touched upon, and that is the general Corruption of Manners in the Servants of Great Britain I am a Man that have travelled and seen many Nations, not have for seven Years last past resided constantly in London or within twenty Miles of it In this Time I have contracted a numerous Acquaintance among the best Sort of People, and have hardly found one of them happy in their Servants This is matter of great Astonishment to Foreigners, and all such as have visited Foreign Countries especially since we cannot but observe, that there is no Part of the World where Servants have those Privileges and Advantages as in England They have no where else such plentiful Diet, large Wages, or indulgent Liberty There is no Place wherein they labour less, and yet where they are so little respectful, more wasteful, more negligent, or where they so frequently change their Masters To this I attribute, in a great measure, the frequent Robberies and Losses which we suffer on the high Road and in our own Houses That indeed which gives me the present Thought of this kind, is, that a careless Groom of mine has spoiled me the prettiest Pad in the World with 'only riding him ten Miles, and I as sure you, if I 'were to hire a Register of all the Horses I have 'known thus abused by Negligence of Servants,

'the Number would mount a Regiment I wish 'you would give us your Observation, that we 'may know how to treat these Rogues, or that 'we Masters may enter into Measures to reform
'them Pray give us a Speculation in general about Servants and your make me

'Pray do not omit the Mention of Grooms in particular M to Britannicus

This honest Gentleman, who is so desirous that I should write a Satyr upon Grooms has a great deal of Reason for his Resentment and I know no Evil which touch a all Mankind so much as this of the Misbehaviour of Servants.

The Complaint of this Letter runs wholly upon Men Servants and I can attribute the seriousness which has at present prevailed a non, them, to nothing, but what an hundred before me I have described it to The Cause of giving Board Wages This one Instance of false Economy is sufficient to debase the whole Nation of Servants, and makes them as it were but for some part of their Time in that Quality They are either attending in Places where they meet a iddle into Clubs, or else if they want it takes they eat after their Masters and receive their Wages for other Occasions From hence it is that that they are but in a lower Degree what their Masters themselves are and usually affect an imitation of their Manners And you have in Favourites, Jesters, Leeches and Coxcombs in a high Perfection as in any People that keep Language
It is a common Humour among the Retinue of People of Quality, when they are in their Revels, that is when they are out of their Masters Sight to assume in a humorous Way the Names and Titles of those whose Liveries they wear By which means Characters and Distinctions become so familiar to them, that it is to this among other Causes, one may impute a certain insolence among our Servants, that they take no Notice of any Gentlemen though they know him ever so well, except he is an Acquaintance of their Masters

My Obscurity and Trembling leave me not Liberty, without Scandal, to dare if I think fit, at a common Ordinary, in the meanest as well as the most sumptuous House of Entertainment Falling in the other Day at a Victualling House near the House of Peers, I heard the Waiter come down and tell the Landlord that the Lord Bishop swore he would throw her out at Window, if she did not bring up more Mill Beer, and that my Lord Duke would have a double Mug of Port My Surprise was unreasonable, in hearing loud and rudest Voices speak and answer to each other upon the publick Affairs, by the Names of the most illustrious of our Nobility till of a sudden one came running in, and cry'd the House was rising Down came all the Company together, and away The Alehouse was immediately filled with Clamour, and scoring one Mug to the Marquis of such a Place, Oyl and Vinegar to such an

'however in my Eye a very charming old Woman.
'We often lament that we did not marry sooner,
'but she has no Body to blame for it but her self.
'You know very well that she would never think 'of me whilst she had a Tooth in her Head. I 'have put the Date of my Passion (Anno Amoris 'Trigesimo primo) instead of a Poey, on my 'Wedding-Ring. I expect you should send me a 'Congratulatory Letter, or, if you please, an Epi-
'thalamium, upon this Occasion.

Mrs Murth's and

Yours Evernally,

SAM HOEWELL

In order to banish an Evil out of the World, that does not only produce great Unpleasantness to private Persons, but has also a very bad Influence on the People, I shall endeavour to shew the Folly of Disgrace from two or three Reflections, which I earnestly recommend to the Thoughts of my fair Reader.

First of all I would have them seriously think on the Shortness of their Time. Life is not long enough for a Coquet to play all her Tricks in. A timorous Woman drops into her Grave before she has done deliberating. Were the Age of Man the same that it was before the Flood, a Lady might sacrifice half a Century to a Scruple, and be two or three Ages in demurring. Had she Time Him-dred Years good, she might hold out to the Conversion of the Fools before she thought fit to be prevailed upon. But, alas! she ought to play her Part in haste, when she considers that she is suddenly to quit the Stage, and make Room for others.

In the second Place, I would desire my Imitable Readers to consider, that as the Term of Life is short, that of Beauty is much shorter. The finest Skin wrinkles in a few Years, and loses the Strength of its Colourings so soon that we have scarce Time to admire it. I might embellish this Subject with Roses and Rain-bows and several other ingenious Conceits, which I may possibly reserve for another Opportunity.

There is a third Consideration which I would likewise recommend to a Demurrer, and that is the great Danger of her falling in Love when she is about Threescore, if she cannot satisfy her Doubts and Scruples before that Time. There is a kind of latter Spring, that sometimes gets into the Blood of an old Woman and turns her into a very odd sort of an Animal. I would therefore have the Demurrer consider what a strange Figure she will make, if she chances to get over all Difficulties and comes to a final Resolution, in that unreasonable Part of her Life.

I would not however be understood, by any thing I have here said, to discourage that natural Modesty in the Sex, which renders a Retreat from the first Approaches of a Lover both fashionable and graceful. All that I intend, is, to advise them, when they are prompted by Reason and Inclination, to demur only out of Fear, and so far as Decency requires. A virtuous Woman should reject the first Offer of Marriage, as a good Man does that of a Bishopric, but I would advise neither the one nor the other to persist in refusing what they secretly approve. I would in this Particular propose the Example of Eve to all her Daughters, as Milton has represented her in the following Passage, which I cannot forbear transcribing entire, tho' only the twelve last Lines are to my present Purpose.

The Rib he form'd and fashion'd with his Hands,

*Under his forming Hands a Creature grew,
Man-like, but diff'rent Sex, so lovely fair!
That what seem'd fair in all the World, seem'd a new*

*Mean, or in her sum'd up, in her contain'd
And in her Looks, which from that time infused Sweetness into my Heart, unsifted before
As d into all things from her Air insus'd
The Spirit of Love and amorous Delight*

*She disappear'd, and left me dark I wak'd
To find her, or for ever to deplore
Her Loss, and o'er Phasmas call'd my
When out of Hope, o'erwhelm'd, not far off,
Such as I saw her in my Dream, adorn'd
With what all Earth or Heaven could bestow
To make her amiable. On she came,
Led by her heavenly Maker, though unseen,
And guided by his Voice, nor uninform'd
Of nuptial Sanctity and Marriage Rites
Grace was in all her Steps, Heaven in her Eye,
In every Gesture Dignity and Love
I enjoy'd, could not forbear aloud*

This Turn hath made an end, thou hast fulfill'd

*Thy Words, Creator bounteous and benign!
Giver of all things fair! but fairest this
Of all thy Gifts, I or envist I now see*

None of my Love, I test of my Foes, my Self

*She heard me thus, and find divinely brought,
Yet Innocent and virgin Modesty,
Her Virtue, as if the Co-mixture of her Worth,*

*That would be good, and not unsought be won,
Not obvious, not obtrusive, but retir'd*

*The more desirable, or, to say all,
Nature her self, tho' pure of sin if I thought,
Wrought in her so, that when me, she turn'd<sup>2</sup>*

*I follow'd her, she what was Honour lov'd,
And with obsequious Majesty approv'd*

*My pleaded Reason to the Nuptial bower
I led her blushing like the Morn<sup>3</sup>—*

Incautus, furit. Virg

THERE is not, in my Opinion, a Consideration more effectual to extinguish inordinate Desires in the Soul of Man, than the Notions of Plato and his Followers<sup>4</sup> upon that Subject.

<sup>4</sup> Plato's doctrine of the soul and of its destiny is to be found at the close of his Republic, also near the close of the Phaedon, in a passage of the Philebus, and in another of the Gorgias. In § 231 of the Phaedon is the passage here especially

They tell us, that every Passion which has been contracted by the Soul during her Residence in the Body remains with her in a separate State, and that the Soul in the Body or out of the Body, differs no more than the Man does from himself when he is in his House, or in open Air. When therefore the obnoxious Passions in particular have once taken Root and spread themselves in the Soul, they cleave to her inseparably, and remain in her for ever, after the body is cast off and thrown aside. As an Argument to confirm this their Doctrine they observe that a lewd Youth who goes on in a continued Course of Voluptuousness, advances by Degrees into a hideous old Man; and that the Passions survive in the Mind when it is divorced from the Body, nay, that the Desire grows more violent, and like all other Habits gathers Strength by use at the same time that it has no Power of executing its own Purpose. If, say they, the Soul is the most proper Subject to these Passions at a time when it has the least assistance from the Body, we may well suppose she will still retain them when she is entirely divested of it. The very Substance of the Soul is festured with the vicious Corruption; is gone too far to be ever cured. The Inflammation will rage to all Eternity.

In this therefore (say the Platonists) consists the Punishment of a Voluptuous Man after Death. He is tormented with Desires which it is impossible for him to gratify, solicited by a Passion to which he neither Obedies nor Obeys, and is tied to it. He lives in a State of perpetual Desire and Impotence, and always bums in the Pursuit of what he always despairs to possess. It is for this Reason (says Plato) that the Souls of the Dead appear frequently in Communities, and hover about the Places where their Bodies were buried, as still hankering after their old brutish Pleasures, and desiring again to enter the Body that gave them an Opportunity of fulfilling them.

Some of our most eminent Divines have made use of this Platonick Notion, so far as it respects the Subsistence of our Passions after Death, with great Beauty and Strength of Reason. Plato indeed carries the Thought very far, when he rests upon his Opinion of Ghosts appearing in Places of Burial though I must confess if one did believe that the departed Souls of Men and Women wandered up and down these lower Regions, and entertained themselves with the Sight of their Species, one could not desire a more proper Hell for an impure Spirit than that which Plato has touched upon.

The Ancients seem to have drawn such Sort of Torments in the Description of Tartarus, who was punished with the Rage of an eternal Fire, and set up to the Chin in Water that fled from his Lips, whenever he attempted to drink, it

Virgil, who has cast the whole System of Platonick Philosophy, so far as it relates to the Soul of Man, in beautiful Allegories, in the sixth Book of his Aeneid gives us the Punishment of a Voluptuary after Death, not unlike that which we are here speaking of

That I may a little alleviate the Severity of this my Speculation (which otherwise may lose me several of my polite Readers) I shall translate a Story (that) has been quoted upon another Occasion by one of the most learned Men of the present Age, as I find it in the Original. The Reader will see it is not foreign to my present Subject, and I dare say will think it a lively Representation of a Person lying under the Torments of such a kind of Torment, or Platonick Hell, as that which we have now under Consideration. Monsieur Ponticnon speaking of a Love-Adventure that happened to him in the Country, gives the following Account of it.

'When I was in the Country last Summer, I was often in Company with a Couple of charming Women, who had all the Wit and Beauty one could desire in female Companions, with a Dish of Coquetry, that from time to time gave me a great many agreeable Torments. I was, after my Way, in Love with both of them, and had such frequent opportunities of pleading my Passion to them when they were asunder, that I had Reason to hope for particular Favours from each of them. As I was walking one Evening in my Chamber with nothing about me but my Night gown, they both came into my Room and told me, they had a very pleasant Trick to put upon a Gentleman that was in the same House, provided I would bear a Part in it. Upon this they told me such a plausible Story, that I laughed at their Continuance, and agreed to do whatever they should require of me. They immediately began to wrangle me up in my Night gown with long Pieces of Linnen, which they folded about me till they had wrapt me in above in hundred Yards of Swath. My Arms were pressed to my Sides, and my Legs closed together by so many Wrappers one over another, that I looked like an Egyptian Mummy. As I stood bolt upright upon one End in this antique Figure, one of the Ladies burst out a laughing, and now Ponticnon, says she, we intend to perform the Promise that we find you have ex-referred to which was the basis of of lines 461-475 of Milton's Comus. The list of our own Platonists was Henry More, one of whose books Addison quoted four essays back in No. 86, and who died only four and twenty years before these essays were written, after a long contest in prose and verse, against besotting or obfuscating the soul with 'the foul steam of earthly life'.

"torted from each of us. You have often asked the Favour of us, and I dare say you are a better bred Cavalier than to refuse to go to Bed to two Ladies, that desire it of you. After having stood a Fit of Laughter, I begged them to uncase me, and do with me what they pleased. No, no, said they, we like you very well as you are, and upon that ordered me to be carried to one of their Houses, and put to Bed in all my Swaddles. The Room was lighted up on all Sides, and I was laid very decently between a [Pair] of Sheets, with my Head (which was indeed the only Part I could move) upon a very high Pillow. This was no sooner done, but my two Female Friends came into Bed to me in their finest Night Clothes. You may easily guess at the Condition of a Man that saw a Couple of the most beautiful Women in the World undrest and abed with him, without being able to stir Hand or Foot. I begged them to release me, and struggled all I could to get loose, which I did with so much Violence, that about Midnight they both leaped out of the Bed, crying out they were undone. But seeing me safe, they took their Posts again, and renewed their Raillery. Finding all my Prayers and Endeavours were lost, I composed my self as well as I could, and told them, that if they would not unbind me, I would fall asleep between them, and by that means disgrace them for ever. But alas! this was impossible. Could I have been disposed to it, they would have prevented me by several little ill-natured Caresses and Endearments which they bestowed upon me. As much devoted as I am to Womankind, I would not pass such another Night to be Master of the whole Sex. My Reader will doubtless be curious to know what became of me the next Morning. Why, truly my Bed fellows left me about an Hour before Day, and told me, if I would be good and lie still, they would send somebody to take me up as soon as it was time for me to rise. Accordingly about Nine a Clock in the Morning an old Woman came to unsuath me. I bore all this very patiently, being resolved to take my Revenge of my Tormentors, and to keep no Measures with them as soon as I was at Liberty. But upon asking my old Woman what was become of the two Ladies, she told me she believed they were by that time within Sight of Paris, for that they went away in a Coach and six before five a clock in the Morning.

Sound and Elevation of the History, instead of Mr and Mrs such a one, I shall call them by feigned Names. Without further Preface, you are to know, that within the Liberties of the City of Westminster lives the Lady Honoria, a Widow about the Age of Forty, of a healthy Constitution, gay Temper, and elegant Person. She dresses a little too much like a Girl, affects a childish Fondness in the Tone of her Voice, sometimes a pretty Sullenness in the turning of her Head, and now and then a Down cast of her Eyes on her Fan. Neither her Imagination nor her Health would ever give her to know that she is turned of twenty, but that in the midst of these pretty Softnesses, and Airs of Delicacy and Attraction, she has a tall Daughter within a Fortnight of Fifteen, who impudently comes into the Room, and towers so much towards Woman, that her Mother is always checked by her Presence, and every Charm of Honoria droops at the Entrance of Flavia. The agreeable Flavia would be what she is not as well as her Mother Honoria, but all their Beholders are more partial to an Affection of what a Person is growing up to, than of what has been already enjoyed, and is gone for ever. It is therefore allowed to Flavia to look forward, but not to Honoria to look back. Flavia is no way dependent on her Mother with relation to her Fortune, for which Reason they live almost upon an Equality in Conversation and as Honoria has given Flavia to understand, that it is ill-bred to be always calling Mother, Flavia is as well pleased never to be called Child. It happens by this means, that these Ladies are generally Rivals in all Places where they appear, and the Words Mother and Daughter never pass between them but out of Spite. Flavia one Night at a Play observing Honoria draw the Eyes of several in the Pit, called to a Lady who sat by her, and bid her ask her Mother to lend her her Snuff-Box for one Moment. Another Time, when a Lover of Honoria was on his Knees beseeching the Favour to kiss her Hand, Flavia rushing into the Room, kneeled down by him and asked Blessing. Several of these contradictory Acts of Duty have rused between them such a Coldness that they generally converse when they are in mixed Company by way of talking at one another, and not to one another. Honoria is ever complaining of a certain Sufficiency in the young Women of this Age, who assume to themselves an Authority of carrying all things before them, as if they were Possessors of the Esteem of Mankind, and all who were but a Year before them in the World, were neglected or deceased. Flavia, upon such a Provocation, is sure to observe, that there are People who can resign nothing, and know not how to give up what they know they cannot hold; that there are those who will not allow Youth their Follies, not because they are themselves past them, but because they love to continue in them. These Beauties Rival each other on all Occasions, not that they have always had the same Lovers, but each has kept up a Vanity to shew the other the Charms of her Lover. Dick Crastin and Tom Fulp, among many others, have of late been Pretenders in this Family. Dick to Honoria, Tom to Flavia. Dick is the only surviving Beau of the last Age, and Tom almost the only one that keeps up that Order of Men in this

I wish I could repeat the little Circumstances of a Conversation of the four Lovers with the Spirit in which the young Lady, I had my Account from, represented it at a Visit where I had the Honour to be present but it seems Dick Crustin, the admirer of Honoria, and Tom Tulip, the Pretender to Flavia, were purposely admitted together by the Ladies, that each might shew the other that her Lover had the Superiority in the Accomplishments of that sort of Creature whom the sillier Part of Women call a fine Gentleman. As this Age has a much more gross Taste in Courtship, as well as in every thing else, than the last had, these Gentlemen are Instances of it in their different Manner of Application. Tulip is ever making Allusions to the Vigour of his Person, the snewy Force of his Make while Crustin professes a wary Observation of the Turns of his Mistress's Mind. Tulip gives himself the Air of a restless Ravisher, Crustin pretences that of a skilful Lover. Poetry is the inseparable Property of every Man in Love, and as Men of Wit write Verses on those Occasions, the rest of the World repeat the Verses of others. These Servants of the Ladies were used to imitate their Manner of Conversation, and allude to one another, rather than interchange Discourse in what they said when they met. Tulip the other Day seized his Mistress's Hand, and repeated out of Ovid's Art of Love,

'Tis I can in soft Battles pass the Night,
Yet rise next Morning vigorous for the Fight,
Fresh as the Day, and active as the Light

Upon hearing this, Crustin, with an Air of Deference, played Honoria's Fan, and repeated,

Sedley has that pleasant & gentle Art,
That can with a resistless Charm impart
The looest Wishes to the churlish Heart
Kaise such a Conflict, kindle such a Fire, Between declining Virtue and Desire,
'Till the poor vanquish'd Maid dissolves away
In Dreams all Night, in Sighs and Tears all Day

When Crustin had uttered these Verses with a Tenderness which at once spoke Passion and Respect Honoria cast a triumphant Glance at Flavia, as exulting in the Elegance of Crustin's Courtship, and upbraiding her with the Homeliness of Tulip's. Tulip understood the Reproach, and in Return began to apply the Wisdom of old amorous Gentlemen, who turned their Mistress's Imagination as far as possible from what they had long themselves forgot, and ended his Discourse with a sly Commendation of the Doctrine of Platonick Love at the same time he ran over, with a laughing Eye, Crustin's thin Legs, meagre Looks, and spare Body. The old Gentleman immediately left the Room with some Disorder, and the Conversation fell upon untimely Passion, After Love, and unreasonable Youth

Tulip sung, danced, moved before the Glass, led his Mistress half a Minuet, hummed

Celia the Fair, in the bloom of Fifteen, when there came a Servant with a Letter to him,
which was as follows

SIR,

'I understand very well what you meant by your Mention of Platonick Love. I shall be glad to meet you immediately in Hide-Parck, or behind Montague-House, or attend you to Barn-Elms, or any other fashionable Place that's fit for a Gentleman to die in, that you shall appoint for,

Sir, Your most Humble Servant,
Richard Crustin

Tulip's Colour changed at the reading of this Epistle, for which Reason his Mistress snatched it to read the Contents. While she was doing so Tulip went away, and the Ladies now agreeing in a Common Calumny, bewailed together the Danger of their Lovers. They immediately undressed to go out, and took Hackneys to prevent Mischief but, after alarming all Parts of the Town, Crustin was found by his Widow in his Pumps at Hide-Parck, which Appointment Tulip never kept, but made his Escape into the Country. Flavia tears her Hair for his inglorious Safety, curses and despises her Charming, is fallen in Love with Crustin. Which is the first Part of the History of the Rival Mother

LOOKING over the late Packets of Letters which have been sent to me, I found the following one

Your Paper is a Part of my 1st Equipage, and my Servant knows my Humour so well, that calling for my Breakfast this Morning (it being past my usual Hour) she answer'd, the SPECTATOR was not yet come in, but that the Tetter Kettle boiled, and she expected it every Moment. Having thus in part signified to you the Esteem and Veneration which I have for you, I must put you in mind of the Catalogue of Books which you have promised to recommend to our Sex, for I have deferred furnishing my Closet with Authors, till I receive your Advice in this Particular, being your daily Disciple and humble Servant,

LEONORA

In Answer to my fur Disciple, whom I am very

* A famous duelling place under elm trees, in a meadow half surrounded by the Thames.

* By Mrs Perry, whose sister, Miss Shepleard, has letters in two later numbers, 140 and 163. These ladies were descended from Sir Fleetwood Shepleard

* Rochester's Imitations of Horace, Sat I 10

proud of, I must acquaint her and the rest of my Readers, that since I have called out for Help in my Catalogue of a Lady's Library, I have received many Letters upon that Head, some of which I shall give an Account of

In the first Class I shall take notice of those which come to me from eminent Booksellers, who every one of them mention with Respect the Authors they have printed, and consequently live an Eye to their own Advantage more than to that of the Ladies. One tells me, that he thinks it absolutely necessary for Women to have true Notions of Right and Equity, and that therefore they cannot peruse a better Book than Dallori's Country Justice. Another thinks they cannot be without The Compleat Jockey. A third observing the Curiosity and Desire of prying into Secrets, which he tells me is natural to the fair Sex, is of Opinion this female Inclination, if well directed, might turn very much to their Advantage, and therefore recommends to me Mr Mede upon the Revelations. A fourth lays it down as an unquestioned Truth, that a Lady cannot be thoroughly accomplished who has not read The Secret Intrigues and Negotiations of Marshal D'Estrades. Mr Jacob Tonson Jun is of Opinion, that Bayle's Dictionary might be of very great use to the Ladies, in order to make them general Scholars. Another whose Name I have forgotten, thinks it highly proper that every Woman with Child should read Mr Wall's History of Infant Baptism. As another is very importunate with me to recommend to all my female Readers The pushing Stroke Being a Vindication of the Patriarchal Scheme, &c.

In the second Class I shall mention Books which are recommended by Husbands, if I may believe the Writers of them. Whether or no they are real Husbands or personated ones I cannot tell, but the Books they recommend are as follow. A Paraphrase on the History of Susanna. Keys to keep Lant. The Christian's Overthrow prevented. A Dissuasive from the Playhouse. The Virtues of Cambridge, with Directions to make Camshire Tea. The Passions of a Country Life. The Government of the Tongue. A Letter dated from Cleopatra desires me that I would advise all young Wives to make themselves Mistresses of Wingate's Arithmetic, and concludes with a Postscript, that he hopes I will not forget The Corianders of Kent's Receipts.

I may reckon the Ladies themselves as a third Class among these my Correspondents and Privy-Counsellors. In a Letter from one of them, I am advised to please Pharisaud at the Head of my Catalogue, and, if I think proper, to give the second place to Cassard's Coquette. Coquette begs me not to think of ruling Women upon their Knees with Manuals of Devotion, nor of scorching their Faces with Books of Housewifery. Florilla desires to know if there are any Books written against Prudes, and intreats me, if there are, to give them a Place in my Library. Plays of all Sorts have their several Advocates. All for Love is mentioned in above fifteen Letters. Sophonisba, or Hamibal's Overthrow, in a Dozen. The Innocent Adultery is likewise highly approved of. Mithridates King of Pontus has many Friends,

Alexander the Great and Aurengzebe have the same Number of Voices, but Theodosius, or The Force of Love, carries it from all the rest.<sup>1</sup>

I should, in the last Place, mention such Books as have been proposed by Men of Learning, and those who appear competent Judges of this Matter, and must here take Occasion to thank A B whoever it is that conceals himself under those two Letters, for his Advice upon this Subject. But as I find the Work I have undertaken to be very difficult, I shall defer the executing of it till I am further acquainted with the Thoughts of my judicious Contemporaries, and have time to examine the several Books, they offer to me being resolved, in an Affair of this Moment, to proceed with the greatest Caution.

In the mean while, as I have taken the Ladies under my particular Care, I shall make it my Business to find out in the best Authors ancient and modern such Passages as may be for their use, and endeavour to accommodate them as well as I can to their Taste not questioning but the valuable Part of the Sex will easily pardon me, if from Time to Time I laugh at those little Vanities and Follies which appear in the Behaviour of some of them, and which are more proper for Ridicule than a serious Censure. Most Books being calculated for Male Readers, and generally written with an Eye to Men of Learning, makes a Work of this Nature the more necessary besides, I am the more encouraged, because I flatter myself that I see the Sex daily improving by these my Speculations. My fair Readers are already deeper Scholars than the Brains I could name some of them who could tell much better than several Gentlemen that make a Figure at Will's, and as I frequently receive Letters from the fine Ladies and pretty Fellows, I cannot but observe that the former are superior to the others not only in the Sense but in the Spelling. This cannot but have a good Effect upon the female World, and keep them from being charmed by those empty Coxcombs that have hitherto been admired among the Women, tho' laugh'd at among the Men.

I am credibly informed that Tom a little passes for an impudent Fellow, that Will Trippet begins to be smacked, and that Irauh Smoothly himself is within a Month of a Coxcomb in case I think fit to continue this Paper. For my part, as it is my Business in some measure to detect such as would lead sorry weak Minds by their false Pretences to Wit and Judgment, Humour and Gallantry, I shall not fail to lend the best Lights I am able to the fair Sex for the Continuance of these their Discoveries. L

WE all of us complain of the Shortness of Time, saith Seneca,<sup>1</sup> and yet have much more than we know what to do with. Our Lives, says he, are spent either in doing nothing at all, or in doing nothing to the Purpose, or in doing nothing that we ought to do. We are always complaining our Days are few, and retung, as though there would be no End of them. That noble Philosopher has described our Inconvenieney with our selves in this Particular, by all those various Turns of Expression and Thought which are peculiar to his Writings.

I often consider Mankind as wholly inconsistent with itself in a Point that bears some Affinity to the former. Though we seem grieved at the Shortness of Life in general, yet we wish every Period of it to end. The Minor longs to be at Age, then to be a Man of Business, then to make up an Estate, then to arrive at Honour, then to retire. Thus although the whole of Life is allowed by every one to be short the several Divisions of it appear long and tedious. We are for lengthening our Span in general, but would fain contract the Parts of which it is composed. The Usurer would be very well satisfied to have all the Time annihilated that lies between the present Moment and next Quarter-day. The Politician would be contented to lose three Years in his Life, could he place things in the Posture which he fancies they will stand in after such a Revolution of Time. The Lover would be glad to strike out of his Existence all the Moments that are to pass away before the happy Meeting. Thus, as fast as our Time runs, we should be very glad in most Parts of our Lives that it run much faster than it does. Several Hours of the Day hang upon our Hands, nay we wish away whole Years and travel through Time as through a Country filled with many wild and empty Wastes, which we would fain hurry over, that we may arrive at those several little Settlements or imaginary Points of Rest which are dispersed up and down in it.

If we divide the Life of most Men into twenty Parts, we shall find that at least nineteen of them are meer Gaps and Chasms, which are neither filled with Pleasure nor Business. I do not however include in this Calculation the Life of those Men who are in a perpetual Hurry of Affairs, but of those only who are not always engaged in Scenes of Action, and I hope I shall not do an unacceptable Piece of Service to those Persons, if I point out to them certain Methods for the filling up their empty Spaces of Life. The Methods I shall propose to them are as follow.

The first is the Exercise of Virtue, in the most general Acceptation of the Word. That particular Scheme which comprehends the Social Virtues, may give Employment to the most industrious Temper, and find a Man in Business more than the most active Situation of Life. To relieve the Ignorant, relieve the Needy, comfort the Afflicted, are Duties that fall in our way almost every Day of our Lives. A Man has frequent Opportunities of mitigating the Fierceness of a Party, of doing Justice to the Character of a deserving Man, of softning the Lively, quieting the Angry, and rectifying the Prejudiced, which are all of them Employments suited to a reasonable Nature, and bring great Satisfaction to the Person who can busy himself in them with Discretion.

There is another kind of Virtue that may find Employment for those Retired Hours in which we are altogether left to our selves, and destitute of Company and Conversation, I mean that Interourse and Communication which every reasonable Creature ought to maintain with the great Author of his Being. The Man who lives under an habitual Sense of the Divine Presence keeps up a perpetual Cheerfulness of Temper, and enjoys every Moment the satisfaction of thinking himself in Company with his dearest and best of Friends. The Time never lies heavy upon him. It is impossible for him to be alone. His Thoughts and Passions are the most busied at such Hours when those of other Men are the most inactive. He no sooner steps out of the World but his Heart burns with Devotion, swells with Hope, and triumphs in the Consciousness of that Presence which every where surrounds him, or, on the contrary, pours out its Tears, its Sorrow, its Apprehensions, to the great Supporter of his Existence.

I have here only considered the Necessity of a Man's being Virtuous, that he may have something to do, but if we consider further, that the Exercise of Virtue is not only an Amusement for the time it lasts, but that its Influence extends to those Parts of our Existence which lie beyond the Grave, and that our whole Eternity is to take its Colour from those Hours when we here employ in Virtue or in Vice, the Argument redoubles upon us, for putting in Practice this Method of passing away our Time.

When a Man has but a little Stock to improve, and his opportunities of turning it all to good Account, what shall we think of him if he suffers nineteen Parts of it to be dead, and perhaps employs even the twentieth to his Ruin or Disadvantage? But because the Mind cannot be always in its Fervours, nor strung up to a Pitch of Virtue, it is necessary to find out proper Employment for it in its Relaxations.

The next Method therefore that I would propose to fill up our Time, should be useful and innoent Diversions. I must confess I think it is below reasonable Creatures to be altogether conversant in such Diversions as are utterly innocent, and have nothing else to recommend them, but that there is no Hurt in them. Whether any kind of Gaming has even thus much to say for itself, I shall not determine, but I think it is very wonderful to see Persons of the best Sense passing away a dozen Hours together in shuffling and dividing a Pack of Cards, with no other Conversation but what is made up of a few Game

Ideas, which we suppose are equally distinct in each of them, follow one another in a greater or less Degree of Rapidity.

There is a famous Passage in the Alcoran which looks as if Malomet had been possessed of the Notion we are now speaking of. It is there said that the Angel Gabriel took Malomet out of his Bed one Morning to give him a Sight of all things in Seven Heavens, in Paradise, and in Hell, which the Prophet took a distinct View of, and after having held many Discourses and Conferences with God, was brought back again to his Bed. All this says the Alcoran is related in so small a space of Time that Malomet still in Return found his Bed still warm, and took up in his Chamber Pouch, which was thrown down at the very Instant that the Angel Gabriel carried him away, before the Water was all spilt.

There is a very pretty Story in the Turkish Tales which relates to this Passage of that famous Emperor, and bears some Affinity to the Subject we are now upon. A Slave of Isoph, who was an English vessel to which at this Circumstance in Malomet's Life, was not was "brought her in possession of a great Doctor in the Law who had the Gift of working Miracles, the Doctor told him he would quickly convince him of the Truth of this Passage in the History of Malomet if he would consent to do what he should direct of him. Upon this the Sultan was directed to place himself by an Inch of Tub of Water which he did accordingly, and as he stood by the Tub amidst a Circle of his great Men the Job Man brought him plunge his Head into the Water, and draw it up again. The King accordingly thrust his Head into the Water, and at the same time found himself at the Foot of a Mountain on a Sea shore. The King immediately began to rage against his Doctor for his Piece of Treachery and Witchcraft, but at length, knowing it was in vain to be angry, he set himself to think on proper Methods for getting a Livelihood in that strange Country. Accordingly he applied himself to some People whom he saw at work in a Neighbouring Wood these People conducted him to a Town that stood at a little Distance from the Wood where, after some Adventures, he married a Woman of great Beauty and Fortune. He lived with this Woman so long till he had by her seven Sons and seven Daughters. He was afterwards reduced to great Want, and forced to sink of pining in the Streets as a Porter for his Livelihood. One Day as he was walking alone by the Sea side, being seized with many melancholy Reflections upon his former and his present State of Life which had raised a fit of Devotion in him, he threw off his Clothes with a Design to wash himself, according to the Custom of the Malometans, before he said his Prayers.

After his first Plunge into the Sea he no sooner raised his Head above the Water but he found himself standing by the Side of the Tub, with the great Men of his Court about him, and the holy Man at his Side. He immediately upbraided his Teacher for having sent him on such a Course of Adventures, and betrayed him into so long a State of Misery and Servitude, but was wonderfully surprised when he heard that the State he talked of was only a Dream and Delusion that he had not stirred from the Place where he then stood, and that he had only dipped his Head into the Water, and immediately taken it out again.

The Malometan Doctor took this Occasion of instruction, the Sultan, that nothing was impossible with God, and that He, with whom a Thousand Years are but as one Day, can if he pleases, make a single Day, nay a single Moment, appear to any of his Creatures as a Thousand Years.

I shall leave my Reader to compare these Eastern Fables with the Notions of those two great Philosophers whom I have quoted in this Paper and shall only, by way of Application, desire him to consider how we may extend Life beyond its natural Dimensions, by applying ourselves diligently to the Pursuits of Knowledge.

The Hours of a wise Man are lengthened by his Ideas, as those of a Fool are by his Passions. The Time of the one is long, because he does not know what to do with it, so is that of the other, because he distinguishes every Moment of it with useful or amusing Thought, or in other Words, because the one is always washing it away, and the other always enjoying it.

How different is the View of past Life, in the Man who is grown old in Knowledge and Wisdom, from that of him who is grown old in Ignorance and Idleness? The latter is like the Owner of a barren Country that fills his Eye with the Prospect of naked Hills and Plains, which produce nothing either profitable or ornamental, the other beholds a beautiful and spacious Landscape divided into delightful Gardens, green Meadows, fruitful Fields, and can scarce cast his Eye on a single Spot of his Possessions, that is not covered with some beautiful Plant or Flower.

HAVING read the two following Letters with much Pleasure, I cannot but think the good Sense of them will be agreeable to the Town as any thing I could say either on the Topics they treat of, or any other. They both allude to former Papers of mine, and I do not question but the first, which is upon inward Mourning, will be thought the Production of a Man who is well acquainted with the generous Earnings of Distress in a manly Details of the origin of this story will be found in Muir, ii. 219, Nöel, p. 102 Addison took it from the Turkish Tales.

I Have frequently read your Declaration your Servants and, as I am in my self, have been very offer'd that in that variety of Farms where you considered the Bid you found no Place to rent on the Good. There is however one Observation of yours I approve, which is That there are Men of Wit and good Sense among all Orders of Men and that Servants report most of the Good or Ill which is spoken of their Masters. That there are Men of Sense who live in Servitude, I have the Vanity to say I have felt to my woful Experience. You attribute very justly the Source of our penurty to Board Wages, and the Manner of living out of a domestick Way. But I cannot give you my Homely Opinion on this Subject very so well, as by a short recount of my own life to this the Forty fifth Year of my Age. This is to say from my being first a Bond I was at fourteen to my present Stru on of a Noll-bred Porter in the Year of my Age above a Fortune.

"I know then, that my Father's was a poor I learnt
 "to the Family of Sir Stephen Racken. Sir
 "Stephen took me to School, or rather made me
 "follow a Son Harry to School, from my Ninth
 "Year, and there, the Sir Stephen paid some "thing for my Learning, I was use I like a Servant,
 "and was forced to get a hal Scraps of Learning I "could by my own Industry, for the Schoolmaster "took very little Notice of me. My young Master "was a Lad of very sprightly Parts, and my be"ing conversant about him, and loving him was "no small Advantage to me. My Master loved "me extremely and was often been whipped for "not keeping me at a Distance. He used always "to say, That when he came to his Estate I "should have a Leave of my Father's Lincement "for nothing. I came up to Town with him to "Westminster School, at which time he taught "me at Night all he learnt, and put me to find out
 "Words in the Dictionary when he was about his

Exercise It was the Will of Providence that Master Harri was taken very ill of a Fever of which he died within Ten Days after his first falling sick. Here was the first Sorrow I ever knew and I assure you, Mr SILENTATOR, I remember the beautiful Action of the sweet Youth in his I ever as fresh as if it were Yesterday. If he wanted any thing, it must be given him by Father. When I let any thing fall through the Grief I was under, he would cry, Do not beat the poor Boy. Give him some more Juice for me no Body else shall give it me. He would strive to hide his being so bad, when he saw I could not bear his being in so much Danger, and comforted me saying, I am, I am, have a good Heart. When I was holding a Cup at his Mouth, he fell into Convulsions and at this very Time I hear my dear Master's last Groan. I was quickly turned out of the Room and left to sob and beat my Head against the Wall at my Leisure. The Grief I was in was inexpressible, and every Body thought it would have cost me my Life. In a few Days my old Lady who was one of the Hon eunes of the World thought of turning me out of Doors, because I put her in mind of her Son. Sir Stephen proposed putting me to Prentice but my Lady being an excellent Man never would not let her Husband throw away his Money in Acts of Charity. I had sense enough to be under the utmost Indignation to see her discard with so little Concern, one her Son I id loved so much, and went out of the House to ramble wherever my Feet would carry me.

The third Day after I left Sir Stephen's Family, I was strolling up and down the Walks in the Temple. A young Gentleman of the House who as I heard him say of afterwards seeing me half-dressed and well-dressed thought me in Equipage ready to his Hand, after very little Inquiry more than Did I want a Master? bid me follow him. I did so, and in a very little while thought myself the happiest Creature in this World. My Time was taken up in carrying Letters to Witches or Messages to young Ladies of my Master's Acquaintance. We rambl'd from I wern to Tavern, to the Physic-house the Mulberry Garden, and all places of Resort where any Master engaged every Night in some new Amour in which and Druling he spent all his Time when he had Money. During these Extravagancies I had the Pleasure of lying on the Stairs of a Tavern half a Night, playing at Dice with other Servants and the like Idleness. When my Master was unwell, I was generally employ'd in transcribing amorous Pieces of Poetry, old Songs, and new Lampoons. Thus I staid till my Master married, and he had then the Prudence to turn me off, because I was in the Secret of his Intrigues.

'I was utterly at a loss what Course to take next, when at last I applied my self to a Fellow-sufferer, one of his Mistresses, a Woman of the Town. She happening at that time to be pretty

'full of Money, cloathed me from Head to Foot, and knowing me to be a sharp Fellow, employed me accordingly. Sometimes I was to go abroad with her, and when she had pitched upon a young Fellow she thought for her Turn, I was to be dropped as one she could not trust. She would often cheapen Goods at the New Exchange, and when she had a mind to be attended, she would send me away on an Errand. When an humble Servant and she were beginning a Parley, I came immediately, and told her Sir John is come home then she would order another Coach to prevent being dogged. The Lover makes Signs to me as I get behind the Coach, I shake my Head it was impossible I leave my Lady at the next Turning, and follow the Cully to know how to fall in his Way on another Occasion. Beside good Offices of this Nature, I writ all my Mistress's Love-Letters, some from a Lady that saw such a Gentleman at such a Place in such a coloured Coat, some shewing the Terror she was in of a jealous old Husband others explaining that the Severity of her Parents was such (tho' her Fortune was settled) that she was willing to run away with such a one, tho' she knew he was but a younger Brother. In a Word, my half Education and Love of idle Books, made me outwrite all that made Love to her by way of Epistle and as she was extremely cunning, she did well enough in Company by a shifful Affectation of the greatest Modesty. In the midst of all this I was surprised with a Letter from her and a Ten Pound Note

Honest Tom,

"You will never see me more I am married to a very cunning Country Gentleman, who might possibly guess something if I kept you still therefore farewell

'When this Place was lost also in Marriage, I was resolved to go among quite another People, for the future and got in butler to one of those Families where there is a Coach kept, three or four Servants, a clean House, and a good general Outside upon a small Estate. Here I lived very comfortably for some Time, till I unfortunately found my Master, the very gravest Man alive, in the Garret with the Chambermaid. I knew the World too well to think of staying there and the next Day pretended to have received a Letter out of the Country that my Father was dying, and got my Discharge with a Bounty for my Discretion.

'The next I lived with was a peevish single Man, whom I stayed with for a Year and a Half. Most part of the Time I passed very easily for when I began to know him, I minded no more than he meant what he said so that one Day in a good Humour he said I was the best Man he ever had, by my want of Respect to him

'These, Sir, are the chief Occurrences of my Life and I will not dwell upon very many other Places I have been in, where I have been the strangest Fellow in the World, where no Body in the World had such Servants as they, where sure they were the unluckiest People in the World in Servants and so forth. All I mean by this Representation, is, to shew you that we poor Servants are not (what you called us too generally) all Rogues but that we are what we are, according to the Example of our Superiors. In the Family I am now in, I am guilty of no one Sin but Lying which I do with a grave Face in my Gown and Staff every Day I live, and almost all Day long, in denying my Lord to impatient Suitors, and my Lady to unwelcome Visitants. But, Sir, I am to let you know that I am, when I get abroad, a Leader of the Servants. I am he that keep Time with beating my Cudgel against the Boards in the Gallery at an Opera. I am he that am touched so properly at a Tragedy, when the People of Quality are staring at one another during the most important Incidents. When you hear in a Crowd a Cry in the right Place, an Humm where the Point is touched in a Speech, or an Hussa set up where it is the Voice of the People you may conclude it is begun or joined by,

Proiecare animas—Virg

AMONG the loose Papers which I have frequently spoken of heretofore, I find a Conversation between Pharamond and Eucrate upon the Subject of Duels, and the Copy of an Edict issued in Consequence of that Discourse.

Eucrate argued, that nothing but the most severe and vindictive Punishments, such as placing the Bodies of the Offenders in Chains, and putting them to Death by the most exquisite Torments, would be sufficient to extirpate a Crime which had so long prevailed and was so firmly fixed in the Opinion of the World as great and laudable but the King answered, That indeed Instances of Ignominy were necessary in the Cure of this Evil, but considering that it prevailed only among such as had a Nicety in their Sense of Honour, and that it often happened that a Duel was fought to save Appearances to the World, when both Parties were in their Hearts in Amity and Reconciliation to each other it was evident that turning the Mode another way would effectually put a Stop to what had being only as a Mode. That to such Persons, Poverty and Shame were Torments sufficient, that he would not go further in punishing in others Crimes which he was satisfied he himself was most Guilty of, in that he might have prevented them by speaking his Displeasure sooner. Besides which the King said, he was in general averse to Tortures, which was putting Human Nature at self, rather than the Crime, to Disgrace, and that he would be sure not to use this Means where the Crime was but in all Effect arising from a Judiciable Cause, he Lear of Shame. The King, at the same time, spoke with much Grace upon the Subject of Mercy and repented of many Acts of that kind which had a magnificent aspect in the doing, but dreadful Consequences in the Example. Mercy is a Particular he observed was Cruelty in the General. That though a Prince could not revive a Dead Man by taking the Life of him who killed him neither could he make Reparation to the next that should die by the evil Example, or answer to himself for the Partiality, in not pardoning the next as well as the former Offender. As for me says Plamond, I have conquered Frue and yet have given Laws to my People. The Laws are my Methods of Life, they are not a Diminution but a Direction to my Power. I am still absolute to distinguish the Innocent and the Virtuous, to give Honours to the Pious and Generous. I am absolute in my Good-will: none can oppose my Honour, or prescribe Rules for my Behaviour. While I am, as I please, rewarded the Good, I am under no Pain that I cannot pardon the Wicked. For which Reason, continued Plamond, I will effectually put a stop to this Evil by exposing no more the leniency of my Nature to the Importunity of having the same Respect to those who are miserable in their Fault, and those who are so by their Misfortune. Flatterers concluded the King smiling repeat to us Princes, that we are Heaven's Vicegerents. Let us be so, and let the only thing out of our Power be to do Ill.

Soon after the Evening, wherein Plamond and Eucrat had this Conversation the following Edict was Published

Plamond's Edict against Duels
Pharamond, King of the Gauls, to all his loving Subjects sendeth Greeting

Whereas it has come to our Royal Notice and Observation, that in contempt of all Laws Divine and Human, it is of late become a Custom among the Nobility and Gentry of this our Kingdom, upon slight and trivial, as well as great and urgent Provocations, to invite each other into the Field, there by their own Hands, and of their own Authority, to decide their Controversies by Combat. We have thought fit to take the said Custom into our Royal Consideration, and find, upon Enquiry into the usual Causes whereon such fatal Decisions have arisen, that by this wicked Custom, mangling all the Precepts of our Holy Religion, and the Rules of right Reason, the greatest Act of the human Mind, Forgiveness of Injuries, is become vile and shameful: that the Rules of Good Society and Virtuous Conversation are hereby inverted, that the Loose, the Vain, and the Impudent, insult the Careful, the Discreet, and the Modest: that all Virtue is suppressed, and all Vice supported, in the one Act of being capable to dare to the Death. We have also further, with great Sorrow of Mind, observed that this Dreadful Action, by long Impunity, [our Royal Attention being employed upon Matters of more general Concern] is become Honourable, and the Refusal to engage in it ignominious. In these our Royal Cares and Enquiries We are yet farther made to understand, that the Persons of most Luminous Worth and most hopeful Abilities, accompanied with the strongest Passion for true Glory, are such as are most liable to be involved in the Dangers arising from this Licence. Now taking the said Premises into our various Consideration and well weighing that all such Emergencies wherein the Mind is incapable of commanding itself, and where the Injury is too sudden or too exquisite to be born) are particularly provided for by Laws heretofore enacted and that the Qualities of less Injuries, like those of Ingratitude, are too nice and delicate to come under General Rules, We do resolve to blot this Fashion, or Wantonness of Anger out of the Minds of Our Subjects, by Our Royal Resolutions declared in this Edict, as follow

No Person who either Sends or Accepts a Challenge, or the Posterity of either, tho' no Death ensues thereupon shall be after the Publication of this our Edict, capable of bearing Office in these our Dominions

The Person who shall prove the sending or receiving a Challenge, shall receive to his own Use and Property, the whole Personal Estate of both Parties and their Real Estate shall be immediately vested in the next Heir of the Offenders in as ample Manner as if the said Offenders were actually Deceased

In Cases where the Laws (which we have already granted to our Subjects) admit of an Appeal for Blood, when the Criminal is condemned by the said Appeal He shall not only suffer Death, but his whole Estate, Real, Mixed, and Personal, shall from the Hour of his Death be vested in the next Heir of the Person whose Blood he spilt

That it shall not hereafter be in our Royal Power, or that of our Successors to pardon the said Offences, or restore [the Offenders] in their Estates, Honour, or Blood for ever

Given at our Court at Blois, the 8th of February, 420 In the Second Year of our Reign

THERE is not so variable a thing in Nature as a Lady's Head dress. Within my own Memory I have known it rise and fall above thirty Degrees. About ten Years ago it shot up to a very great Height, inasmuch that the Female

Part of our Species were much taller than the Men. The Women were of such an enormous Stature, that we appeared as Grasshoppers before them.<sup>1</sup> At present the whole Sex is in a manner dwarfed and shrunk into a race of Beauties that seems almost another Species. I remember several Ladies, who were once very near seven Foot high, that at present want some inches of five. How they came to be thus curtailed I can not learn whether the whole Sex be at present under any Penance which we know nothing of, or whether they have cast their Head dresses in order to surprize us with something in that kind which shall be entirely new or whether some of the tallest of the Sex, being too cunning for the rest, have contrived this Method to make themselves appear sizeable, is still a Secret, tho' I find most are of Opinion, they are at present like Trees new lopped and pruned, that will certainly sprout up and flourish with greater Heads than before. For my own part, as I do not love to be insulted by Women who are taller than my self, I admire the Sex much more in their present Humiliation, which has reduced them to their natural Dimensions, than when they had extended their Persons and lengthened themselves out into formidable and gigantic Figures. I am not for adding to the beautiful Edifices of Nature, nor for raising any whimsical Superstructure upon her Plans. I must therefore repeat it, that I am highly pleased with the Coiffure now in Fashion, and think it shews the good Sense which at present very much reigns among the valuable Part of the Sex. One may observe that Women in all Ages have taken more Pains than Men to adorn the Outside of their Heads, and indeed I very much admire, that those Female Architects, who raise such wonderful Structures out of Ribbands, Lace, and Wire, have not been recorded for their respective Inventions. It is certain there has been many Orders in these kinds of Building, as in those which have been made of Marble. Sometimes they rise in the Shape of a Pyramid sometimes like a Tower, and sometimes like a Steeple. In Furcenal's time the Building grew by several Orders and Stories, as he has very humorously described it.

Tot premitt ordinibus, tot ad luc con pagibus altum

Edificat caput Andromachen a fronte indebit, Post minor est Altum credas — Juv

But I do not remember in any Part of my Reading, that the Head dress aspired to so great an Extravagance as in the fourteenth Century when it was built up in a couple of Cones or Spires, which stood so excessively high on each Side of the Head, that a Woman, who was but a Pigme without her Head dress, appeared like a Colossus upon putting it on. Monsieur Paradin<sup>2</sup> says, pletely and suddenly the fashion was abandoned in his time.

That these old fashioned Fontanges rose an Ell above the Head, that they were pointed like Steeples, and had long loose Pieces of Crape fastened to the Tops of them, which were curiously fringed and hung down their Backs like Streamers.

The Women might possibly have carried this Gothic Building much higher, had not a famous Monk, Thomas Conecte, by Name, attracted it with great Zeal and Resolution. This holy Man travelled from Place to Place to preach down this monstrous Commode and succeeded so well in it, that as the Magierius sacrificed their Books to the Flames upon the Preaching of an Apostle, many of the Women threw down their Head dresses in the Middle of his Sermon, and made a Bonfire of them within Sight of the Pulpit. He was so renowned as well for the Sanctity of his Life as his Manner of Preaching that he had often a Congregation of twenty thousand People the Men placing themselves on the one Side of his Pulpit, and the Women on the other, that appeared (to use the Similitude of an ingenious Writer) like a Forest of Cedars with their Heads reaching to the Clouds. He so warmed and irritated the People against this monstrous Ornament, that it lay under a kind of Persecution and whenever it appeared in publick was pelted down by the Rabble, who sling Stones at the Persons that wore it. But notwithstanding this Prodigy vanished, while the Preacher was among them, it began to appear again some Months after his Departure, or to tell it in Monsieur Paradin's own Words, 'The Women that, like Saml, in a Tright, had drawn in their Horins, shot them off again as soon as the Danger was over.' This Extravagance of the Womens Head dresses in that Age is taken notice of by Monsieur d'Argentre in the History of Bretagne, and by other Historians as well as the Person I have here quoted.

It is usually observed, that a good Reign is the only proper Time for making of Laws against the Exorbitance of Power in the same manner an excessive Head dress may be attacked the most effectually when the Fashion is against it. I do therefore recommend this Paper to my Female Readers by way of Prevention.

I would desire the Fair Sex to consider how impossible it is for them to add any thing that can be ornamental to what is already the Master piece of Nature. The Head has the most beautiful Appearance, as well as the highest Station, in a human Figure. Nature has hid out all her Art in beautifying the Face she has touched it with Vermilion, planted in it a double Row of Ivory, tator are from his Annales de Bourgoigne, published in 1566.

<sup>1</sup> Thomas Conecte, of Bretagne, was a Carmelite monk, who became famous as a preacher in 1428. After reproving the vices of the age in several parts of Europe, he came to Rome, where he reproved the vices he saw at the Pope's court, and was, therefore, burnt as a heretic in 1434.

made it the Seat of Smiles and Blushes, lighted it up and enlivened it with the Brightness of the Fees, hurr it on each Side with curious Organs of Sense, given it Air and Graces that cannot be described, and surrounded it with such a flowing Stride of Hur as sets all its Beauties in the most agreeable Light. In short she seems to have designed the Hero as the Cupola to the most glorious of her Works, and when we load it with such a Pile of supernumerary Ornaments, we destroy the Symmetry of the human Figure, and foolishly contrive to cill off the Life from great and real Beauties, to childish Gauds, Ribbands, and Hone-lace

THE Club of which I have often declared myself a Member, were last Night engaged in a Discourse upon that which passes for the chief Point of Honour among Men and Women and started a great many Hints upon the Subject, which I thought were entirely new. I shall therefore methodize the several Reflections that arose upon this Occasion, and present my Reader with them for the Speculation of this Day, after having premised, that if there is any thing in this Paper which seems to differ with any Passage of last Thursday's, the Reader will consider this as the Sentiments of the Club, and the other as my own private Thoughts, or rather those of Pharmond.

The great Point of Honour in Men is Courage, and in Women Chastity. If a Man loses his Honour in one Encounter it is not impossible for him to regain it in another. A Ship in a Woman's Honour is irreparable. I can give no Reason for fixing the Point of Honour to these two Qualities, unless it be that each Sex sets the greatest Value on the Qualification which renders them the most amiable in the Eyes of the contrary Sex. If Men chosen for themselves, without Regard to the Opinions of the fair Sex, I should believe the Choice would have fallen on Wisdom or Virtue, or had Women determined their own Point of Honour, it is probable that Wit or Good-Nature would have carried it against Chastity.

Nothing recommends a Man more to the Female Sex than Courage: whether it be that they are pleased to see one who is a Terror to others fall like a Slave at their Feet, or that this Quality supplies their own principal Defect, in guarding them from Insults and avenging their Quarrels, or that Courage is a natural Indication of a strong and sprightly Constitution. On the other side, nothing makes a Woman more esteemed by the opposite Sex than Chastity, whether it be that we always prize those most who are hardest to come at, or that nothing besides Chastity, with its collateral Attendants, Truth, Fidelity, and Constancy, gives the Man a Property in the Person he loves, and consequently endears her to him above all things.

I am very much pleased with a Passage in the Inscription on a Monument erected in Westminster Abbey to the late Duke and Duchess of Newcastle. Her Name was Margaret Lucas, 'youngest Sister to the Lord Lucas of Colchester, 'a noble Family, for all the Brothers were 'valiant, and all the Sisters virtuous.

In Books of Chivalry, where the Point of Honour is strained to Madness, the whole Story runs on Christy and Courage. The Damsel is mounted on a white Palfrey, as a Emblem of her Innocence and, to avoid Scandal, must have a Dwarf for her Page. She is not to think of a Man, till some Misfortune has brought a Knight-Errant to her Relief. The Knight falls in Love, and did not Gratitude restrain her from murdering her Deliverer, would die at her Feet by her Dishonour. However he must wait some Years in the Desert before her Virgin Heart can think of a Surrender. The Knight goes off, attacks every thing, he meets that is bigger and stronger than himself, seeks all Opportunities of being knock'd on the Head, and after seven Years Rambling returns to his Mistress, whose Chastity has been attacked in the mean time by Giants and Tyrants, and undergone as many Trials as her Lover's Valour.

In Spain, where there are still great Remains of this Romantick Humour, it is a transporting Favour for a Lady to cast an accidental Glance on her Lover from a Window, tho' it be two or three Stories high: as it is usual for the Lover to assert his Passion for his Mistress, in single Combat with a mad Bull.

The great Violation of the Point of Honour from Man to Man is giving the Lie. One may tell another he Whores, Drinks, Blushes, and it may pass unresented but to say he Lies, tho' but in Jest, is an Affront that nothing but Blood can expiate. The Reason perhaps may be because no other Vice implies a want of Courage so much as the making of a Lie and therefore telling a man he Lies is touching him in the most sensible Part of Honour, and indirectly calling him a Coward. [I cannot omit under this Head what Herodotus tells us of the ancient Persians, that from the Age of five Years to twenty they instruct their Sons only in three things, to manage the Horse, to make use of the Bow, and to speak Truth.]

The placing the Point of Honour in this false kind of Courage, has given Occasion to the very Refuse of Mankind, who have neither Virtue nor common Sense, to set up for Men of Honour. An English Peer, who has not been long dead, used to tell a pleasant Story of a French Gentleman that visited him early one Morning at Paris, and after great Professions of Respect, let him know that he laid it in his Power to oblige him which in short, amounted to this, that he believed he could tell his Lordship the Person's Name who justified him as he came out from the Opera, but before he would proceed, he begged his Lordship that he would not deny him the Honour of making him his Second. The English * Percey said he had been told that this was William Cavendish, first Duke of Devonshire, who died in 1707.

Lord, to avoid being drawn into a very foolish Affair, told him, that he was under Engagements for his two next Duels to a Couple of particular Friends Upon which the Gentleman immediately withdrew, hoping his Lordship would not take it ill if he meddled no further in an Affair from whence he himself was to receive no Advantage.

The bating down this false Notion of Honour, in so vain and lively a People as those of France, is deservedly looked upon as one of the most glorious Parts of their present King's Reign. It is pity but the Punishment of these mischievous Notions should have in it some particular Circumstances of Shame and Infamy, that those who are Slaves to them may see, that instead of advancing their Reputations they lead them to Ignominy and Dishonour.

Death is not sufficient to deter Men who make it their Glory to despise it, but if every one that sought a Duel were to stand in the Pillory, it would quickly lessen the Number of these imaginary Men of Honour, and put an end to so absurd a Practice.

When Honour is a Support to virtuous Principles, and runs parallel with the Laws of God and our Country, it cannot be too much cherished and encouraged. But when the Dictates of Honour are contrary to those of Religion and Equity, they are the greatest Deprivations of human Nature, by giving wrong Ambitions and false Ideas of what is good and laudable and should therefore be exploded by all Governments, and driven out as the Bane and Plague of Human Society.

A Man advanced in Years that thinks fit to look back upon his former Life, and calls that only Life which was passed with Satisfaction and Enjoyment, excluding all Parts which were not pleasant to him, will find himself very young, if not in his Infancy. Sickness, Ill humour, and Idleness, will have robbed him of a great Share of that Space we ordinarily call our Life. It is therefore the Duty of every Man that would be true to himself, to obtain if possible, a Disposition to be pleased, and place himself in a constant Aptitude for the Satisfaction of his Being. Instead of this, you hardly see a Man who is not uneasy in proportion to his Advancement in the Arts of Life. An affected Delicacy is the common Improvement we meet with in those who pretend to be refined above others. They do not aim at true Pleasures themselves, but turn their Thoughts upon observing the false Pleasures of other Men. Such People are Valetudinarians in Society, and they should no more come into Company than a sick Man should come into the Air. If a Man is too weak to bear what is a Refreshment to Men in Health, he must still keep his Chamber. When any one in Sir ROGER's Company complains he is out of Order, he immediately calls for some Posset drink for him for which reason that sort of People who are ever bewailing their Constitution in other Places are the Chearfullest imaginable when he is present.

It is a wonderful thing that so many, and they not reckoned absurd, shall entertain those with whom they converse by giving them the History of their Pains and Aches and imagine such Narrations their Quota of the Conversation. This is of all other the meanest Help to Discourse, and a Man must not think at all, or think himself very insignificant, when he finds an Account of his Head ache answer'd by another asking what News in the last Mail? Mutual good Humour and Drunkenness we ought to appear in whenever we meet, and we should make no mention of what concerns our selves, without it be of Matters wherein our Friends ought to rejoice. But indeed there are Crowds of People who put themselves in no Method of pleasing themselves or others such are those whom we usually call indolent Persons. Indolence is, methinks, an intermediate State between Pleasure and Pain, and very much unbecoming any Part of our Life after we are out of the Nurse's Arms. Such an Aversion to Labour creates a constant Weariness, and one would think should make Existence at self a Burthen. The indolent Man descends from the Dignity of his Nature, and makes that Being which was Rational merely Vegetative. His Life consists only in the meer Encrease and Decay of a Body, which, with relation to the rest of the World, might as well have been uninformed, as the Habitation of a reasonable Mind.

Of this kind is the Life of that extraordinary Couple Harry Tersell and his Lady Harry was in the Days of his Cebacy one of those pert Creatures who have much Vivacity and little Understanding. Mrs Rebecca Quickly, whom he married, had all that the fire of Youth and a lively Manner could do towards making an agreeable Woman. These two People of seeming Merit fell into each other's Arms and Passion being rited, and no Reason or good Sense in either to succeed it, their Life is now at a Stand. Their Merits are insipid, and their Time tedious. Their Fortune has placed them above Care, and their Loss of Taste reduced them below Diversion. When we talk of these as Instances of Inexistence, we do not mean, that in order to live it is necessary we should always be in Jovial Crews, or crowned with Chaplets of Roses, as the merry Fellows among the Ancients are described but it is intended by considering these Contraries to Pleasure, Indolence, and too much Delicacy, to shew that it is Prudence to preserve a Disposition in our selves to receive a certain Delight in all we hear and see.

This portable Quality of good Humour seasons all the Parts and Occurrences we meet with, in such a manner, that there are no Moments lost but they all pass with so much Satisfaction, that the heaviest of Loads when it is a Load that of Time, is never felt by us. Varillas has this Quality to the highest Perfection, and communicates it wherever he appears. The Sad, the Merry, the Severe, the Melancholy, shew a new Chearfulness when he comes amongst them. At the same time no one can repeat any thing that Varillas has ever said that deserves Repetition.

but the Man has that innate Goodness of Temper, that he is welcome to every Body, because every Man thinks he is so to him. He does not seem to contribute any thing to the Mirth of the Company, and yet upon Reflection you find it all happened by his being there. I thought it was whimsically said of a Gentleman, that if Caritas had Wit, it would be the best Wit in the World. It is certain, when a well corrected lively Imagination and good Breeding are added to a sweet Disposition, they qualify it to be one of the greatest Blessings, as well as Pleasures of Life.

Men would come into Company with ten times the Pleasure they do, if they were sure of hearing nothing which should shock them, as well as expected what would please them. When we know every Person that is spoken of is represented by one who has no ill Will, and every thing that is mentioned described by one that is apt to set it in the best Light, the Entertainment must be delicate, because the Cook has nothing brought to his Hand but what is the most excellent in its Kind. Beautiful Pictures are the Entertainments of pure Minds, and Deformities of the corrupted. It is a Degree towards the Life of Angels, when we enjoy Conversation wherein there is nothing present ed but in its Excellence and a Degree towards that of Demons, wherein nothing is shewn but in its Degeneracy. CENSURE, says a late ingenious Author, is the Pax a Man pays to the Publick for being Eminent. It is a Pledge for an eminent Man to think of escaping it, and a Weakness to be affected with it. All the illustrious Persons of Antiquity, and indeed of every Age in the World, have passed through this fiery Persecution. There is no Defence against Reproach, but Obscurity, it is a kind of Concomitant to Greatness, as Satyr and Invectives were an essential Part of a Roman Triumph.

If Men of Eminence are exposed to Censure on one hand, they are as much liable to Flattery on the other. If they receive Reproaches which are not due to them, they likewise receive Praises which they do not deserve. In a word, the Man in a high Post is never regarded with an indifferent Eye, but always considered as a Friend or an Enemy. For this Reason Persons in great Stations have seldom their true Characters drawn till several Years after their Deaths. Their personal Friendships and Enmities must cease, and the Parties they were engaged in be at an End, before their Faults or their Virtues can have Justice done them. When Writers have the least Opportunities of knowing the Truth they are in the best Disposition to tell it.

It is therefore the Privilege of Posterity to adjust the Characters of illustrious Persons, and to set Matters right between those Antagonists, who by their Rivalry for Greatness divided a whole Age into Factions. We can now allow Cæsar to be a great Man, without derogating from Pompey, and celebrate the Virtues of Cato, without detracting from those of Cæsar. Every one that has been long dead has a due Proportion of Praise allotted him, in which whilst he lived his Friends were too profuse and his Enemies too sparing.

According to Sir Isaac Newton's Calculations, the last Comet that made its Appearance in 1680, imbu'd so much Heat by its Approaches to the Sun, that it would have been two thousand times hotter than red hot Iron, had it been a Globe of that Metal and that supposing it as big as the Earth, and at the same Distance from the Sun, it would be fifty thousand Years in cooling before it recover'd its natural Temper. In the like manner, if an Englishman consider the great Ferment into which our Political World is thrown at present, and how intensely it is heated in all its Parts, he cannot suppose that it will cool again in less than three hundred Years. In such a Riot of Time it is possible that the Heats of the present Age may be extinguish'd, and our several Classes of great Men represented under their proper Characters. Some eminent Historians may then probably rise that will not write recentibus odiis (as Lucius expresses it) with the Passions and Prejudices of a contemporary Author, but make an impartial Distribution of Fame among the Great Men of the present Age.

I cannot forbear entertaining myself very often with the Idea of such an imaginary Historian describing the Reign of ANNE the First, and introducing it with a Preface to his Reader, that he is now entering upon the most shining Part of the English Story. The great Rivals in Fame will then be distinguish'd according to their respective Merits, and shine in their proper Points of Light. Such [an] one (says the Historian) tho' variously represented by the Writers of his own Age, appears to have been a Man of more than ordinary Abilities, great Application and uncommon Integrity. Nor was such an one (tho' of an opposite Party and Interest) inferior to him in any of these Respects. The several Antagonists who now endeavour to depreciate one another, and are celebrated or traduced by different Parties, will then have the same Body of Admirers, and appear Illustrious in the Opinion of the whole British Nation. The deserving Man, who can now recommend himself to the Esteem of but half his Countrymen, will then receive the Approbations and Applauses of a whole Age.

Among the several Persons that flourish in this Glorious Reign, there is no question but such a future Historian as the Person of whom I am speaking, will make mention of the Men of Genius

* In his Principia, published 1687, Newton says this to show that the nuclei of Comets must consist of solid matter. [a]

'Beasts, Rainbows, and the like agreeable Figures, that display themselves to View, whilst every one in the Regiment holds a Picture in her Hand

'Upon my giving the Word to discharge their Fans, they give one general Crack that may be heard at a considerable distance when the Wind sits fair. This is one of the most difficult Parts of the Exercise, but I have several Ladies with me, who at their first Entrance could not give a Pop loud enough to be heard at the further end of a Room, who can now discharge a Fan in such a manner, that it shall make a Report like a Pocket-Pistol. I have likewise taken care (in order to hinder young Women from letting off their Fans in wrong Places, or unsuitable Occasions) to shew upon what Subject the Crack of a Fan may come in properly. I have likewise invented a Fan, with which a Girl of Sixteen, by the help of a little Wind which is inclosed about one of the largest Sticks, can make as loud a Crack as a Woman of fifty with an ordinary Fan.

'When the Fans are thus discharged, the Word of Command in course is to ground the Fans. This teaches a Lady to quit her Fan gracefully when she throws it aside in order to take up a Pack of Cards, adjust a Curl of Hair, replace a falling Pin, or apply her self to any other Matter of Importance. This Part of the Exercise is only consists in tossing a Fan with an Air upon a long Table (which stands by for this Purpose) may be learned in two Days Time as well as in a Twelve-month.

'When my Female Regiment is thus disbanded, I generally let them walk about the Room for some Time, when on a sudden (like Ladies that look upon their Wretches after a long Visit) they all of them hasten to their Arms, catch them up in a Hurry, and place themselves in their proper Stations upon my calling out Receive your Fans. This Part of the Exercise is not difficult, provided a Woman apohes her Thoughts to it.

'The Fluttering of the Fan is the last, and indeed the Master piece of the whole Exercise, but if a Lady does not mis spend her Time, she may make herself Mistress of it in three Months. I generally lay aside the Dog days and the hot Time of the Summer for the teaching this Part of the Exercise, for as soon as ever I pronounce Flutter your Fans, the Place is fill'd with so many Zephyrs and gentle Breezes as are very refreshing in that Season of the Year, tho' they might be dangerous to Ladies of a tender Constitution in any other.

'There is an infinite Variety of Motions to be made use of in the Flutter of a Fan. There is the angry Flutter, the modest Flutter, the timorous Flutter, the confused Flutter, the merry Flutter, and the amorous Flutter. Not to be tedious, there is scarce any Emotion in the Mind (which does not produce a suitable Agitation in the Fan) inasmuch, that if I only see the Fan of a disciplin'd Lady, I know very well whether she laughs, frowns, or blushes. I have seen a Fan so very angry, that it would have been dangerous for the absent Lover [who<sup>1</sup>] provoked it to have come within the Wind of it and at other times so very hngushing, that I have been glad for the Lady's sake the Lover was at a sufficient Distance from it. I need not add, that a Fan is either a Prude or Coquet according to the Nature of the Person [who<sup>2</sup>] bears it. To conclude my Letter, I must acquaint you that I have from my own Observations compiled a little Treatise for the use of my Scholars, entitled The Passions of the Fan which I will communicate to you, if you think it may be of use to the Publick. I shall have a general Review on Thursday next, to which you shall be very welcome if you will honour it with your Presence.

I am, &c

P. S. 'I teach young Gentlemen the whole Art of Gallanting a Fan.
'N. B. 'I have several little plum Fans made for this Use, to avoid Expence. L

MY Friend the Divine having been used with Words of Complaisance (which he thinks could be properly applied to no one living, and I think could be only spoken of him, and that in his Absence) was so extremely offended with the excessive way of speaking Civilities among us, that he made a Discourse against it at the Club which he concluded with this Remark, that he had not heard one Compliment made in our Society since its Commencement. Every one was pleased with his Conclusion and as each knew his good Will to the rest, he was convinced that the many Professions of Kindness and Service, which we ordinarily meet with, are not natural where the Heart is well melind but are a Prostitution of Speech, seldom intended to mean Any Part of what they express, never to mean All they express. Our Reverend Friend, upon this Topick, pointed to us two or three Paragraphs on this Subject in the first Sermon of the first Volume of the late Arch Bishop's Posthumous Works<sup>3</sup>. I do not know that I ever read any thing that pleased me more, and as it is the Praise of Longinus, that he Speaks of the Sublime in a Style suitable to it, so one may say of this Author upon Sincerity, that he abhors any Pomp of Rhetorick on this Occasion, and treats it with a more than ordinary Simplicity, at once to be a Preacher and an Example. With what Command of himself does he

<sup>3</sup> This sermon 'on Sincerity,' from John 1 47, is the 1st Millotson preached. He preached it in 1694, on the 29th of July, and died, in that year, on the 24th of November, at the age of 64. John Millotson was the son of a Yorkshire clothier, and was made Archbishop of Canterbury in 1691, on the deprivation of William Sancroft for his refusal to take the oaths to William and Mary.

lay before us, in the Language and Temper of his Profession, a Fault, which by the least Liberty and Warmth of Expression would be the most lively Wit and Satyr? But his Heart was better disposed, and the good Man christened the great Wit in such a manner, that he was able to speak as follows

—Amongst too many other Instances of the great Corruption and Degeneracy of the Age wherein we live, the great and general Want of Sincerity in Conversation is none of the least. The World is grown so full of Dissimulation and Compliment, that Mens Words are hardly any Signification of their Thoughts, and if any Man measure his Words by his Heart, and speak as he thinks, and do not express more kindness to every Man, than Men usually have for any Man, he can hardly escape the Censure of want of Breeding. The old English Plainness and Sincerity, that generous Integrity of Nature, and Honesty of Disposition, which always argues true Greatness of Mind and is usually accompanied with undaunted Courage and Resolution, is in a great measure lost amongst us. There hath been a long Endeavour to transform us into Foreign Manners and Fashions, and to bring us to a servile Imitation of none of the best of our Neighbours in some of the worst of their Qualities. The Direct of Conversation is now a days so swelled with Vanity and Compliment, and so surfeited (as I may say) of Expressions of Kindness and Respect, that if a Man that lived in Age or two ago should return into the World again he would really want a Dictionary to help him to understand his own Language and to know the true intrinsic Value of the Phrase in Fashion, and would hardly at first believe it what a low Rate the highest Strains and Expressions of Kindness imaginable do commonly pass in current Payment and when he should come to understand it, it would be a great while before he could bring himself with a good Countenance and a good Conscience to converse with Men upon equal Terms, and in their own way.

And in truth it is hard to say, whether it should more provoke our Contempt or our Pity, to hear what solemn Expressions of Respect and Kindness will pass between Men, almost upon no Occasion how great Honour and Esteem they will declare for one whom perhaps they never saw before, and how entirely they are all on the sudden devoted to his Service and Interest, for no Reason how infinitely and eternally obliged to him, for no Benefit and how extremely they will be concerned for him, yet and afflicted too, for no Cause. I know it is said, in Justification of this hollow kind of Conversation, that there is no Harm, no real Deceit in Compliment, but the Matter is well enough, so long as we understand one another et Verba volant et Nummi, Words are like Money, and when the current Value of them is generally understood, no Man is cheated by them. This is something, if such Words were any thing but being brought into the Account, they are meer Cyphers. However, it is still a just Matter of Complaint, that Sincerity and Plainness are out of Fashion, and that our Language is running into a Lie, that Men have almost quite perverted the use of Speech, and made Words to signify nothing, that the greatest part of the Conversation of Mankind is little else but driving a Trade of Dissimulation inasmuch that it would make a Man heartily sick and weary of the World, to see the little Sincerity that is in Use and Practice among Men.

When the Vice is placed in this contemptible Light, he argues unanswerably against it, in Words and Thoughts so natural, that any Man who reads them would imagine he himself could have been the Author of them.

If the Show of any thing be good for any thing, I am sure Sincerity is better for why does any Man dissemble, or seem to be that which he is not, but because he thinks it good to have such a Quality as he pretends to? I or to counterfeits and dissemble, is to put on the Appearance of some real Excellency. Now the best way in the World to seem to be any thing, is really to be what he would seem to be. Besides, that it is many times as troublesome to make good the Pretence of a good Quality, as to have it and if a Man have it not, it is ten to one but he is discovered to want it and then all his Pains and Labour to seem to have it, is lost.

In another Part of the same Discourse he goes on to shew, that all Artifice must naturally tend to the Disappointment of him that pretends it.

Whosoever Convenience may be thought to be in Falshood and Dissimulation, it is soon over but the Inconvenience of it is perpetual, because it brings a Man under an everlasting Jealousy and Suspicion, so that he is not believed when he speaks Truth, nor trusted when perhaps he means honestly. When a Man hath once forfeited the Reputation of his Integrity, he is set first, and nothing will then serve his Turn, neither Truth nor Falshood. R.

IT would be a noble Improvement, or rather a Recovery of what we call good Breeding, if nothing were to pass amongst us for agreeable which was the least Transgression against that Rule of Life called Decorum, or a Regard to Decency. This would command the Respect of Mankind, because it carries in it Deference to their good Opinion as Humility lodged in a worthy Mind is always attended with a certain Homage, which no haughty Soul, with all the Arts imaginable, will ever be able to purchase. Truly say, Virtue and Decency are so nearly related, that it is difficult to separate them from each other but in our Imagination. As the Beauty of the Body always accompanies the Health of it, so certainly is Decency concomitant to Virtue As Beauty of Body, with an agreeable Carriage, pleases the Eye, and that Pleasure consists in that we observe all the Parts with a certain Elegance are proportioned to each other, so does Decency of Behaviour which appears in our Lives obtain the Approbation of all with whom we converse, from the Order Consistency, and Moderation of our Words and Actions. This flows from the Reverence we bear towards every good Man, and to the World in general, for to be negligent of what any one thinks of you, does not only shew you arrogant but abandoned. In all these Considerations we are to distinguish how one Virtue differs from another, As it is the Part of Justice never to do Violence, it is of Modesty never to commit Offence. In this last Particular lies the whole Force of what is called Decency to this purpose that excellent Moralist above-mentioned talks of Decency but this Quality is more easily comprehended by an ordinary Capacity, than expressed with all his Eloquence. This Decency of Behaviour is generally transgressed among all Orders of Men and the very Women, tho' themselves created as it were for Ornament, are often very much mistaken in this ornamental Part of Life. It would me thinks be a short Rule for Behaviour, if every young Lady in her Dress, Words, and Actions were only to recommend her self as a Sister, Daughter, or Wife, and make herself the more esteemed in one of those Characters. The Care of themselves with regard to the I am lies in which Women are born is the best Motive for their being courted to come into the Alliance of other Houses. No hug can promote this End more than a strict Preservation of Decency. I should be glad if a certain Equestrian Order of Ladies, some of whom one meets in an Evening at every Outlet of the Town, would take this Subject into their serious Consideration. In order thereto the following Letter may not be wholly unworthy their Perusal.

MY SPECTATOR,

'Going lately to take the Air in one of the most beautiful Evenings this Season has produced, as I was admiring the Serenity of the Sky, the lively Colours of the Fields and the Variety of the Landscape every Way round me, my Eyes were suddenly called off from these inanimate Objects by a little party of Horsemen I saw passing the Road. The greater Part of them escaped my particular Observation, by reason that my whole Attention was fixed on a very fair Youth who rode in the midst of them, and seemed to have been dressed by some Description in a Romance. His Features, Complexion, and Habit had a remarkable Effeminacy, and a certain languishing Vanity appeared in his Air. His Hair, well curl'd and powder'd, hung to a considerable Length on his Shoulders, and was wantonly ty'd as if by the Hands of his Mistress, in a Scarlet Ribbon, which play'd like a Streamer behind him. He had a Coat and Wastecoa of blue Camlet trimm'd and embroidered with Silver a Cravat of the finest Lace, and wore, in a smart Cock, a little Beaver Hat edged with Silver and made more sprightly by a Leather. His Horse too, which was a Pacer, was adorned after the same airy Manner, and seemed to share in the Vanity of the Rider. As I was pitying the Luxury of this young Person, who appeared to me to have been educated only in an Object of Sight, I perceived on my nearer Approach, and as I turned my Eyes downward, a Part of the Equipage I had not observed before, which was a Petticoat of the same with the Coat and Wastecoa. After this Discovery, I looked again on the Face of the fair Amazon who had thus deceived me, and thought those Features which had before offended me by their Softness, were now strengthened into as improper a Boldness and thence her Eyes, Nose and Mouth seemed to be formed with perfect Symmetry, I am not certain whether she, who in Appearance was a very handsome Youth, may not be in Reality a very indifferent Woman.

'Then is an Objection which naturally presents itself against these occasional Perplexities and Mixtures of Dress, which is that they seem to break in upon that Propriety and Distinction of Appearance in which the Beauty of different Character is preserved and if they should be more frequent than they are at present, would look like turning our publick Assemblies into a general Masquerade. The Model of this Amazonian Hunting-Habit for Ladies, was, as I take it, first imported from France, and well enough expresses the Gravity of a People who are taught to do any thing so it be with an Assurance but I cannot help thinking it sits awkwardly yet on our English Modesty. The Petticoat is a kind of Incumbrance upon it, and if the Amazons should think fit to go on in this Plunder of our Sex's Ornaments, they ought to add to their Spoils, and complete their Triumph over us, by wearing the Breecies.

'If it be natural to contract insensibly the Manners of those we imitate, the Ladies who are pleased with assuming our Dresses will do us more Honour than we deserve, but they will do it at their own Expence. Why should the lovely Camilla deceive us in more Shapes than her own, and affect to be represented in her Picture with a Gun and a Sprawl, while her elder Brother, the Heir of a worthy Family, is drawn in Silks like his Sister? The Dress and Air of a Man are not well to be divided, and those who would not be content with the latter, ought never to think of assuming the former. There is so large a portion of natural Agreeableness among the Fair Sex of our Island, that they seem betrayed into these romantic Habits without having the same Occasion for them with their Inventors. All that needs to be desired of them is, that they would be themselves, that is, what Nature designed them, and to see their Mistake when they depart from this, let them look upon a Man who affects the Softness and Effeminacy of a Woman, to learn how their Sex must appear to us, when approaching to the Resemblance of a Man.

I am, SIR,
Your most humble Servant

MY Friend WILL HONEYCOMB values himself very much upon what he calls the Knowledge of Mankind, which has cost him many Disasters in his Youth, for WILL reckons every Misfortune that he has met with among the Women, and every Rencontre among the Men, as Parts of his Education, and fancies he should never have been the Man he is, had not he broke Windows, knocked down Constables, disturbed honest People with his Midnight Scuraden, and beat up a lewd Worn in's Quarters, when he was a young Fellow. The engingling in Adventures of this Nature WILL calls the studying of Mankind, and terms this Knowledge of the Town, the Knowledge of the World. WILL ingeniously confesses, that for half his Life he has herd riched every Morning with reading of Men over-night, and at present consorts himself under certain Puns which he endures from time to time, that without them he could not have been acquainted with the Gallintries of the Age. His WILL looks upon as the Learning of a Gentleman, and regards all other kinds of Science as the Accomplishments of one whom he calls a Scholar, a Bookish Man, or a Philosopher.

For these Reasons WILL shines in mixt Company, where he has the Discretion not to go out of his Depth, and has often a certain way of making his real Ignorance appear a seeming one. Our Club however has frequently caught him tripping, at which times they never spare him. For as WILL often insults with the Knowledge of the Town, we sometimes take our Revenge upon him by our knowledge of<sup>1</sup> Books.

He was last Week producing two or three Lectures which he writ in his Youth to a Coquet Lady. The Rallery of them was natural, and well enough for a mere Man of the Town but, very unluckily, several of the Words were wrong spelt. WILL blushed this off at first as well as he could, but finding himself pushed on all sides, and especially by the Tumpler, he told us, with a little Passion, that he never liked Pedantry in Spelling, and that he spelt like a Gentleman, and not like a Scholar. Upon this WILL had recourse to his old Topick of shewing the narrow-Spiritedness, the Pride, and Ignorance of Pedants which he carried so far that upon my returning to my Lodgings, I could not forbear throwing together such Reflections as occurred to me upon that Subject.

A Man [who]<sup>2</sup> has been brought up among Books, and is able to talk of nothing else, is a very indifferent Companion, and what we call a Pedant. But, methinks, we should enlarge the Title, and give it every one that does not know how to think out of his Profession and particular way of Life.

What is a greater Pedant than a mere Man of the Town? But him the Play houses, a Catalogue of the reigning Beauties, and an Account of a few fashionable Distempers that have befallen him, and you strike him dumb. How many a pretty Gentleman's Knowledge lies all within the Verge of the Court? He will tell you the Names of the principal Favourites repeat the shrewd Stringings of a Man of Quality, whisper an Intreague that is not yet blown upon by common Fame or, if the Sphere of his Observations is a little larger than ordinary, will perhaps enter into all the Incidents, Turns, and Revolutions in a Game of Ombre. When he has gone thus far he has shown you the whole Circle of his Accomplishments, his Parts are drained, and he is disabled from any further Conversation. What are these but rank Pedants? and yet these are the Men [who]<sup>3</sup> value themselves most on their Exemption from the Pedantry of Colleges.

I might here mention the Military Pedant who always talks in a Camp, and is storming Towns, making Judgments and fighting Battles from one end of the Year to the other. Every thing he speaks smells of Gunpowder, if you take away his Artillery from him, he has not a Word to say for himself. I might likewise mention the Law Pedant, that is perpetually putting Cases, repeating the Transactions of Westminster Hall, wrangling with you upon the most trifling Circumstances of Life, and not to be convinced of the Distance of a Pace, or of the most trivial Point in Conversation, but by dint of Argument. The State Pedant is swart up in News, and lost in Politics. If you mention either of the Kings of Spain or Poland he talks very notably, but if you go out of the Gazette, you drop him. In short, a mere Courtier, a mere Soldier, a mere Scholar, a mere any thing, is an insipid Pedantick Character, and equally ridiculous.

Of all the Species of Pedants, which I have [mentioned]<sup>4</sup>, the Book-Pedant is much the most supportable: he has at least an exercised Understanding, and a Head which is full though confined, so that a Man who converses with him may often receive from him hints of things that are worth knowing, and what he may possibly turn to his own Advantage, tho' they are of little Use to the Owner. The worst kind of Pedants among Learned Men, are such as are naturally endued with a very small Share of common Sense, and have read a great number of Books without Taste or Distinction.

The Truth of it is, Learning, like Travelling, and all other Methods of Improvement is it finishes good Sense, so it makes a silly Man ten thousand times more unprofitable, by supplying variety of Matter to his Impertinence, and giving him an Opportunity of rebounding in Absurdities.

Shallow Pedants cry up one another much more than Men of solid and useful Learning. To read the Titles they give an Editor, or Collator of a Manuscript, you would take him for the Glory of the Commonwealth of Letters, and the Wonder of his Age, when perhaps upon Examination you find that he has only Rectify'd a Great Part of the Fault, or laid out a whole Sentence in proper Commence.

They are oblig'd indeed to be thus flush of their Praises, that they may keep one another in Countenance, and it is no wonder if a great deal of Knowledge, which is not capable of making a Man wise, has a natural Tendency to make him Vain and Arrogant.

*Hinc tibi Copia
Manat ut ad plerumque, et magis
Ruris honorum opulentia cornu* Hor

HAVING often received an Invitation from my Friend Sir Roger to my Country, I last Week accompanied him thither, and am settled with him for some time at his Country house, where I intend to form several of my ensuing Speculations. Sir ROGER who is very well acquainted with my Humour, lets me rise and go to bed when I please, dines at his own Table or in my Chamber as I think fit, sits still and says nothing without it lading me be merry. When the Gentlemen of the Country come to see him, he only shews me at a Distance. As I have been walking in his fields I have observed them stealing a Sight of me over an Hedge, and have heard the Knight desiring them not to let me see them, for that I hated to be stared at.

I am the more at Ease in Sir Roger's Family, because it consists of sober and studious Persons, for as the Knight is the best Master in the World, he seldom changes his Servants, and as he is beloved by all about him, his Servants never care for leaving him by this means his Domesticks are all very steady, and grown old with their Master. You would take his Valet de Chambre for his brother, his Butler is very headstuck, his Groom is one of the gravest Men that I have ever seen, and his Coachman has the Looks of a Privy Counsellor. You see the Goodness of the Master even in the old House-dog, and in a grey Pind that is kept in the Stable with great Care and Tenderness out of Regard in his past Services, tho' he has been useless for several Years.

I could not but observe with a great deal of Pleasure the Joy that appeared in the Countenances of these ancient Domesticks upon my Friend's Arrival at his Country-seat. Some of them could not refrain from Tears at the Sight of their old Master every one of them press'd forward to do something for him and seemed discouraged if they were not employed. At the same time the good old Knight, with a Mixture of the Father and the Master of the Family, tempered the Enquiries after his own Affairs with several kind Questions relating to themselves. His Humour and good Nature engages every Body to him, so that when he is pleasant upon any of them, all his Family are in good Humour, and none so much as the Person whom he diverts himself with. On the contrary, if he coughs, or betrays any Infirmary of old Age, it is easy for a Stander-by to observe a secret Concern in the Looks of all his Servants.

My worthy Friend has put me under the particular Care of his Butler, who is a very prudent Man, and as well as the rest of his Fellow-Servants, wonderfully desirous of pleasing me, because they have often heard their Master talk of me as of his particular Friend.

My chief Companion, when Sir Roger is diverting himself in the Woods or the Fields, is a very venerable Man who ever with Sir Roger, and has lived at his House in the Nature of a Chaplain above thirty Years. This Gentleman is a Person of good Sense and some Learning, of a very regular Life and obliging Conversation. He heartily loves Sir Roger, and knows that he is very much in the old Knight's Favour, so that he lies in the Family rather as a Relation than a Dependant.

I have observed in several of my Papers, that my Friend Sir Roger, amidst all his good Qualities, is something of an Humourist and that his Virtues, as well as Imperfections, are as it were tinged by a certain Extravagance, which makes them particularly his, and distinguishes them from those of other Men. His Cast of Mind, as it is generally very innocent in itself, so it renders his Conversation highly agreeable, and more

The name of Roger of Coverley applied to a contra danse (i.e. a dance in which partners stand in opposite rows) Angliensis Country-Dance, as is ascribed in the house of Calverley in Yorkshire, by an ingenious member thereof, Ralph Thoresby, who has left a MS. account of the family written in 1727. Mr Thoresby has it that Sir Roger of Calverley in the time of Richard I had a harper who was the composer of this tune. His evidence being apparently, that persons of the name of Harper had lands in the neighbourhood of Calverley. Mr W. Chappell, who reports this statement in his 'Popular Music of the Olden Time,' says that in a MS. of the beginning of the 15th century, this tune is called 'Old Roger of Coverley for exmore. A Lancashire Hornpipe.' In the Dancing Master of 1696, it is called 'Roger of Coverley.' Mr Chappell quotes also, in illustration of the familiar knowledge of this tune and its name in Addison's time, from 'the History of Robert Powell, the Puppet Show man (1725),' that 'upon the Prelude being ended, each party fell to braying and calling for particular tunes. The hobnailed fellows, whose breeches and hings seem'd to be of the same leather, cried out for 'Cheshire Rounds, Roger of Coverley,' &c.

delightful than the same Degree of Sense and Virtue would appear in their common and ordinary Colours. As I was walking with him last Night, he asked me how I liked the good Man whom I have just now mentioned? and without staying for my Answer told me, That he was afraid of being insulted with Latin and Greek. At his own Table for which Reason he desired a particular Friend of his at the University to find him out a Clergyman rather of plain Sense than such Learning, of a good Aspect, a clear Voice, a sociable Temper, and, if possible, a Man that understood a little of Israel-Grammon. My Friend, says Sir Roger, found me out this Gentleman, who, besides the Endowments [requisite] of him, as, they tell me, a good Scholar, tho' he does not shew it. I have given him the Parsonage of the Parish, and because I know his Value have settled upon him a good Annuity for life. If he outlives me, he shall find that he was higher in my Esteem than perhaps he thinks he is. He has now been with me thirty Years and tho' he does not know I have taken Notice of it, has never in all that time asked anything of me for himself, tho' he is every Day soliciting me for something in behalf of one or other of my Tenants his Parishioners. There has not been a Law suit in the Parish since he has liv'd among them. If any Dispute arises they apply themselves to him for the Decision, if they do not acquiesce in his Judgment, which I think never happened above once or twice at most, they appeal to me. At his first settling with me, I made him a Present of all the good Sermons [which] I have been printed in English, and only begg'd of him that every Sunday he would pronounce one of them in the Pulpit. Accordingly, he has digested them into such a Series, that they follow one another naturally, and make a continued System of practical Divinity.

As Sir Roger was going on in his Story, the Gentleman we were talking of, came up to us, and upon the Knight's ask him who preached to-morrow (for it was Saturday Night) told us, the Bishop of St Asaph in the Morning, and Dr South in the Afternoon. He then shew'd us his List of Preachers for the whole Year, where I saw with a great deal of Pleasure, Archbishop Tillotson, Bishop Saunders, Doctor Barrow, Doctor Calamy,<sup>2</sup> with several living Authors who have published Discourses of Practical Divinity. I no sooner saw this venerable Man in the Pulpit, but I very much approv'd of my Friends insisting upon the Qualifications of a good Aspect and a clear Voice, for I was so charmed with the Gracefulness of his Figure and Delivery, as well as with the Discourses he pronounced, that I think I never pass'd any Time more to my Satisfaction. A Sermon repeated after this Manner, is like the Composition of a Poet in the Mouth of a graceful Actor.

I could heartily wish that more of our Country Clergy would follow this Example, and instead of wasting their Spirits in laborious Compositions of their own, would endeavour after a handsome Location, and all those other Talents that are proper to enforce what has been penn'd by greater Masters. This would not only be more easy to themselves, but more edifying to the People. L.

THE Reception, number of Attendance, undisturbed Freedom and Quiet which I meet with here in the Country, has confirm'd me in the Opinion I always had, that the general Corruption of Manners in Servants is owing to the Conduct of Masters. The Aspect of every one in the Family carries so much Satisfaction, that it appears he knows the happy Lot which has befallen him in being a Member of it. There is one Particular which I have seldom seen but at Sir Roger's, it is us'd in all other Places, but Servants fly from the Parts of the House through which their Master is passing on the contrary, here they industriously place themselves in his way and it is on both Sides, as it were, understood as a Visit when the Servant appears without calling. This proceeds from the humane and equal Temper of the Man of the House, who also perfectly well knows how to enjoy a great Estate, with such Oeconomy as ever to be much better off. This makes his own Mind untroubled, and consequently unapt to vent peevish Expressions, or give passionate or inconsistent Orders to those about him. Thus Respect and Love go together and a certain Chearfulness in Performance of their Calamy oppos'd the execution of Charles I and sided in bringing about the Restoration. He became chaplain to Charles II, but the Act of Uniformity again made him a seceder. His name, added to the other three, gives breadth to the suggestion of Sir Roger's orthodoxy.

Sir ROGER,

'I Desire you to accept of a Jack, which is the best I have caught this Season. I intend to come and stay with you a Week, and see how the Perch bite in the Black Armer. I observed with some Concern, the last time I saw you upon the Bowling Green, that your Whip wanted a Lash to it. I will bring half a dozen with me that I twisted last Week, which I hope will serve you all the Time you are in the Country. I have not been out of the Saddle for six Days last past, having been at Lator with Sir John's eldest Son. He takes to his Learning hugely. I am,

SIR, Your Humble Servant, Will Wimble.

This extraordinary Letter, and Messire that accompanied it, made me very curious to know the Character and Quality of the Gentleman who sent them, which I found to be as follows. Will Wimble is younger Brother to a Baronet, and descended of the ancient Family of the Wimbles. He is now between Forty and Fifty, but being bred to no Business and born to no Estate, he generally lives with his elder Brother as Superintendant of his Game. He hunts a Pack of Dogs better than any Man in the County, and is very famous for finding out a Hare. He is extremely well versed in all the little Handicrafts of an idle Man. He makes a May Fly to a Miracle, and furnishes the whole Country with Angle Rods. As he is a good natured officious Fellow, and very much esteemed upon account of his Family, he is a welcome Guest at every House, and keeps up a good Correspondence among all the Gentlemen about him. He carries a Filpoot in his Pocket from one to another, or exchanges a Puppy between a Couple of Friends that live perhaps in the opposite Sides of the County. Will is particularly yourite of all the young Heirs, whom he frequently obliges with a Net that he has woven, or a Setting dog that he has made himself. He now and then presents a Pair of Garters of his own knitting to their Mothers or Sisters, and raises a great deal of Mirth among them, by enquiring as often as he meets them how they war? These Gentlemen like Manufactures and obliging little Humours, make Will the Darling of the Country.

Sir ROGER was proceeding in the Character of him, when we saw him make up to us with two or three Hazle Twigs in his Hand that he had cut in Sir ROGER's Woods, as he came through them, in his Way to the House. I was very much pleased to observe on one Side the hearty and sincere Welcome with which Sir ROGER received him, and on the other, the secret Joy which his Guest discovered at Sight of the good old Knight. After the first Salutes were over Will desired Sir ROGER to lend him one of his Servants to carry a Set of Shuttlecocks he had with him in a little Box to a Lady that lived about a Mile off, to whom it seems he had promised such a Present for above this half Year. Sir ROGER's Back was no sooner turned but honest Will began to tell me of a large Cock Pheasant that he had sprung in one of the neighbouring Woods, with two or three other Adventures of the same Nature. Odd and uncommon Characters are the Game that I look for, and most delight in, for which Reason I was as much pleased with the Novelty of the Person that tallied to me, as he could be for his Life with the springing of a Pheasant, and therefore listened to him with more than ordinary Attention.

In the midst of his Discourse the Bell rung to Dinner, where the Gentleman I have been speaking of had the Pleasure of seeing the huge Jack, he had caught served up for the Dish in a most sumptuous Manner. Upon our sitting down to it he gave us a long Account how he had hooked it, played with it, soiled it, and at length drew it out upon the Bank, with several other Particulars that lasted all the first Course. A Dish of Wild fowl that came afterwards furnished Conversation for the rest of the Dinner, which concluded with a late Invention of Will's for improving the Oriel Pipe.

Upon withdrawing into my Room after Dinner, I was secretly touched with Compassion towards the honest Gentleman that had dined with us, and could not but consider with a great deal of Concern, how so good an Heart and such busy Hands were wholly employed in Trifles that so much Humanity should be so little beneficial to others, and so much Industry so little advantageous to himself. The same Temper of Mind and Application to Affairs might have recommended him to the publick Interest, and have raised his Fortune in another Station of Life. What Good to his Country or himself might not a Trader or Merchant have done with such useful tho' ordinary Qualifications?

Will Wimble is the Case of many a younger Brother of a great Family, who had rather see their Children starve like Gentlemen, than thrive in a Trade or Profession that is beneath their Quality. This Humour kills several Parts of I hope with Pride and Idleness. It is the Impiety of a Trading Nation, like ours, that the younger Sons, tho' uncapable of any liberal Art or Profession, may be placed in such a Way of Life, as may perhaps enable them to vie with the best of their Family. Accordingly we find several Citizens that were launched into the World with narrow Fortunes, rising by an honest Industry to

'were to save his Country He is said to be the first that made Love by squeezing the Hand He left the Estate with ten thousand Pounds Debt upon it, but however by all Hands I have been informed that he was every way the finest Gentleman in the World That Debt lay heavy on our House for one Generation, but it was retrieved by a Gift from that honest Man you see there, a Citizen of our Name, but nothing at all a kin to us I know Sir ANDREW FREEPORT has said behind my Back, that this Man was descended from one of the ten Children of the Mud of Honour I shewed you above, but it was never made out We winked at the thing indeed, because Money was wanting at that time

Here I saw my Friend a little embarrassed, and turned my Face to the next Portraiture

Sir ROGER went on with his Account of the Gallery in the following Manner 'This Man (pointing to him I looked at) I take to be the Honour of our House Sir HUMPHREY DE COVERLEY, he was in his Dealings as punctual as a Tradesman, and as generous as a Gentleman He would have thought himself as much undone by breaking his Word, as if it were to be followed by Bankruptcy He served his Country as Knight of this Shire to his dying Day He found it no easy matter to maintain Integrity in his Words and Actions, even in things that regarded the Offices which were incumbent upon him, in the Care of his own Affairs and Relations of Life, and therefore dreaded (tho' he had great Talents) to go into Employments of State, where he must be exposed to the Snares of Ambition Innocence of Life and great Ability were the distinguishing Parts of his Character the latter, he had often observed, had led to the Destruction of the former, and used frequently to lament that Great and Good had not the same Signification He was an excellent Husbandman, but had resolved not to exceed such a Degree of Wealth, all above it he bestowed in secret Bounties many Years after the Sun he aimed at for his own Use was attained Yet he did not slacken his Industry, but to a decent old Age spent the Life and Fortune which was superfluous to himself, in the Service of his Friends and Neighbours

Here we were called to Dinner, and Sir ROGER ended the Discourse of this Gentleman, by telling me, as we followed the Servant, that this his Ancestor was a brave Man, and narrowly escaped being killed in the Civil Wars 'For,' said he, 'he was sent out of the Field upon a private Message the Day before the Battle of Worcester' The Whim of narrowly escaping by having been within a Day of Danger, with other Matters above-mentioned, mixed with good Sense, left me at a Loss whether I was more delighted with my Friend's Wisdom or Simplicity R

AT a little distance from Sir ROGER's House, among the Ruins of an old Abby, there is a long Walk of aged Elms which are shot up so very high, that when one passes under them, the Rooks and Crows that rest upon the Tops of them seem to be cawing in another Region I am very much delighted with this sort of Noise, which I consider as a kind of natural Prayer to that Being who supplies the Wants of his whole Creation, and [who], in the beautiful Language of the Psalmist, feedeth the young Ravens that call upon him I like this Retirement the better, because of an ill Report it lies under of being haunted, for which Reason (as I have been told in the Family) no living Creature ever walks in it besides the Chaplain My good Friend the Butler desired me with a very grave Face not to venture my self in it after Sun set, for that one of the Footmen had been almost frighted out of his Wits by a Spirit that appear'd to him in the Shape of a black Horse without an Head, to which he added, that about a Month ago one of the Muds coming home late that way with a Pail of Milk upon her Head, heard such a Rustling among the Bushes that she let it fall

I was taking a Walk in this Place last Night between the Hours of Nine and Ten, and could not but fancy it one of the most proper Scenes in the World for a Ghost to appear in The Ruins of the Abby are scattered up and down on every Side, and half covered with Ivy and Elder-Bushes, the Harbours of several solitary Birds which seldom make their Appearance till the Dusk of the Evening The Place was formerly a Church-yard, and has still several Marks in it of Graves and Burying Places There is such an Echo among the old Ruins and Vaults, that if you stamp but a little louder than ordinary, you hear the Sound repeated At the same time the Walk of Elms, with the Crowing of the Ravens which from time to time are heard from the Tops of them, looks exceeding solemn and venerable These Objects naturally raise Seriousness and Attention, and when Night heightens the Awfulness of the Place, and pours out her supernumerary Horrors upon every thing in it, I do not at all wonder that weak Minds fill it with Spectres and Apparitions

Mr Locke, in his Chapter of the Association of Ideas, has very curious Remarks to show how by the Prejudice of Education one Idea often introduces into the Mind a whole Set that bear no Resemblance to one another in the Nature of things Among several Examples of this Kind, he produces the following Instance The Ideas of Goblins and Spirits have really no more to do with Darkness than Light Yet let but a foolish Maid inculcate these often on the Mind of a Child, and raise them there together,

Creature I considered those several Proofs, drawn,

First, From the Nature of the Soul it self, and particularly its Immateriality which, tho' not absolutely necessary to the Eternity of its Duration, has, I think, been evinced to almost a Demonstration.

Secondly, From its Passions and Sentiments, as particularly from its Love of Existence, its Horror of Annihilation, and its Hopes of Immortality, with that secret Satisfaction which it finds in the Practice of Virtue, and that Uneasiness which follows in it upon the Commission of Vice.

Thirdly, From the Nature of the Supreme Being, whose Justice, Goodness, Wisdom and Veracity are all concerned in this great Point.

But among these and other excellent Arguments for the Immortality of the Soul there is one drawn from the perpetual Progress of the Soul to its Perfection, without a Possibility of ever arriving at it which is a Hint that I do not remember to have seen opened and improved by others who have written on this Subject, tho' it seems to me to carry a great Weight with it. How can I enter into the Thoughts of Man, that the Soul, which is capable of such immense Perfections, and of receiving new Improvements to all Eternity, shall fall away into nothing thro' it as soon as it is created? Are such Abilities made for no Purpose? A Brute arrives at a Point of Perfection that he can never pass. In a few Years he has all the Endowments he is capable of and were he to live ten thousand more, would be the same thing he is at present. Were a human Soul thus at a stand in her Accomplishments, were her Faculties to be full blown, and incapable of further Enlargements, I could imagine it might fall away insensibly, and drop at once into a State of Annihilation. But can we believe a thinking Being that is in a perpetual Progress of Improvements, and travelling on from Perfection to Perfection, after having just looked abroad into the Works of its Creator, and made a few Discoveries of his infinite Goodness, Wisdom and Power, must perish at her first setting out, and in the very beginning of her Enquiries?

A Man, considered in his present State, seems only sent into the World to propagate his Kind! He provides<sup>1</sup> himself with a Successor, and immediately quits his Post to make room for him.

Harres

Harredem alterius, velut unda superant undam

He does not seem born to enjoy Life, but to deliver it down to others. This is not surprising to consider in Animals, which are formed for our Use, and can finish their Business in a short Life. The Silk-worm, after having spun her Task, lays her Eggs and dies. But a Man can never have taken in his full measure of Knowledge, has not time to subdue his Passions, establish his Soul in Virtue, and come up to the Perfection of his Nature, before he is hurried off the Stage. Would an infinitely wise Being make such glorious Creatures for so mean a Purpose? Can he delight in the Production of such abortive Intelligences, such short-lived reasonable Beings? Would he give us Talents that are not to be exerted? Capacities that are never to be gratified? How can we find that Wisdom which shines through all his Works, in the Formation of Man, & tho' it looking on this World is only a Nursery for the next, and believing that the several Generations of rational Creatures, which rise up and disappear in such quick Successions, are only to receive their first Quickenings of Existence here, and afterwards to be transplanted into a more friendly Climate, where they may spread and flourish to all Eternity.

There is not, in my Opinion, a more pleasing and triumphant Consideration in Religion than this of the perpetual Progress which the Soul makes towards the Perfection of its Nature, without ever arriving at a Period in it. To look upon the Soul as going on from Strength to Strength, to consider that she is to shine for ever with new Accessions of Glory, and brighten to all Eternity that she will be still adding Virtue to Virtue, and Knowledge to Knowledge, carries in it something wonderfully agreeable to that Ambition which is natural to the Mind of Man. Nay, it must be a Prospect pleasing to God himself, to see his Creation for ever beautifying in his Eyes, and drawing nearer to him, by greater Degrees of Resemblance.

Methinks this single Consideration, of the Progress of a finite Spirit to Perfection will be sufficient to extinguish all my inferior Natures, and all Contempt in superior. Thy Cherubim which now appears as a God to a human Soul, I now see will that the Period will come about in Eternity, when the human Soul shall be as perfect as he himself now is. Nay, when she shall look down upon that Degree of Perfection, as much as she now falls short of it. It is true the higher Nature still advances, and by that means preserves his Distance and Superiority in the Scale of Being; but he knows how high soever the Station is of which he stands possessed at present, the inferior Nature will at length mount up to it, and shine forth in the same Degree of Glory.

With what Admiration and Veneration may we look into our own Souls, where there are such hidden Stores of Virtue and Knowledge, such inexhausted Sources of Perfection? We know not yet what we shall be, nor will it ever enter into the Heart of Man to conceive the Glory that will be always in Reserve for him. The Soul considered with its Creator, is like one of those Mathematical Lines that may draw nearer to another for all Eternity without a Possibility of touching it. And can there be a Thought so transporting, as to consider ourselves in these perpetual Approaches to him, who is not only the Standard of Perfection but of Happiness?

 Τίμᾱ— Pyth

I AM always very well pleas'd with a Country Sunday, and think, if keeping holy the Seventh Day [were] only a human Institution, it would be the best Method that could have been thought of for the polishing and civilizing of Mankind. It is certain the Country People would soon degenerate into a kind of Savages and Barbarians, were there not such frequent Returns of a stated Time, in which the whole Village meet together with their best Lares and in their cleanliest [Habits,] to converse with one another upon indifferent Subjects, hear their Duties explain'd to them, and join together in Adoration of the Supreme Being. Sunday clears away the Rust of the whole Week, not only as it refreshes in their Minds the Notions of Religion, but as it puts both the Sexes upon appearing in their most agreeable Forms, and exerting all such Qualities as are apt to give them a Figure in the Eye of the Village. A Country-Fellow distinguishes himself as much in the Church-yard, as a Citizen does upon the Change, the whole Parish-Politicks being generally discuss'd in that Place either after Sermon or before the Bell rings.

My Friend Sir ROGER, being a good Churchman, has bewitch'd the Inside of his Church with several Texts of his own choosing. He has likewise given a handsome Pulpit Cloth, and ruled in the Communion-Table at his own Expence. He has often told me, that at his coming to his Parson he found [his Parishioners] very irregular, and that in order to make them kneel and join in the Responses, he gave every one of them a Hassock and a Common prayer Book and at the same time employ'd an itinerant Singing-Master, who goes about the Country for that Purpose to instruct them rightly in the Tunes of the Psalms, upon which they now very much value themselves, and indeed out-do most of the Country Churches that I have ever heard of.

As Sir ROGER is Lord of the whole Congregation, he keeps them in very good Order, and will suffer no Body to sleep in it besides himself for if by chance he has been surpris'd into a short Nap at Sermon, upon recovering out of it he stands up and looks about him, and if he sees any Body else nodding, either wakes them himself, or sends his Servant to them. Several other of the old Knight's Particularities break out upon these Occasions. Sometimes he will be lengthning out a Verse in the Singing-Psalms, half a Minute after the rest of the Congregation have done with it sometimes, when he is pleas'd with the Matter of his Devotion, he pronounces Amen three or four times in the same Prayer, and sometimes stands up when every Body else is upon their Knees, to count the Congregation, or see if any of his Tenants are missing.

I was Yesterday very much surpris'd to hear my old Friend, in the Midst of the Service, calling out to one John Mattheus to mind what he was about, and not disturb the Congregation. This John Mattheus it seems is remarkable for being an idle Fellow, and at that Time was licking his Heels for his Diversion. This Authority of the Knight, though exerted in that odd Manner which accompanies him in all Circumstances of Life, has a very good Effect upon the Parish, who are not polite enough to see any thing ridiculous in his Behaviour, besides that the general good Sense and Worthiness of his Character makes his Friends observe these little Singularities as Foils that rather set off than blemish his good Qualities.

As soon as the Sermon is finish'd, no Body presumes to stir till Sir ROGER is gone out of the Church. The Knight walks down from his Seat in the Chancel between a double Row of his Tenants, that stand bowing to him on each Side, and every now and then enquires how such an one's Wife, or Mother, or Son, or Father do, whom he does not see at Church which is understood as a secret Reprimand to the Person that is absent.

The Chaplain has often told me, that upon a Catechising Day, when Sir ROGER has been pleas'd with a Boy that answers well, he has order'd a Bible to be given him next Day for his Encouragement and sometimes recompens'd it with a Litch of Bacon to his Mother. Sir ROGER has likewise added five Pounds a Year to the Clerk's Place, and that he may encourage the young Fellows to make themselves perfect in the Church Service, has promis'd upon the Death of the present Incumbent, who is very old, to bestow it according to Merit.

The fair Understanding between Sir ROGER and his Chaplain, and their mutual Concurrence in doing Good, is the more remarkable, because the very next Village is famous for the Differences and Contentions that rise between the Parson and the Squire, who live in a perpetual State of War. The Parson is always prebending at the Squire, and the Squire to be revenged on the Parson never comes to Church. The Squire has made all his Tenants Atheists and Litch-Stealers while the Parson instructs them every Sunday in the Dignity of his Order, and insinuates to them in almost every Sermon, that he is a better Man than his Patron. In short, Matters are come to such an Extremity, that the Squire has not said his Prayers either in publick or private this half Year, and that the Parson threatens him, if he does not mend his Manners, to pray for him in the Free of the whole Congregation.

Faads of this Nature, though too frequent in the Country, are very fatal to the ordinary People who are so used to be dazzled with Riches, that they pry as much Deference to the Understanding of a Man of an Estate, as of a Man of Learning, and are very hardly brought to regard any Truth, how important soever it may be, that is preach'd to them, when they know there are several Men of five hundred a Year who do not believe it.

—Harrent infelix pector nullus—Virg

IN my first Description of the Company in which I pass most of my Time, it may be remembered that I mentioned a great Affliction which my Friend Sir ROGER had met with in his Youth, which was no less than a Disappointment in Love. It happened this Evening, that we fell into a very pleasing Walk at a Distance from his House. As soon as we came into it, 'Tis, quoth the good Old Man, looking round him with a Smile, very hard, that any Part of my Land should be settled upon one who has used me so ill as the perverse Widow did and yet I am sure I could not see a Sprig of my Bough of this whole Walk of Trees, but I should reflect upon her and her Seventy. She has certainly the finest Hand of any Woman in the World. You are to know this was the Place wherein I used to muse upon her and by that Custom I can never come into it, but the same tender Sentiments revive in my Mind, as if I had actually walked with that beautiful Creature under these Shades. I have been Fool enough to carve her Name on the Bark of several of these Trees so unhappy is the Condition of Men in Love, to attempt the removing of their Passion by the Methods which serve only to imprint it deeper. She has certainly the finest Hand of any Woman in the World.

Here followed a profound Silence and I was not displeased to observe my Friend falling so naturally into a Discourse, which I had ever before taken Notice he industriously avoided. After a very long Pause he entered upon an Account of this great Circumstance in his Life, with an Air which I thought raised my Idea of him above what I had ever had before and gave me the Picture of that cheerful Mind of his, before it received that Stroke which has ever since affected his Words and Actions. But he went on as follows.

'I came to my Estate in my Twenty Second Year, and resolved to follow the Steps of the most Worthy of my Ancestors who have inhabited this Spot of Earth before me, in all the Methods of Hospitality and good Neighbourhood, for the sake of my Fame and in Country Sports and Recreations, for the sake of my Health. In my Twenty Third Year I was

'obliged to serve as Sheriff of the County, and in my Servants, Officers and whole Equipage, indulged the Pleasure of a young Man (who did not think ill of his own Person) in taking that publick Occasion of shewing my Figure and Behaviour to Advantage. You may easily imagine to yourself what Appearance I made, who am pretty tall, [rid<sup>d</sup>] well, and was very well dressed, at the Head of a whole County, with Musick before me, a Feather in my Hat, and my Horse well Bitted. I can assure you I was not a little pleased with the kind Looks and Glances I had from all the Balconies and Windows as I rode to the Hall where the Assizes were held. But when I came there, a beautiful Creature in a Widow's Habit sat in Court to hear the Event of a Cause concerning her Dower. This commanding Creature (who was born for De traction of all who behold her) put on such a Resignation in her Countenance, and bore the Whispers of all round the Court with such a pretty Unconsciousness, I warrant you and then recovered her self from one Eye to another, till she was perfectly confused by meeting something so wistful in all she encountered, that at last, with a Murmur to her, she cast her bewitching Eyes upon me. I no sooner met it, but I bowed like a great surprised Booby, and knowing her Cause to be the first which came on, I cried, like a Captivated Calves I was, Make way for the Defendant's Witnesses. This sudden Partiality made all the County immediately see the Sheriff also was become a Slave to the fine Widow. During the Time her Cause was upon Tryal, she behaved herself I warrant you, with such a deep Attention in her Business, took Opportunities to have little Billets handed to her Council, then would be in such a pretty Confusion, occasioned, you must know, by acting before so much Company, that not only I but the whole Court was prejudiced in her Favour, and all that the next Year to her Husband had to urge, was thought so groundless and frivolous, that when it came to her Council to reply, there was not half so much said as every one besides in the Court thought he could have urged to her Advantage. You must understand, Sir, this perverse Woman is one of those unaccountable Creatures, that secretly rejoice in the Admiration of Men, but indulge themselves in no further Consequences. Hence it is that she has ever had a Train of Admirers, and she removes from her Slaves in Town to those in the Country, according to the Seasons of the Year. She is a reading Lady, and far gone in the Pleasures of Friendship. She is always accompanied by a Confidant, who is Witness to her daily Protestations against our Sex, and consequently a War to her first Steps towards Love, upon the Strength of her own Maxims and Declarations.

However, I must needs say this accomplished Mistress of mine has distinguished me above the rest, and has been known to declare Sir ROGER to be COVETOUSLY was the truest and most Humane of all the Brutes in the Country. I was told she said so, by one who thought he rallied me but upon the Strength of this slender Encouragement,

'of being thought least detestable, I made new Liveries new paired my Coach Horses, sent them all to Town to be bitted, and taught to throw their Legs well, and move all together, before I pretended to cross the Country and wait upon her. As soon as I thought my Retinue suitable to the Character of my Fortune and Youth, I set out from hence to make my Addresses. The particular Skill of this Lady has ever been to inflame your Wishes and yet command Respect. To make her Mistress of this Art, she has a greater Share of Knowledge, Wit, and good Sense, than is usual even among Men of Merit. Then she is beautiful beyond the Race of Women. If you won't let her go on with a certain Artifice with her Eyes, and the Skill of Beauty, she will arm her self with her real Charms, and strike you with Admiration instead of Desire. It is certain that if you were to behold the whole Woman, there is that Dignity in her Aspect, that Composure in her Motion that Complacency in her Manner, that if her Form makes you hope, her Merit makes you fear. But then again, she is such a desperate Scholar, that no Country Gentleman can approach her without being a Jest. As I was going to tell you, when I came to her House I was admitted to her Presence with great Civility at the same time she placed her self to be first seen by me in such an Attitude, as I think you call the Posture of a Picture, that she discovered new Charms, and I at last came towards her with such an Awe as made me Speechless. This she no sooner observed but she made her Advantage of it, and began a Discourse to me concerning Love and Honour, as they both are followed by Pretenders, and the real Owners of them. When she [had] discussed these Points in a Discourse, which I verily believe is as learned as the best Philosopher in Luney could possibly make, she asked me whether she was so happy as to fall in with my Sentiments on these important Particulars. Her Confident sat by her, and upon my being in the last Confusion and Silence, this malicious Aid of hers, turning to her, says, I am very glad to observe Sir Robert praises upon this Subject, and seems resolved to deliver all his Sentiments upon the Matter when he pleases to speak. They both kept their Countenances, and after I had sat half an Hour me listening how to behave before such profound Critics, I rose up and took my Leave. Chances has since that time thrown me very often in her Way, and she is often has directed a Discourse, to me which I do not understand. This Barbarity has kept me ever at a Distance from the most beautiful Object my Eyes ever beheld. It is thus also she deals with all Mankind, and you must make Love to her, as you would conquer the Sphinx, by posing her but were she like other Women, and that there were any talking to her how constraint must the Pleasure of that Man be, who could converse with a Creature— But, after all, you may be sure her Heart is fixed on some one or other and yet I have been credibly informed but who can believe half that is said! After she had done speaking to me, she put her Hand to her Bosom, and adjusted her Lucker. Then she cast her Eyes a little down, upon my beholding her too earnestly. They say she sings excellently her Voice in her ordinary Speech has something in it inexpressibly sweet. You must know I dined with her at a publick Table the Day after I first saw her, and she helped me to some Tansy in the Lye of all the Gentlemen in the Country. She has certainly the finest Hand of any Woman in the World. I can assure you, Sir, were you to behold her, you would be in the same Condition, for as her Speech is Musick, her Form is Angelick. But I find I grow irregular while I am talking of her but indeed it would be Stupidity to be unconcerned at such Perfection. Oh the excellent Creature, she is as inimitable to all Women, as she is inaccessible to all Men.

I found my Friend began to rave, and insensibly led him towards the House, that we might be joined by some other Company, and am convinced that the Widow is the secret Cause of all that Inconsistency which appears in some Parts of my Friend's Discourse tho' he has so much Command of himself as not directly to mention her, yet according to that of Martial, which one knows not how to render in English, Dum tacet laus loquitur. I shall end this Paper with that whole Epigram,<sup>2</sup> which represents with much Humour my honest Friend's Condition.

*Quicquid agit Rufus nihil est nisi Nævia Rufo,
Si gaudet, si flet, si tacet, hanc loquitur
Canat, propinat, poscit, negat, amittit, una est
Nævia, Si non sit Nævia mutus erit Scriberet hesterna Patri cum Lucæ Saltem, Nævia lux, inquit, Nævia lumen, ave*

Let Rufus weep, rejoice, stand, sit, or walk,
Still he can nothing but of Nævia talk.
I let him eat, drink, ask Questions, or dispute,
Still he must speak of Nævia, or be mute.
He writ to his Father, ending with this Line,
I am, my Lovely Nævia, ever thine. R

—Paupe'rtatis pudor et fuga— Hor

O ECONOMY in our Affairs has the same Effect upon our Fortunes which Good Breeding has upon our Conversations. There is a pretending Behaviour in both Cases, which, instead of making Men esteemed, renders them both miserable and contemptible. We had Yesterday at Sir ROGER's a Set of Country Gentlemen who dined with him and after Dinner the Glass was taken, by those who pleased, pretty plentifully. Among others I observed a Person of a tolerable good Aspect, who seemed to be more greedy of Liquor than any of the Company, and yet, methought, he did not taste it with Delight. As he grew warm, he was suspicious of every thing that was said and as he advanced towards being fuddled, his Humour grew worse. At the same time his Bitterness seem'd to be rather an inward Dissatisfaction in his own Mind, than any Dislike he had taken at the Company. Upon hearing his Name, I knew him to be a Gentleman of a considerable Fortune in this County, but greatly in Debt. What gives the unhappy Man this Peevishness of Spirit is, that his Estate is dipped, and is eating out with Usury; and yet he has not the Heart to sell any Part of it. His proud Stomach, at the Cost of restless Nights, constant Inquietudes, Danger of Affronts, and a thousand nameless Inconveniences, preserves this Canker in his Fortune, rather than it shall be said he is a Man of fewer Hundreds a Year than he has been commonly reputed. Thus he endures the Torment of Poverty, to avoid the Name of being less rich. If you go to his House you see great Plenty but served in a Manner that shews it is all unnatural, and that the Master's Mind is not at home. There is a certain Waste and Carelessness in the Air of every thing, and the whole appears but a covered Indigence, a magnificent Poverty. That Neatness and Cheerfulness, which attends the Table of him who lives within Compass, is wanting, and exchanged for a Libertine Way of Service in all about him.

This Gentleman's Conduct, tho' a very common way of Management, is as ridiculous as that Officers would be, who had but few Men under his Command, and should take the Charge of an Extent of Country rather than of a small Pass. To pay for, personate, and keep in a Man's Hands, a greater Estate than he really has, is of all others the most unpardonable Vanity, and must in the End reduce the Man who is guilty of it to Dis-honour. Yet if we look round us in any County of Great Britain, we shall see many in this fatal Error, if that may be called by so soft a Name, which proceeds from a false Shame of appearing what they really are, when the contrary Behaviour would in a short Time advance them to the Condition which they pretend to.

Laertes has fifteen hundred Pounds a Year, which is mortgaged for six thousand Pounds; but it is impossible to convince him that if he sold as much as would pay off that Debt, he would save four Shillings in the Pound,* which he gives for the Vanity of being the reputed Master of it. [Yet<sup>2</sup>] if Laertes did this, he would, perhaps be easier in his own Fortune, but then Irus, a Fellow of Yesterday, who has but twelve hundred a Year, would be his Equal. Rather than this shall be, Laertes goes on to bring well born Beggars into the World, and every Twelvemonth charges his Estate with at least one Year's Rent more by the Birth of a Child.

Laertes and Irus are Neighbours, whose Way of living are an Abomination to each other. Irus is moved by the Fear of Poverty, and Laertes by the Shame of it. Though the Motive of Action is of so near Affinity in both, and may be resolved into this, 'That to each of them Poverty is the greatest of all Evils,' yet are their Manners very widely different. Shame of Poverty makes Laertes launch into unnecessary Equipage, unnecessary Expense, and lavish Entertainments. Fear of Poverty makes Irus allow himself only plain Necessaries, appear without a Servant, sell his own Corn, attend his Labourers, and be himself a Labourer. Shame of Poverty makes Laertes go every Day a step nearer to it, and Fear of Poverty stirs up Irus to make every Day some further Progress from it.

These different Motives produce the Excesses which Men are guilty of in the Negligence of and Provision for themselves. Usury, Stock-jobbing, Extortion and Oppression, have their Seed in the Dread of Want and Vanity, Riot and Prodigality, from the Shame of it. But both these Excesses are infinitely below the Pursuit of a reasonable Creature. After we have taken Care to command so much as is necessary for maintaining our selves in the Order of Men suitable to our Character, the Care of Superfluities is a Vice no less extravagant, than the Neglect of Necessaries would have been before.

Certain it is that they are both out of Nature when she is followed with Reason and good Sense. It is from this Reflection that I always read Mr Cowley with the greatest Pleasure. His Magnanimity is as much above that of other considerable Men as his Understanding, and it is a true distinguishing Spirit in the elegant Author who published his Works,<sup>1</sup> to dwell so much upon the Temper of his Mind and the Moderation of his Desires. By this means he has rendered his Friend as amiable as himself. That State of Life which bears the Name of Poverty, with Mr Cowley's great Vulgar, is admirably described, and it is no small Satisfaction to those of the same kind of Desire, that he produces the Authority of the wisest Men of the best Age of the World, to strengthen his Opinion of the ordinary Pursuits of Mankind.

It would methinks be no ill Maxim of Life, if according to that Ancestor of Sir ROGER whom I lately mentioned, every Man would point to himself what Sum he would resolve not to exceed. He might by this means cheat himself into a Frinquility on this Side of that Expectation, or convert what he should get above it to nobler Uses than his own Pleasures or Necessities. This Temper of Mind would exempt a Man from an ignorant Envy of restless Men above him and a more inexcusable Contempt of happy Men below him. This would be sailing by some Compass, living with some Design, but to be eternally bewildered in Prospects of future Gain, and putting on unnecessary Armour against improbable Blows of Fortune, is a Mechanick Being which has not good Sense for its Direction, but is carried on by a sort of required Instinct towards things below our Consideration and unworthy our Esteem. It is possible that the Frinquility I now enjoy at Sir BODILY Labour is of two Kinds either that which a Man submits to for his Livelihood, or that which he undergoes for his Pleasure. The latter of them generally changes the Name of Labour for that of Exercise, but differs only from ordinary Labour as it rises from another Motive.

A Country Life abounds in both these kinds of Labour, and for that Reason gives a Man a greater Stock of Health, and consequently a more perfect Enjoyment of himself than any other Way of Life. I consider the Body as a System of Tubes and Glands, or to use a more Rustick Phrase, a Bundle of Pipes and Strainers, fitted to one another after so wonderful a Manner as to make a proper Engine for the Soul to work with. This Description does not only comprize all the Bowels, Bones, Tendons, Veins, Nerves and Arteries, but every Muscle and every Ligature, which is a Composition of Fibres that are so many imperceptible Tubes or Pipes, interwoven on all sides with invisible Glands or Strainers.

This general Idea of a Human Body, without considering it in its Niceties of Anatomy, lets us see how absolutely necessary Labour is for the right Preservation of it. There must be frequent Motions and Agitations to mix, digest, and separate the Juices contained in it as well as to clear and cleanse that Infinite of Pipes and Strainers of which it is composed, and to give their solid Parts a more firm and lasting Tone. Labour or Exercise ferments the Humours, casts them into their proper Channels, throws off Redundancies, and helps Nature in those secret Distributions, without which the Body cannot subsist in its Vigour, nor the Soul act with Cheerfulness.

I might here mention the Effects which this has upon all the Faculties of the Mind, by keeping the Understanding clear, the Imagination untroubled, and refining those Spirits that are necessary for the proper Execution of our intellectual Faculties, during the present Laws of Union between Soul and Body. It is to a Neglect in this Particular that we must ascribe the Spleen, which is so frequent in Men of studious and sedentary Tempers, as well as the Vapours to which those of the other Sex are so often subject.

Had not Exercise been absolutely necessary for our Well-being, Nature would not have made the Body so proper for it, by giving such an Activity to the Limbs, and such a Pliancy to every Part as necessarily produce those Compressions, Extensions, Contortions, Dilatations, and all other kinds of [Motions] that are necessary for the Preservation of such a System of Tubes and Glands as has been before mentioned. And that we might not want Inducements to engage us in such an Exercise of the Body as is proper for its Welfare, it is so ordered that nothing valuable can be procured without it. Not to mention Riches and Honour, even Food and Rument are not to be come at without the Toil of the Hands and Sweat of the Brows. Providence furnishes Materials, but expects that we should work them up our selves. The Earth must be laboured before it gives us Increase, and when it is forced into its several Products how many Hands must they pass through before they are fit for Use? Manufactures, Trade, and Agriculture, naturally employ more than nineteen Parts of the Species in twenty, and as for those who are not obliged to Labour, by the Condition in which they are born, they are more miserable than the rest of Mankind, unless they indulge themselves in that voluntary Labour which goes by the Name of Exercise.

My friend Sir ROGER has been an indefatigable Man in business of this kind, and has hung several Parts of his House with the Trophies of his former Labours. The Walls of his great Hall are covered with the Horns of several kinds of Deer that he has killed in the Chase which he thinks the most valuable Furniture of his House, as they afford him frequent Topics of Discourse, and shew that he has not been Idle. At the lower End of the Hall, is a large Otter's Skin stuffed with Hay, which his Mother ordered to be hung up in that manner, and the Knight looks upon with great Satisfaction, because it seems he was but nine Years old when his Dog killed him. A little Room adjoining to the Hall is a kind of Arsenal filled with Guns of several Sizes and Inventions, with which the Knight has made great Havock in the Woods, and destroyed many thousands of Pheasants, Partridges and Wood-cocks. His Stable Doors are patched with Noses that belonged to Loves of the Knight's own hunting down. Sir ROGER shewed me one of them that for Distinction sake has a Brass Nail struck through it, which cost him about fifteen Hours riding, carried him through half a dozen Counties, killed him a Brace of Geldings, and lost above half his Dogs. Thus the Knight looks upon as one of the greatest Exploits of his Life. The perverse Widow, whom I have given some Account of, was the Death of several Boxes for Sir ROGER has told me that in the Course of his Amours he patched the Western Door of his Stable. Whenever the Widow was cruel, the Boxes were sure to pay for it. In proportion as his Passion for the Widow abated and old Age came on, he left off Fox hunting, but a Hare is not yet safe that Sits within ten Miles of his House

There is no kind of Exercise which I would so recommend to my Readers of both Sexes as this of Riding, as there is none which so much conduces to Health, and is every way accommodated to the Body, according to the Idea which I have given of it. Doctor Sydenham is very lavish in its Praises and if the English Reader will see the Mechanical Effects of it described at length, he may find them in a Book published not many Years since, under the Title of Medicina Gymnastica<sup>1</sup> For my own part, when I am in Town, for want of these Opportunities, I exercise myself an Hour every Morning upon a dumb Bell that is placed in a Corner of my Room, and pleases me the more because it does every thing I require of it in the most profound Silence. My Landlady and her Daughters are so well acquainted with my Hours of Exercise, that they never come into my Room to disturb me whilst I am ringing.

When I was some Years younger than I am at present, I used to employ myself in a more laborious Diversion, which I learned from a Latin Treatise of Exercises that is written with great Erudition<sup>2</sup> It is there called the σκιωμαχία, or the fighting with a Man's own Shadow, and consists in the brandishing of two short Sticks grasped in each Hand, and laden with Plugs of Lead at either End. This opens the Chest, exercises the Limbs, and gives a Man all the Pleasure of Boxing, without the Blows. I could wish that several Learned Men would lay out that Time which they employ in Controversies and Disputes about nothing, in this Method of fighting with their own Shadows. It might conduce very much to evaporate the Splice, which makes them uneasy to the Publick as well as to themselves.

To conclude, As I am a Compound of Soul and Body, I consider myself as obliged to a double Scheme of Duties and I think I have not fulfilled the Business of the Day when I do not thus employ the one in Labour and Exercise, as well as the other in Study and Contemplation. L

THOSE who have searched into human Nature observe that nothing so much shews the Nobleness of the Soul, as that its Felicity consists in Action. Every Man has such an active Principle in him, that he will find out something to employ himself upon in whatever Place or State of Life he is posted. I have heard of a Gentleman who was under close Confinement in the Bastile seven Years, during which Time he amused himself in scattering a few small Pins about his Chamber, gathering them up again, and placing them in different Figures on the Arm of a great Chair. He often told his Friends afterwards, that unless he had found out this Piece of Exercise, he verily believed he should have lost his Senses.

After what has been said, I need not inform my Readers, that Sir ROGER, with whose Character I hope they are at present pretty well acquainted, has in his Youth gone through the whole Course of those rural Diversions which the Country abounds in, and which seem to be extremely well suited to that laborious Industry a Man may observe here in a far greater Degree than in Towns and Cities. I have before hinted at some of my Friend's Exploits. He has in his youthful Days taken forty Coveys of Partridges in a Season, and tired many a Salmon with a Line consisting but of a single Hair. The constant Thanks and good Wishes of the Neighbourhood always attended him, on account of his remarkable Enmity towards Foxes, having destroyed more of those Vermin in one Year, than it was thought the whole Country could have produced. Indeed the Knight does not scruple to own among his most intimate Friends that in order to establish his Reputation this Way, he has secretly sent for great Numbers of them out of other Counties, which he used to turn loose about the Country by Night, that he might the better signalize himself in their Destruction the next Day. His Hunting Horns were the finest and best marked in all these Parts. His servants are still full of the Praises of a grey Stone horse that unhappily straked himself several Years since, and was buried with great Solemnity in the Orchard.

Sir Roger, being at present too old for Fox-hunting, to keep himself in Action, has disposed of his Bagles and got a Pick of Top Hounds. What these want in Speed, he endeavours to make amends for by the Deepness of their Mouths and the Variety of their Notes, which are suited in such manner to each other, that the whole Cry makes up a compleat Consort.<sup>3</sup> He is so true in this Particular that a Gentleman having made him a Present of a very fine Hound the other Day, the Knight returned it by the Servant with a great many Expressions of Civility, but desired him to tell his Master, that the Dog he had sent was indeed a most excellent Base, but that at present he only wanted a Counter-Teror. Could I believe my Friend had ever read Shakspear, I should certainly conclude he had taken the Hint from Theseus in the Midas inner Night's Dream.

<sup>1</sup> As to dogs, the difference is great between a hunt now and a hunt in the Spectator's time. Since the early years of the last century the modern foxhound has come into existence, while the beagle and the deep-slewed southern harlequin, nearly resembling the bloodhound, with its sonorous note, has become almost extinct. Absolutely extinct also is the old care to imitate the voices of a pack. Henry II., in his breeding of hounds, is said to have been careful not only that they should be fleet, but also 'well tongued' and consonous, 'the same care in Elizabeth's time is, in the passage quoted by the Spectator, attributed by Shakespeare to Duke Theseus, and the paper itself shows that care was taken to match the voices of a pack in the reign also of Queen Anne. This has now been for some time absolutely disregarded. In many important re-

Sir Roger is so keen in this Sport, that he has been out almost every Day & not I come down, and upon the Chaplain's offering to lend me his easy Pad, I was prevailed on Yesterday Morning to make one of the Company. I was extremely pleased, as we rid along, to observe the general benevolence of all the Neighbourhood towards my Friend. The Farmers Sons thought themselves happy if they could open a Gate for the good old Knight as he passed by, which he generally requited with a Nod or a Smile, and a kind Enquiry after their Fathers and Uncles.

After we had rid about a Mile from Home, we came upon a large Heath and the Sportsmen began to hunt. They had done so for some time, when, as I was at a little Distance from the rest of the Company, I saw a Hare pop out from a small Firze-brake almost under my Horse's Feet. I smelt the War she took, which I endeavoured to make the Company sensible of by extending my Arm but to no purpose, till Sir Roger, who knows that none of my extraordinary Motions are insignificant, rode up to me, and asked me if I was as gone that Way? Upon my answering Yes, he immediately called in the Dogs, and put them upon the Scent. As they were going off, I heard one of the Country Fellows muttering to his Companion, That 'twas a Worder they had not lost all their Sport for want of the silent Gentleman's cry u e SOLE AWAY.

Thus, with my Aversion to leaving Hedges, made me withdraw to a rising Ground, from whence I could have the Picture of the whole Chase, without the Fatigue of keeping in with the Hounds. The Hare immediately threw them above a Mile behind her, but I was pleased to find that instead of running straight forwards, or in Hunter's Language, Flung the Country, as I was afraid she might have done, she wheel'd about, and described a sort of Circle round the Hill where I had taken my Station, in such manner as gave me a very distinct View of the Sport.

spects the pattern harrier of the present day differs even from the harriers used at the beginning of the present century

* Act IV. sc. 1.

I could see her first pass by, and the Dogs some time afterwards unrolling the whole Pack she had made, and following her thro' all her Doubles. It was at the same time delighted in observing that Deference which the rest of the Pack paid to each particular Hound, according to the Character he had acquired amongst them. If they were at Fault, and an old Hound of Reputation opened but once, he was immediately followed by the whole Cry while a raw Dog or one who was a noted Liar, might have yelped his Heart out, without being taken Notice of.

The Hare now, after having squatted two or three times, and been put up again as often, came still nearer to the Place where she was at first started. The Dogs pursued her, and these were followed by the jolly Knight, who rode upon a white Gelding, encompassed by his Servants and Servants, and churring his Hounds with all the Quety of Five and Twenty. One of the Sportsmen rode up to me, and told me, that he was sure the Chase was almost at an End, because the old Dogs, which had hitherto run behind, now headed the Pack. The Fellow was in the right. Our Hare took a large Field just under us, followed by the full Cry in View. I must confess the Brightness of the Weather, the Cheerfulness of every thing around me, the Chiding of the Hounds, which was returned upon us in a double Echo, from two neighbouring Hills, with the Hallowing of the Sportsmen, and the Sounding of the Horn, hid my Spirits into a most lively Pleasure, which I freely indulged because I was sure it was innocent. If I was under any Concern, it was on the Account of the poor Hare, that was now quite spent, and almost within the Reach of her Enemies, when the Huntsman getting forward threw down his Pole before the Dogs. They were now within eight Yards of that Game which they had been pursuing for almost six many Hours yet on the Signal before-mentioned they all made a sudden Strand, and tho' they continued opening as much as before, durst not once attempt to pass beyond the Pole. At the same time Sir ROGER rode forward, and alighting, took up the Hare in his Arms which he soon delivered up to one of his Servants with an Order, if she could be kept alive, to let her go in his great Orchard where it seems he has several of these Prisoners of War, who live together in a very comfortable Captivity. I was highly pleased to see the Discipline of the Pack, and the Good nature of the Knight, who could not find in his heart to murder a Creature that had given him so much Diversion.

As we were returning home, I remembered that Monsieur Pacha in his most excellent Discourse on the Misery of Man, tells us, that all our Endless woe is after Greatness proceed from nothing but a Desire of being surrounded by a Multitude of Persons and Affairs that is a hinder us from looking u to eir sel-es, which is a View we cannot bear. He afterwards goes on to shew that our Love of Sports comes from the same Reason, and is particularly severe upon HUNTING. What, says he, unless it be a drow'n T'oigt, can make Men throw away so much Time and Pains upon a silly Animal, which they might buy cheaper in the Market? The foregoing Reflection is certainly just, when a Man suffers his whole Mind to be drawn into his Sports, and altogether loses himself in the Woods, but does not affect those who propose a far more laudable End from this Exercise, I mean, The Preservation of Health, and keeping all the Organs of the Soul in a Condition to execute her Orders. Had that incomparable Person, whom I last quoted, been a little more indulgent to himself in this Point, the World might probably have enjoyed him much longer, whereas thro' too great an Application to his Studies in his Youth, he contracted that ill Habit of Body, which, after a tedious Sickness, carried him off in the fortieth Year of his Age,* and the whole History we have of his Life till that Time, is but one continued Account of the behaviour of a noble Soul struggling under innumerable Pains and Distempers.

For my own part I intend to Hunt twice a Week during my Stay with Sir ROGER and shall prescribe the moderate use of this Exercise to all my Country Friends, as the best kind of Physick for mending a bad Constitution, and preserving a good one.

I cannot do this better than in the following Lines out of Mr Dryden<sup>2</sup>

*The first Physicians by Debauch were made, Excess began, and Sloth sustains the Trade
By Chase our long-lived Fathers earned their Food,
Till strung the Nerves, and purg'd the Blood,
But we their Sons, a jamper'd Race of Men,
Are d-unvinded down to threescore Years and ten Better to hunt in Fields for Health unbought,
Than see the Doctor for a nauseous Diaught
The Wise for Cure on Exercise depend
God never made his Work for Man to mend

THERE are some Opinions in which a Man should stand Nether, without engaging his Assent to one side or the other. Such a hovering Faith as this, which refuses to settle upon any Determination, is absolutely necessary to a Mind that is careful to avoid Errors and Prepossessions. When the Arguments press equally on both sides in Matters that are indifferent to us, the safest Method is to give up our selves to neither.

It is with this Temper of Mind that I consider the Subject of Witchcraft. When I hear the Relations that are made from all Parts of the World, not only from Norway and Lapland, from the East and West Indies, but from every particular Nation in Europe, I cannot forbear (tuning that there is such an Intercourse and Commerce with Evil Spirits, as that which we express by the Name of Witchcraft. But when I consider that the ignorant and credulous Parts of the World abound most in these Relations, and that the Persons among us, who are supposed to engage in such an Infernal Commerce, are People of a weak Understanding and a crazed Imagination, and at the same time reflect upon the many Impostures and Delusions of this Nature that have been detected in all Ages, I endeavour to suspend my Belief till I hear more certain Accounts than any which have yet come to my Knowledge. In short, when I consider the Question, whether there are such Persons in the World as those we call Witches? my Mind is divided between the two opposite Opinions or rather (to speak my Thoughts freely) I believe in general that there is, and has been such a thing as Witchcraft but at the same time can give no Credit to any particular Instance of it.

I am engaged in this Speculation, by some Occurrences that I met with Yesterday, which I shall give my Reader an Account of at large. As I was walking with my Friend Sir ROGER by the side of one of his Woods, an old Woman applied herself to me for my Charity. Her Dress and Figure put me in mind of the following Description in Ottaway<sup>1</sup>

*In a close Lane as I pursu'd my Journey,
I spy'd a wrinkled Hag, with Age grown double,
Picking dry Sticks, and mumbling to her self
Her Eyes with sealding Rheum were gall'd and red, Cold Palsy shook her Head her Hands seem'd wither'd
And on her crooked Shoulders had she wrapp'd
The tatter'd Remnants of an old striped Hanging,
Which served to keep her Carcase from the Cold
So there was nothing of a Piece about her
Her lower Weeds were all o'er coarsely patch'd With different-colour'd Rags, black, red, white, yellow,
And seem'd to speak Variety of Wretchedness<sup>2</sup>*

[As I was musing on this Description, and comparing it with the Object before me, the Knight told me,<sup>3</sup> that this very old Woman had the Reputation of a Witch all over the Country, that her Lips were observed to be always in Motion, and that there was not a Switch about her House which her Neighbours did not believe had carried her several hundreds of Miles. If she chanced to stumble, they always found Sticks or Straws that lay in the Figure of a Cross before her. If she made any Mistake at Church, and cryed Amen in a wrong Place, they never failed to conclude that she was saying her Prayers backwards. There was not a Maid in the Parish that would take a Pin of her, though she would offer a Bag of Money with it. She goes by the Name of Moll White, and has made the Country ring with several imaginary Exploits which are primed upon her. It is the Dairy Maid does not make her Butter come so soon as she should have it, Moll White is at the Bottom of the Churn. If a Horse sweats in the Saddle, Moll White has been upon his Back. If a Horse makes an unexpected escape from the Hands, the Huntsman curses Moll White. Nay, (says Sir Roger) I have known the Master of the Pick, upon such an Occasion, send one of his Servants to see if Moll White had been out that Morning.

This Account raised my Curiosity so far, that I begged my Friend Sir Roger to go with me into her House, which stood in a solitary Corner under the side of the Wood. Upon our first entering Sir Roger walked to me, and pointed at something that stood behind the Door, which, upon looking that Way, I found to be an old Broom-staff. At the same time he whispered me in the Ear to take notice of a Tabbie Cat that sat in the Chimney Corner, which, as the old Knight told me, his under was had in Report as Moll White herself, for besides that Moll is said often to accompany her in the same Shape, the Cat is reported to have spoken twice or thrice in her Life, and to have played several Pranks above the Capacity of an ordinary Cat.

I was secretly concerned to see Human Nature in so much Wretchedness and Disgrace, but at the same time could not forbear smiling to hear Sir Roger, who is a little puzzled about the old Woman, advising her is a Justice of Peace to avoid all Communication with the Devil, and never to hurt any of her Neighbours' Cattle. We concluded our Visit with a Bounty, which was very acceptable.

In our Return home, Sir Roger told me, that old Moll had been often brought before him for making Children spit Fire, and giving Maids the Night Mare; and that the Country People would be tossing her into a Pond and trying Experiments with her every Day, if it was not for him and his Chaplain.

I have since found upon Enquiry, that Sir Roger was several times staggered with the Reports that had been brought him concerning this old Woman, and would frequently have bound her over to the County Sessions, had not his Chaplain with much ado persuaded him to the contrary.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>2</sup> When this essay was written, charges were being laid against one old woman, Jane Wenham, of Wilkorne, a little village north of Hertford, which led to her trial for witchcraft at assizes held in the following year, 1712, when she was found guilty and became memorable as the last person who, in this country, was condemned to capital punishment for that impossible offence. The judge got first a reprieve and then a pardon. The lawyers had refused to draw up any indictment against the poor old creature, except, in mockery,

I have been the more particular in this Account, because I hear there is scarce a Village in England that has not a Moll White in it. When an old Woman begins to do it, and grow chargeable to a Parish, she is generally turned into a Witch, and fills the whole Country with extravagant Fancies, imaginary Distempers and terrifying Dreams. In the mean time, the poor Wretch that is the innocent Occasion of so many Evils begins to be frightened at her self, and sometimes confesses secret Commerce and Familiarities that her Imagination forms in a delirious old Age. This frequently cuts off Charity from the greatest Objects of Compassion, and inspires People with a Malesolence towards those poor decrepid Parts of our Species, in whom Human Nature is defaced by Infirmary and Dotage. THIS agreeable Seat is surrounded with so many pleasing Walks, which are struck out of a Wood, in the midst of which the House stands, that one can hardly ever be weary of rambling from one Labyrinth of Delight to another. To one used to live in a City the Charms of the Country are so exquisite, that the Mind is lost in a certain Transport which raises us above ordinary Life, and is yet not strong enough to be inconsistent with Trinquillity. This State of Mind was I in, ravished with the Murmur of Waters, the Whisper of Breezes, the Singing of Birds, and whether I looked up to the Heavens, down on the Earth, or turned to the Prospects around me, still struck with new Sense of Pleasure, when I found by the Voice of my Friend, who walked by me, that we had insensibly stroked into the Grove for 'conversing familiarly with the devil in form of a cat'. But of that offence she was found guilty upon the testimony of sixteen witnesses, three of whom were clergymen. One witness, Anne Thorne, testified that every night the pins went from her cushion into her mouth. Others gave evidence that they had seen pins come jumping through the air into Anne Thorne's mouth. Two swore that they had heard the prisoner, in the shape of a cat, converse with the devil, he being also in form of a cat. Anne Thorne swore that she was tormented exceedingly with cats, and that all the cats had the face and voice of the witch. The vicar of Ardeley had used the poor ignorant creature with the Lord's Prayer, and finding that she could not repeat it, had terrified her with his moral tortures into some sort of confession. Such things, then, were said and done, and such credulity was abetted even by educated men at the time when this essay was written. Upon charges like those ridiculed in the text, a woman actually was, a few months later, not only committed by justices with a less judicious spiritual counsellor than Sir Roger's chaplain, but actually found guilty at the assizes, and condemned to death.

sacred to the Widow This Woman, says he, is of all others the most unintelligible she either designs to marry, or she does not What is the most perplexing of all, is, that she doth not either say to her Lovers she has any Resolution against that Condition of Life in general, or that she banishes them, but conscious of her own Merit, she permits their Addresses, without Fear of any ill Consequence, or want of Respect, from their Rage or Despair She has that in her Aspect, against which it is impossible to offend A Man whose Thoughts are constantly bent upon so agreeable an Object, must be excused if the ordinary Occurrences in Conversation are below his Attention I call her indeed perverse, but, alas! why do I call her so? Because her superior Merit is such, that I cannot approach her without Awe, that my Heart is checked by too much Esteem I am angry that her Charms are not more accessible, that I am more inclined to worship than salute her How often have I wished her unhappy that I might have an Opportunity of serving her? and how often troubled in that very Imagination, at giving her the Pain of being obliged? Well, I have led a miserable Life in secret upon her Account but fancy she would have condescended to have some regard for me, if it had not been for that watchful Animal her Confidant

Of all Persons under the Sun (continued he, calling me by my Name) be sure to set a Mark upon Confidants they are of all People the most impertinent What is most pleasant to observe in them, is, that they assume to themselves the Merit of the Persons whom they have in their Custody Orestilla is a great Fortune, and in wonderful Danger of Surprises, therefore full of Suspicions of the least indifferent thing, particularly careful of new Acquaintance, and of growing too familiar with the old Themista, her Favourite-Woman, is every whit as careful of whom she speaks to, and what she says Let the Ward be a Beauty, her Confidant shall treat you with an Air of Distance let her be a Fortune, and she assumes the suspicious Behaviour of her Friend and Patroness Thus it is that very many of our unmarried Women of Distinction, are to all Intent and Purposes married, except the Consideration of different Sexes They are directly under the Conduct of their Whisperer and think they are in a State of Freedom, while they can prate with one of these Attendants of all Men in general, and still avoid the Man they most like You do not see one Mistress in a hundred whose Fate does not turn upon this Circumstance of choosing a Confidant Thus it is that the Lady is addressed to, presented and flattered, only by Proxy, in her Woman In my Case, how is it possible that—Sir ROGER was proceeding in his Harangue, when we heard the Voice of one speaking very importantly, and repeating these Words, 'What, not 'one Smile?' We followed the Sound till we came to a close Thicket, on the other side of which we saw a young Woman sitting as it were in a personated Sullenness just over a transparent Fountain Opposite to her stood Mr William, Sir ROGER's Master of the Game The Knight whispered me, 'Hist, these are Lovers' The Huntsman looking earnestly at the Shadow of the young Maiden in the Stream, 'Oh thou dear Picture, if thou couldst remain there in the Absence of that fair Creature whom you represent in the Water, how willingly could I stand here satisfied for ever without troubling my dear Betty herself with any Mention of her unfortunate William, whom she is angry with But alas! when she pleases to be gone, thou wilt also vanish—Yet let me talk to thee while thou dost stay Tell my dearest Betty thou dost not more depend upon her, than does her William? Her Absence will make away with me as well as thou If she offers to remove thee, I'll jump into these Waves to lay hold on thee her self, her own dear Person, I must never embrace again—' Still do you hear me without one Smile—It is too much to bear—' He had no sooner spoke these Words, but he made an Offer of throwing himself into the Water At which his Mistress started up, and at the next Instant he jumped across the Fountain and met her in an Embrace She half recovering from her Fright, said in the most charming Voice imaginable, and with a Tone of Complaint, 'I thought how well you would drown yourself No, no, you won't drown yourself till you have taken your leave of Susan Holiday' The Huntsman, with a Tenderness that spoke the most passionate Love, and with his Cheek close to hers, whispered the softest Vows of Fidelity in her Ear, and cried, 'Don't, my Dear, believe a Word Kate Willow says she is spiteful and makes Stories, because she loves to hear me talk to her self for your sake' Look you there, quoth Sir ROGER, do you see there, all Mischief comes from Confidants! But let us not interrupt them the Mud is honest, and the Man dares not be otherwise, for he knows I loved her Father I will interpose in this matter, and hasten the Wedding Kate Willow is a witty mischievous Wench in the Neighbourhood, who was a Beauty and makes me hope I shall see the perverse Widow in her Condition She was so suppliant with her Answers to all the honest Fellows that came near her, and so very vain of her Beauty, that she has valued herself upon her Charms till they are ceased She therefore now makes it her Business to prevent other young Women from being more Discreet than she was herself However, the saucy Thing said the other Day well enough, 'Sir ROGER and I must make a Match, for we are both despised by those we loved' The Hussey has a great deal of Power wherever she comes, and has her Share of Cunning

However, when I reflect upon this Woman, I do not know whether in the main I am the worse for having loved her Whenever she is recalled to my Imagination my Youth returns, and I feel a forgotten Warmth in my Veins This Affliction in my Life has struck all my Conduct with a Softness, of which I should otherwise have been incapable It is, perhaps, to this dear Image in my Heart owing, that I am apt to relent, that I easily forgive, and that many desirable things are grown into my Temper, which I should not have arrived at by better Motives than the Thought of being one Day hers I am pretty well satisfied such a Passion as I have had is never well cured, and between you and me, I am often apt to imagine it has had some whimsical Effect upon my Brain. For I frequently find, that in my most serious Discourse I let fall some comical Profundity of Speech or odd Phrase that makes the Company laugh. However, I cannot but allow she is a most excellent Woman. When she is in the Country I warrant she does no run into Dunes, but reads upon the Nature of Plants but has a Glass Hive, and comes into the Garden out of Books to see them work, and observe the Policies of their Commonwealth. She understands every thing. I'd give ten Pounds to hear her argue with my Friend Sir ANDREW WRETHINGTON about Trade. No, no, for all she looks so innocent as if were, take my Word for it she is no Fool. T

*Urbem quam drunt Romani Meliore putant
Stultus egrediens restat in urbem*—Virg

THE first and most obvious Reflections which arise in a Man who changes the City for the Country, are upon the different Manners of the People whom he meets with in those two different Scenes of Life. By Manners I do not mean Morals, but Behaviour and Good Breeding, as they shew themselves in the Town and in the Country.

And here, in the first place, I must observe a very great Revolution that has happen'd in this Article of Good Breeding. Several obliging Deference, Condescensions and Submissions, with many outward Forms and Ceremonies that accompany them, were first of all brought up among the polite Part of Mankind, who lived in Courts and Cities and distinguished themselves from the Rustick part of the Species (who on all Occasions acted bluntly and naturally) by such a mutual Complaisance and Intercourse of Civilities. These Forms of Conversation by degrees multiplied and grew troublesome. The Modish World found too great a Constraint in them, and have therefore thrown most of them aside. Conversation, like the Romish Religion, was so encumbered with Show and Ceremony, that it stood in need of a Reformation to retrench its Superfluities, and restore it to its natural good Sense and Beauty. At present therefore an unconstrained Carriage, and a certain Openness of Behaviour, are the Height of Good Breeding. The Fashionable World is grown free and easy. Our Manners sit more loose upon us. Nothing is so modish as an agreeable Negligence. In a word, Good Breeding shews it self most, where to an ordinary Eye it appears the least.

If after this we look on the People of Mode in the Country, we find in them the Manners of the last Age. They have no sooner fetched themselves up to the Fashion of the polite World, but the Town has dropped them, and are nearer to the first State of Nature than to those Refinements which formerly reign'd in the Court, and still prevail in the Country. One may now know a Man that never conversed in the World, by his Excess of Good Breeding. A polite Country Squire shall make you as many Bows in half an Hour, as would serve a Courtier for a Week. There is infinitely more to do about Place and Precedency in a Meeting of Justices Wives, than in an Assembly of Dutchesses.

This Rural Politeness is very troublesome to a Man of my Temper, who generally take the Church that is next me, and walk first or last, in the Front or in the Rear, as Chance directs. I have known my Friend Sir ROGER's Dinner almost cold before the Company could adjust the Ceremony, and be prevail'd upon to sit down, and have heartily pitied my old Friend, when I have seen him forced to pick and cull his Guests, as they sat at the several Parts of his Table, that he might drink their Healths according to their respective Ranks and Qualities. Honest WILL WIMBLE, who I should have thought had been altogether unimpair'd by Ceremony, gives me abundance of Trouble in this Particular. Though he has been fishing all the Morning, he will not help himself at Dinner till I am served. When we are going out of the Hall, he runs behind me and last Night, as we were walking in the Fields, stopped short at a Stile till I came up to it, and upon my making Signs to him to get over, told me, with a serious Smile, that sure I believed they had no Manners in the Country.

There has happen'd another Revolution in the Point of Good Breeding, which relates to the Conversation among Men of Mode, and which I cannot but look upon as very extraordinary. It was certainly one of the first Distinctions of a well-bred Man, to express every thing that had the most remote Appearance of being obscene, in modest Terms and distant Phrases whilst the Clown, who had no such Delicacy of Conception and Expression, clothed his Ideas in those plain homely Terms that are the most obvious and natural. This kind of Good Manners was perhaps carried to an Excess, so as to make Conversation too stiff, formal and precise for which Reason (as Hypocrisy in one Age is generally succeeded by Atheism in another) Conversation is in a great measure relaps'd into the first Extremum so that it present several of our Men of the Town, and particularly those who have been polished in France, make use of the most coarse uncivilized Words in our Language, and utter themselves often in such a manner as a Clown would blush to hear.

This infamous Piece of Good Breeding, which reigns among the Coxcombs of the Town, has not yet invid its way into the Country, and as it is impossible for such an irrational way of Conversation to last long among a People that make any Profession of Religion, or Show of Modesty, if the Country Gentlemen get into it they will certainly be left in the Lurch. Their Good breeding will come too late to them, and they will be thought a Parcel of lewd Clowns, while they fancy themselves talking together like Men of Wit and Pleasure.

As the two Points of Good Breeding, which I have hitherto insisted upon, regard Behaviour and Conversation, there is a third which turns upon Dress. In this too the Country are very much behind-hand The Rural Beaus are not yet got out of the Fashion that took place at the time of the Revolution, but ride about the Country in red Coats and laced Hats, while the Women in many Parts are still trying to outvie one another in the Height of their Head dresses

But a Friend of mine, who is now upon the Western Circuit, having promised to give me an Account of the several Modes and Fashions that prevail in the different Parts of the Nation through which he passes, I shall defer the enlarging upon this last Topic till I have received a Letter from him, which I expect every Post

—*Eundem credo, quia sit Divinitus illos
Ingenium*— Virg

MY Friend Sir ROGER is very often merry with me upon my passing so much of my Time among his Poultry He has caught me twice or thrice looking after a Bird's Nest, and several times sitting an Hour or two together near an Hen and Chickens He tells me he believes I am personally acquainted with every Fowl about his House calls such a particular Cock my Favourite, and frequently complains that his Ducks and Geese have more of my Company than himself

I must confess I am infinitely delighted with those Speculations of Nature which are to be made in a Country-Life and as my Reading has very much run among Books of natural History, I cannot forbear recollecting upon this Occasion the several Remarks which I have met with in Authors, and comparing them with what falls under my own Observation The Arguments for Providence drawn from the natural History of Animals being in my Opinion demonstrative

The Make of every Kind of Animal is different from that of every other Kind and yet there is not the least Turn in the Muscles or Twist in the Fibres of any one, which does not render them more proper for that particular Animal's Way of Life than any other Cast or Texture of them would have been

The most violent Appetites in all Creatures are Lust and Hunger The first is a perpetual Call upon them to propagate their Kind, the latter to preserve themselves

It is astonishing to consider the different Degrees of Care that descend from the Parent to the Young, so far as is absolutely necessary for the leaving a Posterity Some Creatures cast their Eggs as Chance directs them, and think of them no farther, as Insects and several Kinds of Fish Others, of a milder Frame, find out proper Beds to [deposite<sup>2</sup>] them in, and there leave them as the Serpent, the Crocodile, and Ostrich Others hatch their Eggs and tend the Birth, 'till it is able to shift for itself

What can we call the Principle which directs

every different Kind of Bird to observe a particular Plan in the Structure of its Nest, and directs all of the same Species to work after the same Model? It cannot be Imitation, for though you hatch a Crow under a Hen, and never let it see any of the Works of its own Kind, the Nest it makes shall be the same, to the hatching of a Stuck, with all the other Nests of the same Species It cannot be Reason, for were Animals indued with it to as great a Degree as Man, their Buildings would be as different as ours, according to the different Conveniences that they would propose to themselves

Is it not remarkable, that the same Temper of Weather, which raises this general Warmth in Animals, should cover the Trees with Leaves and the Fields with Grass for their Security and Concomitant, and produce such infinite Swarms of Insects for the Support and Subsistence of their respective Broods?

Is it not wonderful, that the Love of the Parent should be so violent while it lasts and that it should last no longer than is necessary for the Preservation of the Young?

The Violence of this natural Love is exemplify'd by a very barbarous Experiment which I shall quote at Length, as I find it in an excellent Author, and hope my Readers will pardon the mentioning such an Instance of Cruelty, because there is nothing can so effectually shew the Strength of that Principle in Animals of which I am here speaking 'A Person who was well skilled in Dissection opened a Bitch, and as she lay in the most exquisite Tortures, offered her new born young Puppies, which she immediately fell a licking and for the Time seemed insensible of her own Pain On the Removal, she kept her Eye fixt on it, and began a wailing sort of Cry, which seemed rather to proceed from the Loss of her young one, than the Sense of her own Torments

But notwithstanding this natural Love in Brutes is much more violent and intense than in rational Creatures, Providence has taken care that it should be no longer troublesome to the Parent than it is useful to the Young for so soon as the Want of the latter ceases the Mother withdraws her Fondness, and leaves them to provide for themselves and what is a very remarkable Circumstance in this part of Instinct, we find that the Love of the Parent may be lengthened out beyond its usual time, if the Preservation of the Species requires it as we may see in Birds that drive away their Young as soon as they are able to get their Livelihood but continue to feed them if they are tied to the Nest, or confined within a Cage, or by any other Means appear to be out of a Condition of supplying their own Necessities

This natural Love is not observed in animals to descend from the Young to the Parent, which is not at all necessary for the Continuance of the Species Nor indeed in reasonable Creatures does it rise in any Proportion, as it spreads itself downwards for in all Family Affection, we find Protection granted and Favours bestowed, are greater Motives to Love and Tenderness, than Safety, Benefits, or Life received

One would wonder to hear Sceptical Men dis-

Parts of our Nature, the Passions and Senses in their greatest Strength and Perfection. And here it is worth our Observation, that all Beasts and Birds of Prey are wonderfully subject to Anger, Malice, Revenge, and all the other violent Passions that may animate them in search of their proper Food: as those that are incapable of defending themselves, or annoying others, or whose Safety lies chiefly in their Flight, are suspicious, fearful and apprehensive of every thing they see or hear, whilst others that are of Assistance and Use to Man, have their Natures softened with something mild and tractable, and by that means are qualified for a Domestic Life. In this Case the Passions generally correspond with the Make of the Body. We do not find the Fury of a Lion in so weak and defenceless an Animal as a Lamb, nor the Meekness of a Lamb in a Creature so armed for Battle and Assault as the Lion. In the same manner, we find that particular Animals have a more or less exquisite Sharpness and Sensibility in those particular Senses which most turn to their Advantage, and in which their Safety and Welfare is the most concerned.

Nor must we here omit that great Variety of Arms with which Nature has differently fortified the Bodies of several kind of Animals, such as Claws, Hoofs, and Horns, Teeth, and Tusks, a Tail, a Sting, a Frunk, or a Proboscis. It is likewise observed by Naturalists, that it must be some hidden Principle distinct from what we call Reason, which instructs Animals in the Use of these their Arms, and teaches them to manage them to the best Advantage, because they naturally defend themselves with that Part in which their Strength lies, before the Weapon be formed in it, as is remarkable in Lambs, which tho' they are bred within Doors, and never saw the Actions of their own Species, push at those who approach them with their Foreheads, before the first budding of a Horn appears.

I shall add to these general Observations, an Instance which Mr Lock has given us of Providence even in the Imperfections of a Creature which seems the meanest and most despicable in the whole animal World. We may, says he, from the Make of an Oyster, or Cockle, conclude, that it has not so many nor so quick Senses as a Man, or several other Animals. Nor if it had, would it, in that State and Incapacity of transferring itself from one Place to another, be bettered by them. What good would Sight and Hearing do to a Creature, that cannot move it self, to or from the Object, wherein at a distance it perceives Good or Evil? And would not Quickness of Sensation be an Inconvenience to an Animal, that must be still where Chance has once placed it, and there receive the Afflux of colder or warmer, clean or foul Water, as it happens to come to it?

I shall add to this Instance one of Mr Lock another out of the learned Dr Moor,<sup>2</sup> who cites it from Cardan, in relation to another Animal which Providence has left Defective, but at the same time has shewn its Wisdom in the Formation of that Organ in which it seems chiefly to have failed. What is more obvious and ordinary than a Mole? and yet what more palpable Argument of Providence than she? The Members of her Body are so exactly fitted to her Nature and Manner of Life. For her Dwelling being under Ground where nothing is to be seen, Nature has so obscurely fitted her with Eyes, that Naturalists can hardly agree whether she have any Sight at all or no. But for Amends, what she is capable of for her Defence and Warning of Danger, she has very eminently conferred upon her for she is exceeding quick of hearing. And then her short Tail and short Legs, but broad Fore feet armed with sharp Claws, we see by the Extent to which at Purpose they are, she so swiftly working her self under Ground, and making her way so fast in the Earth as they that behold it cannot but admire it. Her Legs therefore are short, that she need dig no more than will serve the mere Tightness of her Body, and her Fore feet are broad that she may scoop away much Earth at a time, and little or no Tail she has, because she courses it not on the Ground, like the Rat or Mouse, of whose Kindred she is, but lives under the Earth, and is fain to dig her self a Dwelling there. And she making her way through so thick an Element, which will not yield easily, as the Air or the Water, it had been dangerous to have drawn so long a Train behind her, for her Enemy might fall upon her rear, and fetch her out, before she had compleated or got full Possession of her Work.

I cannot forbear mentioning Mr Boyle's Remark upon this last Creature, who I remember somewhere in his Works observes, that though the Mole be not totally blind (as it is commonly thought) she has not Sight enough to distinguish particular Objects. Her Eye is said to have but one Humour in it, which is supposed to give her the Idea of Light, but of nothing else, and is so formed that this Idea is probably painful to the Animal. Whenever she comes up into broad Day she might be in Danger of being taken, unless she were thus affected by a Light striking upon her Eye, and immediately warning her to bury herself in her proper Element. More Sight would be useless to her, as none at all might be fatal.

I have only instanced such Animals as seem the most imperfect Works of Nature and if Providence shews it self even in the Blemishes of these Creatures, how much more does it discover it self in the several Endowments which it has variously bestowed upon such Creatures as are more or less finished and compleated in their several Faculties according to the condition of Life in which they are posted.

I could wish our Royal Society would compile a Body of Natural History, the best that could be gathered together from Books and Observations. If the several Writers among them took each his particular Species, and gave us a distinct Account of its Original, Birth and Education its Policies,

Hostilities and Alliances, with the Prime and Texture of its inward and outward Parts, and particularly those that distinguish it from all other Animals with their peculiar Aptitudes for the Service of being in which Providence has placed them, it would be one of the best Services their Studies could do Mankind, and not a little add to the Glory of the All wise Contriver.

It is true, such a Natural History, after all the Disquisitions of the Learned, would be infinitely Short and Defective. Seas and Deserts hide Millions of Animals from our Observation. Innumerable Antilles and Stragglers are reared in the Hoisting of the Sails and in the Great Deep, that can never come to our knowledge. Besides that there are infinitely more Species of Creatures which are not to be seen without, nor indeed with the help of the finest Glasses, than of such as are bulky enough for the naked Eye to take hold of. However from the Consideration of such Animals as lie within the Compass of our knowledge, we might easily form a Conclusion of the rest, that the same Variety of Wisdom and Goodness runs through the whole Creation, and puts every Creature in a Condition to provide for its Safety and Subsistence in its proper Station.

Fuller has given us an admirable Sketch of Natural History, in his second Book concerning the Nature of the Gods: and then in a Style so raised by Metaphors and Descriptions, that it lifts the Subject above Ridicule and Ridicule, which frequently fall on such nice Observations when they pass through the Hands of an ordinary Writer.

Comes juvenis in - ia pro - chilo est
Publ. Sir Roger

A MAN'S first Care should be to avoid the Reproaches of his own Heart: his next, to escape the Censures of the World. If the last interferes with the former, it ought to be entirely neglected: but otherwise, there cannot be a greater Satisfaction to a honest Mind, than to see those Applaudations which it gives itself seconded by the Applauds of the Publick. A Man is more sure of his Conduct when the Verdict which he passes upon his own Behaviour is thus warranted and confirmed by the Opinion of all that know him.

My worthy Friend Sir Roger is one of those who is not only at Peace within himself, but beloved and esteemed by all about him. He receives a suitable Tribute for his universal Benevolence to Mankind in the Returns of Affection and Good will, which are paid him by every one that lives within his Neighbourhood. I lately met with two or three odd Instances of that general Respect which is shown to the good old Knight. He would needs carry Will Wumble and myself with him to the County-Assizes. As we were upon the Road Will Wumble joined a couple of plain Men who rode before us, and conversed with them for some Time, during which my Friend Sir ROGER acquainted me with their Characters.

The first of them, says he, that has a Spaniel by his Side, is a Yeoman of about an hundred Pounds a Year, an honest Man. He is just within the Crime Act, and qualified to kill an Hare or a Pheasant. He knocks down a Dinner with his Gun twice or thrice a Week: and by that means lives much cheaper than those who have not so good an Estate as himself. He would be a good Neighbour if he did not destroy so many Partridges: in short, he is a very sensible Man: shoots flying: and has been several times Foreman of the Petty-Jury.

The other that rides along with him is Tom Touchy, a Fellow famous for taking the Law of every Body. There is not one in the Town where he lives that he has not sued at a Quarter-Sessions. The Rogue had once the Impudence to go to Law with the Widow. His Head is full of Costs, Damages, and Ejectments. He plagued a couple of honest Gentlemen so long for a Trespass in breaking one of his Hedges, till he was forced to sell the Ground it enclosed to defray the Charges of the Prosecution. His Father left him fourscore Pounds a Year: but he has cast and been cast so often, that he is not now worth thirty. I suppose he is going upon the old Business of the Willon-Tree.

As Sir ROGER was giving me this Account of Tom Touchy, Will Wumble and his two Companions stopped short till we came up to them. After having paid their Respects to Sir ROGER, Will told him that Mr. Touchy and he must appeal to him upon a Dispute that arose between them. Will it seems had been giving his Fellow Traveller an Account of his Angling one Day in such a Hole when Tom Touchy, instead of hearing out his Story, told him that Mr. such an One, if he pleased, might take the Law of him for fishing in that Part of the River. My Friend Sir ROGER heard them both, upon a round Trot: and after having praised some time told them, with the Air of a Man who would not give his Judgment rashly, that much might be said on both Sides. They were neither of them dissatisfied with the Knight's Determination, because neither of them found himself in the Wrong by it. Upon which we made the best of our Way to the Assizes.

The Court was sat before Sir ROGER came: but notwithstanding all the Justices had taken their Places upon the Bench, they made room for the old Knight at the Head of them: who for his Reputation in the Country took occasion to whisper in the Judge's Ear, That he was glad his Lordship had met with so much good Weather in his Circuit. I was listening to the Proceeding of the Court with much Attention, and infinitely pleased with that great Appearance and Solemnity which so properly accompanies such a publick Administration of our Laws: when, after about an Hour's Sitting, I observed to my great Surprise, in the Midst of a Trial, that my Friend Sir ROGER was getting up to speak. I was in some Pain for him, till I found he had acquitted himself of two or three Sentences, with a Look of much Business and great Intrepidity.

Upon his first Rising the Court was hushed, and a general Whisper ran among the Country People that Sir ROGER was up. The Speech he made was so little to the Purpose, that I shall not trouble my Readers with an Account of it: and I believe was not so much designed by the King, but himself in inform the Court, as to give him a Figure in my Eye, and I set up his Credit in the Country.

I was highly delighted, when the Court rose, to see the Gentlemen of the Country gathering about my old Friend, and stirring, who should compliment him most: at the same time that the ordinary People gazed upon him at a distance, not a little admiring his Courage, that was not afraid to speak to the Judge.

In our Return home we met with a very old Accident which I cannot forbear relating, because it shews how dangerous all who know Sir ROGER are of giving him Marks of their Esteem. When we were arrived upon the Verge of his Estate, we stopped at a little Inn to rest ourselves and our Horses. The Man of the House had it seems been formerly a Servant in the Knight's Family, and to do Honour to his old Master, had some time since, unknown to Sir ROGER, put him up in a Sign post before the Door, so that the Knight's Head had hung out upon the Road about a Week before he himself knew any thing of the Matter. As soon as Sir ROGER was acquainted with it finding that his Servant's Infratraction proceeded wholly from Affection and Good will, he only told him that he had made him too high a Compliment: and when the Fellow seemed to think that could hardly be, added with a more decisive Look. That it was too great an Honour for any Man under a Duke: but told him at the same time that it might be altered with a very few touches: and that he himself would be at the Charge of it. Accordingly they got a Painter by the Knight's Directions to add a pair of Whiskers to the Face, and by a little Aggravation to the Features to change it into the Saracen's Head. I should not have known this Story had not the Inn keeper, upon Sir ROGER's lighting, told him in my Hearing, That his Honour's Head was brought back last Night with the Alterations that he had ordered to be made in it. Upon this my Friend with his usual Charitableness related the Particulars above-mentioned, and ordered the Head to be brought into the Room. I could not forbear discovering greater Expressions of Mirth than ordinary upon the Appearance of this monstrous Face, under which, notwithstanding it was made to frown and stare in a most extraordinary manner, I could still discover a distant Resemblance of my old Friend. Sir ROGER, upon seeing me laugh, desired me to tell him truly if I thought it possible for People to know him in that Disguise. I at first kept my usual Silence: but upon the Knight's conjuring me to tell him whether it was not still more like himself than a Saracen, I composed my Countenance in the best manner I could, and replied, That much might be said on both Sides.

These several Adventures, with the Knight's Behaviour in them, gave me as pleasant a Day as ever I met with in any of my Travels. I

*Delectum sed non fructu et insulam, lectu, ut cultus pectora r'borant Utique defecere mores,
Dedecorant' leue uata culpa --Hor*

AS I was Yesterday riding the Air with my Friend Sir ROGER we were met by a fresh coloured ruddy young Man, who told by his full dress, with a couple of Servants behind him. Upon my Inquiry who he was Sir ROGER told me that he was a young Gentleman of a considerable Estate who had been educated by a tender Mother that lived not many Miles from the Place where we were. She is a very good Lady, says I, I think, but took some notice of her Son's Health, that she has made him a deal for nothing. She quickly found that he was a deal for his Eyes, and that Winter rode his Health. He was let loose among the Woods as soon as he was able to ride on Horse-back, so to carry a Gun upon his Shoulder. To be brief, I found, by my Friend's Account of him, that he had got a great Stock of Health but nothing else: and that if it were a Man's Business only to live there would not be a more accomplished young Fellow in the whole Country.

The Truth of it is since my residing in these Parts I have seen and read many remarkable Instances of young Heirs and other Masters who either from their own reflecting upon the Estates they are born to, and therefore thinking all other Accomplishments unnecessary or from hearing these Notions frequently insinuated to them by the Flattery of their Servants and Domesticks or from the same foolish Thought prevailing in those who have the Care of their Education, are of an manner of use but to keep up their Families, and transmit their Lands and Houses in a Line to Posterity.

This makes me often think on a Story I have heard of two Friends, which I shall give my Reader at large, under several Names. The Moral of it may, I hope, be useful though there are some Circumstances which make it rather appear like a Novel, than a true Story.

Fudorus and Leontius began the World with small Estates. They were both of them Men of good Sense and great Virtue. They proscribed their Studies together in their earlier Years, and entered into such a Friendship as lasted to the End of their Lives. Fudorus, at his first setting out in the World, threw himself into a Court, where by his natural Endowments and his acquired Abilities he made his way from one Post to another, till at length he had raised a very considerable Fortune. Leontius on the contrary sought all Opportunities of improving his Mind by Study, Conversation, and Travel. He was not only acquainted with all the Sciences but with the most eminent Professors of them throughout Europe. He knew perfectly well the Interests of his Princes, with the Customs and Fashions of their Courts, and could scarce meet with the Name of an extraordinary Person in the Gazette.

whom he had not either talked to or seen. In short, he had so well mixt and digested his Knowledge of Men and Books, that he made one of the most accomplished Persons of his Age. During the whole Course of his Studies and Travels he kept up a pineternal Correspondence with Eudorus, who often made himself acceptable to the principal Men about Court by the Intelligence which he received from Leontine. When they were both turn'd of Forty (an Age in which, according to Mr Cowley, there is no dailyn growth Life<sup>1</sup>) they determined, pursuant to the Resolution they had taken in the beginning of their Lives, to retire, and pass the Remainder of their Days in the Country. In order to this, they both of them married much about the same time. Leontine, with his own and his Wife's Fortune, bought a Farm of three hundred a Year, which lay within the Neighbourhood of his Friend Eudorus, who had purchas'd an Estate of as many thousands. They were both of them Fathers about the same time, Eudorus having a Son born to him, and Leontine a Daughter, but to the unspeakable Grief of the latter, his young Wife (in whom all his Happiness was wrapt up) died in a few Days after the Birth of her Daughter. His Affliction would have been insupportable, had not he been comforted by the daily Visits and Conversations of his Friend. As they were one Day talking together with their usual Intimacy, Leontine, considering how incapable he was of giving his Daughter a proper education in his own House, and Eudorus reflecting on the ordinary Behaviour of a Son who knows himself to be the Heir of a great Estate, they both agreed upon an Exchange of Children, namely that the Boy should be bred up with Leontine as his Son, and that the Girl should live with Eudorus as his Daughter, till they were each of them arriv'd at Years of Discretion. The Wife of Eudorus, knowing that her Son could not be so advantageously brought up as under the Care of Leontine, and considering at the same time that he would be perpetually under her own Eye, was by degrees prevail'd upon to fall in with the Project. She therefore took Leonilla, for that was the Name of the Girl, and educated her as her own Daughter. The two Friends on each side had wrought themselves to such an habitual Tenderness for the Children who were under their Direction, that each of them had the real Passion of a Father, where the Title was but imaginary. Florio, the Name of the young Heir that lived with Leontine, though he had all the Duty and Affection imaginable for his supposed Parent, was taught to rejoice at the Sight of Eudorus, who visited his Friend very frequently, and was detested by his natural Affection, as well as by the Rules of Prudence, to make himself esteem'd and beloved by Florio. The Boy was now old enough to know his supposed Father's Circumstances, and that therefore he was to make his way in the World by his own Industry. This Consideration grew stronger in him every Day, and produc'd so good an Effect, that he apply'd himself with more than ordinary Attention to the Pursuit of every thing which Leontine recommended to him. His natural Abilities, which were very good, assisted by the Directions of so excellent a Counsellor, enabled him to make a quicker Progress than ordinary through all the Parts of his Education. Before he was twenty Years of Age, having finish'd his Studies and Exercises with great Applause, he was removed from the University to the Inns of Court, where there are very few that make themselves considerable Proficients in the Studies of the Place, who know they shall arrive at great Estates without them. This was not Florio's Case, he found that three hundred a Year was but a poor Estate for Leontine and himself to live upon, so that he studied without Intermission till he gain'd a very good Insight into the Constitution and Laws of his Country.

I should have told my Reader, that whilst Florio lived at the House of his Foster-father, he was always an acceptable Guest in the Family of Eudorus, where he became acquainted with Leonilla from her Infancy. His Acquaintance with her by degrees grew into Love, which in a Mind trained up in all the Sentiments of Honour and Virtue became a very intense Passion. He despaired of gaining an Heiress of so great a Fortune, and would rather have died than attempted it by any indirect Methods. Leonilla, who was a Woman of the greatest Beauty joined with the greatest Modesty, entertain'd at the same time a secret Passion for Florio, but conducted her self with so much Prudence that she never gave him the least Intimation of it. Florio was now engaged in all those Arts and Improvements that are proper to raise a Man's private Fortune, and give him a Figure in his Country, but secretly tormented with that Passion which burns with the greatest Fury in a virtuous and noble Heart, when he received a sudden Summons from Leontine to repair to him into the Country the next Day. For it seems Eudorus was so filled with the Report of his Son's Reputation, that he could no longer withhold making himself known to him. The Morning after his Arrival at the House of his supposed Father, Leontine told him that Eudorus had something of great Importance to communicate to him, upon which the good Man embraced him, and wept. Florio was no sooner arriv'd at the great House that stood in his Neighbourhood, but Eudorus took him by the Hand, after the first Salutes were over, and conducted him into his Closet. He there opened to him the whole Secret of his Parentage and Education, concluding after this manner. I have no other way left of acknowledging my Gratitude to Leontine, than by marrying you to his Daughter. He shall not lose the Pleasure of being your Father by the Discovery I have made to you. Leonilla too shall be still my Daughter, her filial Piety, though misplaced, has been so exemplary that it deserves the greatest Reward I can confer upon it. You shall have the Pleasure of seeing a great Estate fall to you, which you would have lost the Relish of had you known your self born to it. Continue only to deserve it in the same manner you did before you were possessed of it. I have left your Mother in ledge and Learning suffer in [a<sup>1</sup>] particular manner from this strange Prejudice, which at present prevails amongst all Ranks and Degrees in the British Nation. As Men formerly became eminent in learned Societies by their Parts and Acquisitions, they now distinguish themselves by the Warmth and Violence with which they espouse their respective Parties. Books are valued upon the like Considerations. An Abusive Currious Style passes for Satyr, and a dull Scheme of Party Notions is called fine Writing.

There is one Piece of Sophistry practised by both Sides, and that is the taking any scandalous Story that has been ever whispered or invented of a Private Man, for a known undoubted Truth, and raising suitable Speculations upon it. Calumnies that have been never proved, or have been often refuted are the ordinary Postulums of these infamous Scriblers, upon which they proceed as upon first Principles granted by all Men, though in their Hearts they know they are false, or at best very doubtful. When they have laid these Foundations of Scurrility, it is no wonder that their Superstructure is every way answerable to them. If this shameless Practice of the present Age endures much longer, Praise and Reproach will cease to be Motives of Action in good Men.

There are certain Periods of Time in all Governments when this inhuman Spirit prevails. Italy was long torn in Pieces by the Guelfes and Gibellines, and France by those who were for and against the League. But it is very unhappy for a Man to be born in such a stormy and tempestuous Season. It is the restless Ambition of artful Men that thus breaks a People into Factions, and draws several well meaning [Persons<sup>2</sup>] to their Interest by a Specious Concern for their Country. How many honest Minds are filled with uncharitable and barbarous Notions, out of their Zeal for the Publick Good? What Cruelties and Outrages would they not commit against Men of an adverse Party, whom they would honour and esteem, if instead of considering them as they are reprobated, they knew them as they are? Thus are Persons of the greatest Probity seduced into shameful Errors and Prejudices, and made bad Men even by that noblest of Principles, the Love of their Country. I cannot here forbear mentioning the famous Spanish Proverb, If there were either swords or Knives in the World, all People would be of one Mind.

For my own part, I could heartily wish that all honest Men would enter into an Association, for the Support of one another against the Endeavours of those whom they ought to look upon as their common Enemies, whatsoever Side they may belong to. Were there such an honest [Body of Neutral<sup>3</sup>] Forces, we should never see the worst of Men in great Figures of Life, because they are useful to a Party, nor the best unregarded, because they are above practising those Methods which would be grateful to their Faction. We should then single every Criminal out of the Herd, and hunt him down, however formidable and overgrown he might appear. On the contrary, we should shelter distressed Innocence, and defend Virtue, however beset with Contempt or Ridicule, Envy or Defamation. In short, we should not any longer regard our Fellow Subjects as Whigs or Tories, but should make the Man of Merit our Friend, and the Villain our Enemy. C

IN my Yesterday's Paper I proposed, that the honest Men of all Parties should enter into a kind of Association for the Defence of one another, and [the] Confusion of their common Enemies. As it is designed this neutral Body should act with a Regard to nothing but Truth and Equity, and divest themselves of the little Heats and Prepossessions that cleave to Parties of all kinds, I have prepared for them the following Form of an Association, which may express their Intentions in the most plain and simple Manner.

We whose Names are hereunto subscribed do solemnly declare, That we do in our Consciences believe two and two make four, and that we shall adjudge any Man whatsoever to be our Enemy who endeavours to persuade us to the contrary. We are likewise ready to maintain, with the Hazard of all that is near and dear to us, That six is less than seven in all Times and all Places, and that ten will not be more than three Years hence than it is at present. We do also firmly declare, That it is our Resolution as long as we live to call Black black, and White white. And we shall upon all Occasions oppose such Persons that upon any Day of the Year shall call Black white, or White black, with the utmost Peril of our Lives and Fortunes.

Were there such a Combination of honest Men, who without any Regard to Places would endeavour to extirpate all such furious Zealots as would sacrifice one half of their Country to the Passion and Interest of the other, as also such infamous Hypocrites, that are for promoting their own Advantage, under Colour of the Publick Good, with all the profligate immoral Returners to each Side, that have nothing to recommend them but an implicit Submission to their Leaders, we should soon see that furious Party-Spirit extinguished, which may in time expose us to the Derision and Contempt of all the Nations about us.

A Member of this Society, that would thus carefully employ himself in making Room for Merit, by throwing down the worthless and depraved Part of Mankind from those conspicuous Stations of Life to which they have been sometimes advanced, and all this without any Regard to his private Interest, would be no small Benefactor to his Country.

Mr SPECTATOR,

'You have diverted the Town almost a whole Month at the Expence of the Country, it is now high time that you should give the Country their Revenge. Since your withdrawing from this Place, the Fur Sex are run into great Extravagancies. Their Petticoats, which began to heave and swell before you left us, are now blown up into a most enormous Conceive, and rise every Day more and more. In short, Sir, since our Women know themselves to be out of the Eye of the SPECTATOR, they will be kept within no Compass. You praised them a little too soon, for the Modesty of their Head Dresses for as the Humour of a sick Person is often driven out of one Limb into another, their Superfluity of Ornaments, instead of being entirely Banished, seems only fallen from their Heads upon their lower Parts. What they have lost in Height they make up in Breadth, and contrary to all Rules of Architecture widen the Foundations at the same time that they shorten the Superstructure. Were they, like Spanish Jennets, to impregnate by the Wind, they could not have thought on a more proper Invention. But as we do not yet hear any particular Use in this Petticoat, or that it contains any thing more than what was supposed to be in those of Scantier Make, we are wonderfully at a loss about it.

'The Women give out, in Defence of these wide Bottoms, that they are Airy, and very proper for the Season: but this I look upon to be only a Pretence, and a piece of Art, for it is well known we have not had a more moderate Summer these many Years, so that it is certain the Heat they complain of cannot be in the Weather. Besides, I would fain ask these tender constitutioned Ladies, why they should require more Cooling than their Mothers before them.

'I find several Speculative Persons are of Opinion that our Sex has of late Years been very away, and that the Hoop Petticoat is made use of to keep us at a Distance. It is most certain that a Woman's Honour cannot be better entrenched than after this manner, in Circle within Circle, amidst such a Variety of Out works and Lines of Circumvallation. A Female who is thus invested in Whale-Bone is sufficiently secured against the Approaches of an ill bred Fellow, who might as well think of Sir George Ethelgrew's way of making Love in a Tub,<sup>1</sup> as in the midst of so many Hoops.

'Among these various Conjectures there are Men of Superstitious Tempers, who look upon the Hoop Petticoat as a kind of Prodigy. Some will have it that it portends the Downfall of the French King and observe that the Furthingale appeared in England a little before the Rumor of the Spanish Monarchy. Others are of Opinion that it foretels Battle and Bloodshed, and believe it of the same Prognostication as the Tail of a Blazing Star. For my part, I am apt to think it is a Sign that Multitudes are coming into the World rather than going out of it.

'The first time I saw a Lady dressed in one of 'these Petticoats, I could not forbear blaming her in my own Thoughts for walking abroad when she was so near her Time, but soon recovered my self out of my Error, when I found all the Modish Part of the Sex as far gone as her self. It is generally thought some crafty Women have thus betrayed their Companions into Hoops: that they might make them necessary to their own Concealments, and by that means escape the Censure of the World as wary Generals have sometimes dressed two or three Dozen of their Friends in their own Habit, that they might not draw upon themselves any particular Attacks of the Enemy. The strutting Petticoat smooths all Distinctions, levels the Mother with the Daughter and sets Maids and Matrons, Wives and Widows, upon the same Bottom. In the mean while I cannot but be troubled to see so many well shaped innocent Virgins blotted up, and wraddling up and down like big-bellied Women.

'Should this Fashion get among the ordinary People our publick Ways would be so crowded that we should want Street room. Several Congregations of the best Fashion find themselves already very much streightened, and if the Mode encrease I wish it may not drive many ordinary Women into Meetings and Conventicles. Should our Sex at the same time take it into their Heads to wear Trunk Breeches (as who knows what their Indignation at this Female Treatment may drive them to) a Man and his Wife would fill a whole Pew.

'You know, Sir, it is recorded of Alvander the Great, that in his Indian Expedition he buried several Suits of Armour, which by his Direction were made much too big for any of his Soldiers, in order to give Posterity an extraordinary Idea of him, and make them believe he had commanded an Army of Giants. I am persuaded that if one of the present Petticoats happen to be hung up in any Repository of Curiosities, it will lead into the same Error the Generations that live some Removes from us unless we can believe our Posterity will think so disrespectfully of their Great Grand Mothers, that they made themselves Monstrous to appear Amiable.

'When I survey this new fashioned Rotunda in all its Parts I cannot but think of the old Hilosophy, who after having entered into an Egyptian Temple, and looked about for the Idol of the Place at length discovered a little black Monkey Enshrined in the midst of it, upon which he could not forbear crying out, (to the great Scandal of the Worshipers) What a magnificent Palace is here for such a Ridiculous Inhabitant!

'Though you have taken a Resolution in one of your Papers, to avoid descending to Particularities of Dress, I believe you will not think it below you, on so extraordinary an Occasion, to Unhoop the Fur Sex, and cure this fashionable Lynpany that is got among them. I am apt to think the Petticoat will shrink of its own accord at your first coming to Town at least a Touch of your Pen will make it contract it self, like the sensitive Plant, and by that means oblige several

—Concordia discors—Lucan

WOMEN in their Nature are much more gay and joyous than Men, whether it be that their Blood is more refined, their Fibres more delicate, and their animal Spirits more light and volatile, or whether, as some have imagined, there may not be a kind of Sex in the very Soul, I shall not pretend to determine. As Vivacity is the Gift of Women, Gravity is that of Men. They should each of them therefore keep a Watch upon the particular Bias which Nature has fixed in their Mind, that it may not draw too much, and lead them out of the Paths of Reason. This will certainly happen, if the one in every Word and Action reflects the Character of being rigid and severe, and the other of being brisk and airy. Men should beware of being captivated by a kind of savage Philosophy, Women by a thoughtless Gallantry. Where these Precipitations are not observed, the Man often degenerates into a Cyack, the Woman into a Coquet, the Man grows sullen and morose, the Woman impertinent and fractious.

By what I have said, we may conclude, Men and Women were made as Counterparts to one another, that the Pains and Anxieties of the Husband might be relieved by the Sprightliness and good Humour of the Wife. When these are rightly tempered, Care and Cheerfulness go Hand in Hand, and the Family, like a Ship that is duly trimmed, wants neither Sail nor Ballast.

Natural Historians observe, (for whilst I am in the Country I must fetch my Allusions from thence) that only the Male Birds have Voices, That their Songs begin a little before Breeding time, and end a little after. That whilst the Hen is covering her Eggs, the Male generally takes his Stand upon a Neighbouring Bough within her Hearing, and by that means amuses and diverts her with his Songs during the whole Time of her Sitting.

This Contract among Birds lasts no longer than till a Brood of young ones arises from it, so that in the furtherd Kind, the Cares and Languages of the married State, if I may so call it, lie principally upon the Female. On the contrary, as in our Species the Man and the Woman are joined together for Life, and the main Burden rests upon the former, Nature has given all the little Arts of Soothing and Blandishment to the Female, that she may cheer and animate her Companion in a constant and assiduous Application to the making a Provision for his Family, and the educating of their common Children. This however is not to be taken so strictly, as if the same Duties were not often reciprocal, and incumbent on both Parties, but only to set forth what seems to have been the general Intention of Nature, in the different Inclinations and Endowments which are bestowed on the different Sexes.

But whatever was the Reason that Man and Woman were made with this Variety of Temper, if we observe the Conduct of the Fair Sex, we find that they choose rather to associate themselves with a Person who resembles them in that light and volatile Humour which is natural to them, than to such as are qualified to moderate and counterbalance it. It has been an old Complaint, That the Coxcomb carries it with them before the Man of Sense. When we see a Fellow loud and talkative, full of insipid Life and Laughter, we may venture to pronounce him a female Favourite. Noise and Flutter are such Accomplishments as they cannot withstand. To be short, the Passion of an ordinary Woman for a Man is nothing else but Self love diverted upon another Object. She would have the Lover a Woman in every thing but the Sex. I do not know a finer Piece of Satyr on this Part of Womankind, than those Lines of Mr Dryden,

*Our thoughtless Sex is caught by outward Form,
And empty Noise, and loves it self in Man*

This is a Source of infinite Calumnies to the Sex, as it frequently joins them to Men, who in their own Thoughts are as fine Creatures as themselves, or if they chance to be good humoured, serve only to dissipate their fortunes, inflame their Follies, and aggravate their Indiscretions.

The same female Levity is no less fatal to them after Marriage, than before. It represents to their Imaginations the faithful prudent Husband as an honest tractable [and] domestic Animal, and turns their Thoughts upon the fine gay Gentleman that laughs, sings, and dresses so much more agreeably.

As this irregular Vivacity of Temper leads astray the Hearts of ordinary Women in the Choice of their Lovers and the Treatment of their Husbands, it operates with the same pernicious Influence towards their Children, who are taught to recompense themselves in all those sublime Perfections that appear captivating in the Eye of their Mother. She admires in her Son what she loved in her Gallant, and by that means contributes all she can to perpetuate herself in a worthless Progeny.

The younger Faustina was a lively Instance of this sort of Women. Notwithstanding she was married to Marcius Aurelius, one of the greatest, wisest, and best of the Roman Emperors, she thought a common Gladiator much the prettier Gentleman, and had taken such Care to accomplish her Son Commmodus according to her own Notions of a fine Man, that when he ascended the Throne of his Father, he became the most foolish and abandoned Tyrant that was ever placed at the Head of the Roman Empire, signaling himself in nothing but the fighting of Prizes, and knocking out Men's Brains. As he had no Taste of true Glory, we see him in several Medals and Statues (which<sup>1</sup>) are still extant of him, equipped like an Hercules with a Club and a Lion's Skin.

I have been led into this Speculation by the Characters I have heard of a Country Gentleman and his Lady, who do not live many Miles from

Sir ROGER The Wife is an old Coquet, that is always hankering after the Divisions of the Town the Husband a morose Rustic, that frowns and frets at the Name of it The Wife is over-run with Affectation, the Husband sunk into Brutality The Lady cannot bear the Noise of the Larks and Nightingales, hates your tedious Summer Days, and is sick at the Sight of shady Woods and purling Streams the Husband wonders how any one can be pleased with the Fooleries of Plays and Operas, and rails from Morning to Night at essenced kops and tawdry Courtiers The Children are educated in these different Notions of their Parents The Sons follow the Father about his Grounds, while the Daughters read Volumes of Love-Letters and Romances to their Mother By this means it comes to pass, that the Girls look upon their Father as a Clown, and the Boys think their Mother no better than she should be

How different are the Lives of Aristus and Aspasia? the innocent Vivacity of the one is tempered and composed by the cheerful Gravity of the other The Wife grows wise by the Discourses of the Husband, and the Husband good-humoured by the Conversations of the Wife Aristus would not be so amiable were it not for his Aspasia, nor Aspasia so much [esteemed] were it not for her Aristus Their Virtues are blended in their Children, and diffuse through the whole Family a perpetual Spirit of Benevolence, Complacency, and Satisfaction C

GREAT Masters in Painting never care for drawing People in the Fashion, as very well knowing that the Head-dress, or Perwig, that now prevails, and gives a Grace to their Portraits at present, will make a very odd Figure, and perhaps look monstrous in the Eyes of Posterity For this Reason they often represent an illustrious Person in a Roman Habit, or in some other Dress that never varies I could wish, for the sake of my Country Friends, that there was such a kind of everlasting Drapery to be made use of by all who live at a certain distance from the Town, and that they would agree upon such Fashions as should never be liable to Changes and Innovations For want of this standing Dress, a Man [who<sup>2</sup>] takes a Journey into the Country is as much surprised, as one [who<sup>3</sup>] walks in a Gallery of old Family Pictures, and finds as great a Variety of Garbs and Habits in the Persons he converses with Did they keep to one constant Dress they would sometimes be in the Fashion, which they never are as Matters are managed at present If instead of running after the Mode, they would continue fixed in one certain Habit, the Mode would some time or other overtake them, as a Clock that stands still is sure to point right once in twelve Hours In this Case therefore I would advise them, as a Gentleman did his Friend who was hunting about the whole Town after a rambling Fellow, If you follow him you will never find him, but if you plant your self at the Corner of any one Street, I'll engage it will not be long before you see him

I have already touched upon this Subject in a Speculation [which<sup>1</sup>] shows how cruelly the Country are led astray in following the Town and equipped in a ridiculous Habit, when they fancy themselves in the Height of the Mode Since that Speculation I have received a Letter [which I there hinted at] from a Gentleman who is now in the Western Circuit

Mr SPECTATOR,

Being a Lawyer of the Middle-Temple, [as<sup>1</sup>] Cornishman by Birth, I generally ride the Western Circuit for my health, and as I am not interrupted with Clients, have leisure to make many Observations that deserve the Notice of my fellow-Travelers

One of the most fashionable Women I met with in all the Circuit was my Landlady at Stains, where I chanced to be on a Holiday Her Commode was not half a foot high, and her Petticoat within some Yards of a modish Circumference In the same Place I observed a young Fellow with a tolerable Perwig, had it not been covered with a Hat that was shraped in the Ramillie Cock As I proceeded in my Journey I observed the Petticoat grew scantier and scantier, and about threescore Miles from Leaen was so very unfashionable, that a Woman might walk in it without any manner of Inconvenience

Not far from Salisbury I took notice of a Justice of Peace's Lady [who<sup>4</sup>] was at least ten Years behindhand in her Dress, but at the same time as fine as Hands could make her She was flounced and furbelowed from Head to Foot every Ribbon was wrangled, and every Part of her Garments in Curl, so that she looked like one of those Animals which in the Country we call a New Zealand Hen

Not many Miles beyond this Place I was informed that one of the last Year's little Muffs had by some means or other straggled into those Parts, and that all Women of Fashion were cutting their old Muffs in two, or retrenching them, according to the little Model [which<sup>5</sup>] was got among them I cannot believe the Report they have there, that it was sent down fringed by a Parliament man in a little Packet, but probably by next Winter this Fashion will be at the Height in the Country, when it is quite out at London

The greatest Beau at our next Country Sessions was dressed in a most monstrous Flaxen Perwig, that was made in King William's Reign The Wearer of it goes, it seems, in his own Hair, when he is at home, and lets his Wig lie in Buckle for a whole half Year, that he may put it on upon Occasions to meet the Judges in it.

I must not here omit an Adventure [which<sup>2</sup>] happened to us in a Country Church upon the Frontiers of Corrwall. As we were in the midst of the Service, a Lady who is the chief Woman of the Place, and had passed the Winter at Lor- don with her Husband, entered the Congregation in a little Head dress, and a hoop'd Petticoat. The People, who were wonderfully startled at such a Sight, all of them rose up. Some stared at the prodigious Bottom, and some at the little Top of this strange Dress. In the next time the Lady of the Manor filled the [Area<sup>3</sup>] of the Church and walked up to her. Few with an unspeakable Satisfaction, amidst the Whispers, Conjectures, and Astonishments of the whole Congregation.

Upon our Way from hence we saw a young fellow riding towards us full Gallop, with a Bohemian Wig and a black Silken Bag tied to it. He stopt short at the Coach, to ask us how far the Judges were behind us. His Story was so very short, that we had only time to observe his new silk Waistcoat, [which<sup>3</sup>] was unbutton'd in several Places to let us see that he had a clean Shirt on, which was ruffled down to his middle.

From this Place, during our Progress through the most Western Parts of the Kingdom, we fancied ourselves in King Charles the Second's Reign, the People having made very little Variations in their Dress since that time. The smartest of the Country Squires appear still in the Monmouth Cock, and when they go a wooing [whether they have any Post in the Militia or not] they generally put on a red Coat. We were, indeed, very much surprized, at the Place we lay at last Night, to meet with a Gentleman that had accoutred himself in a Night Cap Wig, a Coat with long Pockets, and slit Sleeves, and a pair of Shoes with high Scalloped Tops, but we soon found by his Conversation that he was a Person who laughed at the Ignorance and Rusticity of the Country People, and was resolved to live and die in the Mode.

Sir, if you think this Account of my Travels may be of any Advantage to the Publick, I will next I fear trouble you with such Occurrences as I shall meet with in other Parts of England. For I am inform'd there are greater Curiosities in the Northern Circuit than in the Western, and that a Fashion makes its Progress much slower into Cumberland than into Corrwall. I have heard in particular, that the Stenkirks arrived but two Months ago at Newcastle and that there are several Commodities in those Parts which are worth taking a Journey thither to see. C

*Semperque recentes
Convectari jura prædus, et vivere rapti*—Virg

AS I was Yesterday riding out in the Fields with my Friend Sir ROGER, we saw at a little Distance from us a Troop of Gypsies. Upon the first Discovery of them, my Friend was in some doubt whether he should not exert the Justice of the Peace upon such a Brawl of Lawless Vagrants, but not having his Clerk with him, who is a necessary Counsellor on these Occasions, and fearing that his Poultry might fare the worse for it, he let the thought drop. But at the same time gave me a particular Account of the Mischiefs they do in the Country, in stealing People's Goods and spoiling their Servants. If a stray Piece of Linnen hangs upon a Hedge, says Sir ROGER, they are sure to have it, if the Hog loses his Way in the Fields, it is ten to one but he becomes their Prey, our Geese cannot live in Peace for them, if a Man prosecutes them with Severity, his Hen-roost is sure to pay for it. They generally straggle into these Parts about this time of the Year and set the Heads of our Servant-Minds so agog for Husbands, that we do not expect to have any Business done as it should be whilst they are in the Country. I have an honest Dairy-maid [who<sup>2</sup>] crosses their Hands with a Piece of Silver every Summer, and never fails being promised the handsomest young fellow in the Parish for her pains. Your Friend the Butler has been Fool enough to be seduced by them, and, though he is sure to lose a Knife, a Fork, or a Spoon every time his Fortune is told him, generally shuts himself up in the Pantry with an old Gypsy for above half an Hour once in a twelvemonth. Sweet-hearts are the things they live upon, which they bestow very plentifully upon all those that apply themselves to them. You see now and then some handsome young Jades among them. The Sluts have very often white Teeth and black Eyes.

Sir ROGER observing that I listened with great Attention to his Account of a People who were so entirely new to me, told me, That if I would they should tell us our Fortunes. As I was very well pleased with the Knight's Proposal, we rid up and communicated our Hands to them. A Cassandra of the Crew, after having examined my Ives very diligently, told me, that I loved a pretty Maid in a Corner that I was a good Woman's Man, with some other Particulars which I do not think proper to relate. My Friend Sir ROGER alighted from his Horse, and exposing his Palm to two or three that stood by him, they crumpled it into all Shapes, and diligently scanned every Wrinkle that could be made in it when one of them, [who<sup>2</sup>] was older and more Sun-burnt than the rest, told him, that he had a Widow in his Line of Life. Upon which the Knight cried, Go, go, you are an idle Baggage and at the same time smiled upon me. The Gypsy finding he was not displeased in his Heart, told him, after a farther Enquiry into his Hand, that his True-love was constant, and that she should dream of him to-night. My old Friend cried Fish, and bid her go on. The Gypsy told him that he was a Bitchelour, but would not be so long, and that he was dearer to some Body than he thought. The Knight still repeated, She was an idle Maggidge, and bid her go on. Ah Master, says the Gypsy, that rogish Leer of yours makes a pretty Woman's Heart ache. you ha'n't that Snapper about the Month for Nothing—I he uncouth Glibberish with which all this was uttered like the Darkness of an Oracle, made us the more attentive to it. To be short, the Knight left the Money with her that he had crossed her Hand with, and got up again on his Horse.

As we were riding away, Sir Roderick told me, that he knew several sensible People who believed these Gypsies now and then foretold very strange things, and for half an Hour together appeared more jocund than ordinary. In the Height of his good Humour, meeting a common Beggar upon the Road who was no Conjuror, as he went to relieve him he found his Pocket was picked. That being a Kind of Palmistry at which this Race of Vermin are very dextrous.

I might here entertain my Reader with Historical Remarks on this idle profligate People, [who] infest all the Countries of Europe, and live in the midst of Governments in a kind of Commonwealth by themselves. But instead of entering into Observations of this Nature, I shall fill the remaining Part of my Paper with a Story [which] is still fresh in Holland, and was printed in one of our Monthly Accounts about twenty Years ago. 'As the Treksehuyt, or Hackney-boat, which carries Passengers from Leyden to Amsterdam, was putting off, a Boy running along the [Side] of the Canal desired to be taken in which the Master of the Boat refused, because the Lad had not quite Money enough to pay the usual Fare. An eminent Merchant being pleased with the Looks of the Boy, and secretly touched with Compassion towards him, paid the Money for him, and ordered him to be taken on board. Upon talking with him afterwards, he found that he could speak readily in three or four Languages, and learned upon farther Examination that he had been stolen away when he was a Child by a Gypsy, and had rambled ever since with a Gang of those Strollers up and down several Parts of Europe. It happened that the Merchant, whose Heart seems to have inclined towards the Boy by a secret kind of Instinct, had himself lost a Child some Years before. His Parents, after a long Search for him, gave him for drowned in one of the Canals with which that Country abounds, and the Mother was so afflicted at the Loss of a fine Boy, who was her only Son, that she died for Grief of it. Upon lying together all Particulars, and examining the several Moles and Marks [by] which the Mother used to describe the Child [whom] he was first missing, the Boy proved to be the Son of the Merchant whose Heart had so unaccountably melted at the Sight of him. The Lad was very well pleased to find a Father [who] was so rich, and likely to leave him a good Estate. The Father on the other hand was not a little delighted to see a Son return to him, whom he had given for lost, with such a Strength of Constitution, Sharpness of Understanding, and Skill in Languages. Here the printed Story leaves off. but if I may give credit to Reports, our Language having received such extraordinary Rudiments towards a good Education, was afterwards trained up in every thing that becomes a Gentleman, wearing off by little and little all the vicious Habits and Pretences that he had been used to in the Course of his Peripatations. Nay, it is said, that he has since been employed in foreign Courts upon National Business, with great Reputation to himself and Honour to [those who sent him,] and that he has visited several Countries as a publick Minister, in which he formerly wandered as a Gypsy. IT is usual for a Man who loves Country Sports to preserve the Game in his own Grounds, and divert himself upon those that belong to his Neighbour. My Friend Sir Roderick generally goes two or three Miles from his House, and gets into the Frontiers of his Estate, before he begins about in search of [his] Hare or Partridge, on purpose to spare his own Fields, where he is always sure of finding Diversion, when the worst comes to the worst. By this Means the Breed about his House has time to encrease and multiply, besides that the Sport is the more agreeable where the Game is the harder to come at, and [where it] does not lie so thick as to produce any Perplexity or Confusion in the Pursuit. For these Reasons the Country Gentleman, like the Fox, seldom preys near his own Home.

In the same manner I have made a Month's Excursion out of the Town, which is the great Field of Game for Sports-men of my Species, to try my Fortune in the Country, where I have started several Subjects, and hunted them down, with some Pleasure to my self, and I hope to others. I am here forced to use a great deal of Diligence before I can spring my thing to my Mind whereas in Town, whilst I am following one Character, it is ten to one but I am crossed in my Way by another, and put up such a Variety of odd Creatures in both Sexes, that they soil the Scent of one another, and puzzle the Chace. My greatest Difficulty in the Country is to find Sport, and in Town to chuse it. In the mean time, as I have given a while Month's Rest to the Cities of London and Westminster, I promise my self abundance of new Game upon my return thither. It is indeed high time for me to leave the Chace.

try, since I find the whole Neighbourhood begin to grow very inquisitive after my Name and Character. My Love of Solitude, Taciturnity, and particular way of Life, having raised a great Curiosity in all these Parts.

The Notions which have been framed of me are various. Some look upon me as very proud (some as very modest) and some as very melancholy. Will Wattle, as my Friend the Butler tells me, observing me very much alone, and extremely silent when I am in Company, is afraid I have killed a Man. The Country People seem to suspect me for a Conjuror, and some of them hearing of the Visit [which] I made to Moll Whiffo, will needs have it that Sir ROGER has brought down a Cunning Man with him, to cure the old Woman and free the Country from her Charms. So that the Character which I can make in part of the Neighbourhood, is what they here call a White Witch.

A Juinee of Peace, who lives about five Miles off, and is a friend of Sir ROGER's Party, has it seems said twice or thrice at his I did, that he wishes Sir ROGER does not harbour a Jesuit in his House, and that he thinks the Gentlemen of the Country would do very well to make me give some Account of my self.

On the other side some of Sir ROGER's Friends are afraid the old Knight is imposed upon by a designing Fellow, and as they have heard that he converses very promiscuously when he is in Town, do not know but he has brought down with him some disreputable Whore, that is sullen, and says nothing because he is out of Place.

Such is the Variety of Opinions [which] are here entertained of me, so that I pass among some for a disaffected Person, and among others for a Papish Priest, among some for a Wizard, and among others for a Murderer, and all this for no other Reason, that I can imagine, but because I do not hoar and hollow and make a Noise. It is true my Friend Sir ROGER tells me, that it is my duty and that I am only a Philosopher, but [this] will not satisfy them. They think there is more in me than he discovers, and that I do not hold my Tongue for nothing.

For these and other Reasons I shall set out for London to-morrow, having found by Experience that the Country is not a Place for a Person of my Temper, who does not love Jollity, and what they call Good Neighbourhood. A Man that is out of Humour when an unexpected Guest breaks in upon him, and does not care for sacrificing an Afternoon in every Chance-comer that will be the Master of his own Time, and the Pursuer of his own Inclinations, makes but a very unseemable Figure in this kind of Life. I shall therefore retire into the Town, if I may make use of that Phrase, and get into the Crowd again as fast as I can, in order to be alone. I can there raise what Speculations I please upon others without being observed myself, and at the same time enjoy all the Advantages of Company with all the Privileges of Solitude. In the mean while, to finish the Month and conclude these my rural Speculations, I shall here insert a Letter from my Friend

WILL HORTYCOMB who has not lived a Month for these forty Years out of the Smoke of London, and rather me after his way upon my Country Life.

Dear Sir,

I Suppose that I shall find thee picking of Daisies, or smelling to a Lock of Hair, or passing away this time in some innocent Country Diversion of the like Nature. I have however Orders from the Club to summon thee up to Town, being all of us curiously afraid thou wilt not be able to resist our Company, after thy Conversations with Moll White and Will Wattle. Pray thee don't send us up any more Stories of a Cock and a Bull, nor frighten the Town with Spirits and Witches. Thy Speculations begin to smell considerably of Woods and Meadows. If thou dost not come up quickly, we shall conclude [that] thou art in Love with one of Sir ROGER's Daughters. Service to the Knight. Sir ANDREW is grown the Cock of the Club since he left us, and if he does not return quickly will mile every Mother's Son of us Common wealth's Men.

Dear Sir,

Thine Literally,

HAVING notified to my good Friend Sir ROGER that I should set out for London the next Day, his Horses were ready at the appointed Hour in the Evening, and attended by one of his Grooms, I arrived at the County-Town at twilight in order to be ready for the Stage Coach the Day following. As soon as we arrived at the Inn, the Servant who waited upon me, inquired of the Chamberlain in my Hearing what Company he had for the Coach? The Fellow answered, Mrs. Betty Trimble, the great Fortune, and the Widow her Mother, a recruiting Officer (who took a Piece because they were to go) a young Squire Quickset her Cousin (that her Mother wished her to be married to) Ephraim the Quaker, her Guardian and a Gentleman that had studied himself dumb from Sir ROGER DE COVERLY'S I observed by what he said of my self, that according to his Office he dealt much in Intelligence and doubted not but there was some Foundation for his Reports of the rest of the Company, as well as for the whimsical Account he gave of me. The next Morning at Day break we were all called, and I, who know my own natural Shyness, and endeavour to be as little liable to be disputed with as possible, dressed immediately, that I might make no one wait. The first Preparation for our Setting-out was, that the Captain's Half-Pike was placed near the Coach man, and a Drum behind the Coach. In the mean Time the Drummer, the Captain's Equipage, was very loud, that none of the Captain's things should be placed so as to be spoiled, upon which his Cloak bag was fixed in the Seat of the Coach. And the Captain himself, according to a frequent, tho' invidious Behaviour of Military Men, ordered his Man to look sharp, that none but one of the Ladies should have the Place he had taken fronting to the Coach box.

We were in some little Time fixed in our Seats, and sat with that Dislike which People not too good-natured usually conceive of each other at first Sight. The Coach jumbled us insensibly into some sort of Familiarity, and we had not moved above two Miles, when the Widow asked the Captain what Success he had in his Recruiting? The Officer, with a Frankness he believed very graceful, told her, 'That indeed he had but very little Luck, and had suffered much by Desertion, therefore should be glad to end his Warfare in the Service of her or her fair Daughter. In a Word, continued he, I am a Soldier, and to be plain is my Character. You see me, Madam, young, sound, and impudent. Take me your self, Widow, or give me to her, I will be wholly at your Disposal. I am a Soldier of Fortune, Sir!' This was followed by a run Laugh of his own, and a deep Silence of all the rest of the Company. I had nothing left for it but to fall fast asleep, which I did with all Speed. 'Come, said he, resolve upon it, we will make a Wedding at the next Town. We will wake this pleasant Companion who is fallen asleep, to be (tho' the Bride man, and' (giving the Quaker a Clap on the Knee) he concluded, 'Thus sly Sunt, who, I'll warrant, understands what's what as well as you or I, Widow, shall give the Bride as Father. The Quaker, who happened to be a Man of Smartness, answered, 'Friend, I take it in good Part that thou hast given me the Authority of a Father over this comely and virtuous Child, and I must assure thee, that if I have the giving her, I shall not bestow her on thee. Thy Birth, Friend, savour eth of Folly. Thou art a Person of a light Mind. thy Drum is a Type of thee, it soundeth because it is empty. Verily, it is not from thy Fullness, but thy Emptiness that thou hast spoken this.' Day Friend, Friend, we have hired this Coach in Partnership with thee, to carry us to the great City we cannot go any other Way. This worthy Mother must hear thee if thou wilt needs utter thy Follies we cannot help it, Friend I say if thou wilt we must hear thee. But if thou wert a Man of Understanding, thou wouldst not take Advantage of thy courageous Countenance to abash us Children of Peace. Thou art, thou sayest, a Soldier, give Quarter to us, who cannot resist thee. Why didst thou sleep at our Friend, who feigned himself asleep? he [said] nothing but how dost thou know what he containeth? If thou speakest improper things in

² [sayeth]

'the hearing of this virtuous young Virgin, consider it is an Outrage against a distressed Person that cannot get from thee. To speak indiscreetly what we are obliged to hear, by being lapsed up with thee in this publick Vehicle, is in some Degree assailing on the high Road.'

Here Ephraim paused, and the Captain with an happy and uncommon Impudence (which can be envied and support it self at the same time) cries, 'Faith, Friend, I thank thee. I should have been a little impertinent if thou hadst not reprimanded me. Come, thou art, I see, a snaky old Fellow, and I'll be very orderly, the ensuing Part of the Journey. I was [going] to give my self Aurs, but, Ladies, I beg Pardon.'

The Captain was so little out of Humour, and our Company was so far from being sowered by this little Ruffle that Ephraim and he took a particular Delight in being agreeable to each other for the future and assumed their different Provinces in the Conduct of the Company. Our Reckonings, Apartments, and Accommodation, fell under Ephraim and the Captain looked to all Disputes on the Road, as the good Behaviour of our Coachman, and the Right we had of taking Place as going to London of all Vehicles coming from thence. The Occurrences we met with were ordinary, and very little happened which could entertain by the Relation of them. But when I considered the Company we were in, I took it for no small good Fortune that the whole Journey was not spent in Impertinences, which to one Part of us might be an Entertainment, to the other a Suffering. What therefore Ephraim said when we were almost arriv'd at London, had to me an Air not only of good Understanding but good Breeding. Upon the young Lady's expressing her Satisfaction in the Journey, and declaring how delightful it had been to her, Ephraim declared himself as follows. 'There is no ordinary Part of humane Life which expresseth so much a good Mind, and a right inward Man, as his Behaviour upon meeting with Strangers, especially such as may seem the most unsuitable Companions to him. Such a Man, when he falleth in the way with Persons of Simplicity and Innocence, however knowing he may be in the Ways of Men, will not vaunt himself thereof, but will the rather hide his Superiority to them, that he may not be painful unto them. My good Friend, (continued he, turning to the Officer) thee and I are to part by and by, and peradventure we may never meet again. But be advised by a plain Man. Modes and Apparel are but Trifles to the real Man, therefore do not think such a Man as thy self terrible for thy Garb, nor such a one as me contemptible for mine. When two such as thee and I meet, with Affections as we ought to have towards each other, thou shouldst rejoice to see my perceivable Demeanour, and I should be glad to see thy Strength and Ability to protect me in it.'

*Quis Devisi ostendit pudor aut melius
Tam Chari capitis?—Hor*

THERE is a sort of Delight, which is alternately mix'd with Terror and Sorrow, in the Contemplation of Death. The Soul has its Curiosity more than ordinarily awaken'd, when it turns its Thoughts upon the Conduct of such who have behaved themselves with an Equal, a Resigned, a Cheerful, a Generous or Heroick Temper in that Extremity. We are affected with these respective Manners of Behaviour, as we secretly believe the Part of the Dying Person unimitable by our selves, or such as we imagine ourselves more particularly capable of. Men of exalted Minds march before us like Princes, and are, to the Ordinary Race of Mankind, rather Subjects for their Admiration than Example. However, there are no Ideas strike more forcibly upon our Imaginations, than those which are rais'd from Reflections upon the Exits of great and excellent Men. Innocent Men who have suffered as Criminals, tho' they were Benefactors to Human Society, seem to be Persons of the highest Distinction, among the vastly greater Number of Human Race, the Dead. When the Iniquity of the Times brought Socrates to his Execution, how great and wonderful is it to behold him, unsupported by any thing but the Testimony of his own Conscience and Conjectures of Hereafter, receive the Poison with an Air of Mirth and good Humour, and as if going on in agreeable Journey bespeak some Deity to make it fortunate.

When Phocion's good Actions had met with the like Reward from his Country, and he was led to Death with many others of his Friends, they bewailing their Fate, he walking composedly to wards the Place of Execution, how gracefully does he support his Illustrious Character to the very last Instant. One of the Rabble spitting at him as he passed, with his usual Authority he called to know if no one was ready to teach this Fellow how to behave himself. When a Poor spirited Creature that died at the same time for his Crimes bemoan'd himself unmanfully, he rebuked him with this Question, Is it no Consolation to such a Man as thou art to die with Phocion? At the Instant when he was to die, they asked him what commands he had for his Son, he answered, To forget this Injury of the Athenians. Nicoles, his Friend, under the same Sentence, desired he might drink the Potion before him. Phocion said, because he never had denied him any thing he would not even this, the most difficult Request he had ever made.

These Instances were very noble and great, and the Reflections of those Sublime Spirits had made Death to them what it is really intended to be by the Author of Nature, a Relief from a various Being ever subject to Sorrows and Difficulties.

Epamirondas, the Theban General, having re-

* From Plutarch's Life of Phocion

cived in Fight a mortal Stab with a Sword, which was left in his Body, lay in that Posture 'till he had Intelligence that his Troops [had] obtained the Victory, and then permitted it to be drawn [out], at which Instant he expressed himself in this manner, This is not the end of my Life, my Fellow-Soldiers, it is now your Epamirondas is born, who dies in so much Glory

It were an endless Labour to collect the Accounts with which all Ages have filled the World of Noble and Heroick Minds that have resigned this Being, as if the Termination of Life were but an ordinary Occurrence of it.

This common place way of Thinking I fell into from an unwar'd Endeavour to throw off a real and fresh Affliction, by turning over Books in a melancholy Mood but it is not easy to remove Grievs which touch the Heart, by applying Remedies which only entertain the Imagination. As therefore this Paper is to consist of any thing which concerns Human Life, I cannot help letting the present Subject regard what has been the last Object of my Eyes, tho' an Entertainment of Sorrow.

I went this Evening to visit a Friend, with a design to rally him, upon a Story I had heard of his intending to steal a Marriage without the Privy of us his intimate Friends and Acquaintance. I came into his Apartment with that Intimacy which I have done for very many Years, and walk'd directly into his Bed-chamber, where I found my Friend in the Agonies of Death. What could I do? The innocent Mirth in my Thoughts struck upon me like the most flagitious Wickedness. In vain called upon him he was senseless, and too far spent to have the least Knowledge of my Sorrow, or any Pain in himself. Give me leave then to transcribe my Soliloquy, as I stood by his Mother, dumb with the weight of Grief for a Son who was her Honour and her Comfort, and never till that Hour since his Birth had been an Occasion of a Moment's Sorrow to her.

'How surprising is this Change! from the Possession of vigorous Life and Strength, to be reduced in a few Hours to this fatal Extremity! Those Lips which look so pale and livid, within these few Days gave Delight to all who heard their Utterance. It was the Business, the Purpose of his Being, next to Obeying him to whom he is goug, to please and instruct, and that for no other end but to please and instruct. Kindness was the Motive of his Actions, and with all the Capacity requisite for making a Figure in a contentious World, Moderation, Good-Nature, Affability, Temperance and Chastity, were the Arts of his Excellent Life. There as he lies in helpless Agony, no Wise Man who knew him so well as I, but would resign all the World can bestow to be so near the end of such a Life. Why does my Heart so little obey my Reason as to lament thee, thou excellent Man?—Heaven receive him, or restore him.—'

* This friend was Stephen, son of Edmund Clay, his brother Stephen Clay was of the Inner Temple, and called to the bar in 1700.

'Thy beloved Mother, thy obliged Friends, thy helpless Servants, stand around thee without Distinction How much wouldst thou, boast thou thy Senses, say to each of us

'But now that good Heart bursts, and he is at rest—with that Breath expired a Soul who never indulged a Passion unfit for the Place he is gone to Where are now thy Plans of Justice, of Truth, of Honour? Of what use the Volumes thou hast collated, the Arguments thou hast invented, the Examples thou hast followed Poor were the Expectations of the Studious, the Modest and the Good, if the Reward of their Labours were only to be expected from Man No, my Friend, thy intended Pleadings, thy intended good Offices to thy Friends, thy intended Services to thy Country, are already performed (as to thy Concern in them) in his Sight before whom the Past, Present, and Future appear at one View While others with thy Talents were tormented with Ambition, with Van-glory, with Envy, with Emulation, how well didst thou turn thy Mind to its own Improvement in things out of the Power of Fortune, in Probity, in Integrity, in the Practice and Study of Justice how silent thy Passage, how private thy Journey, how glorious thy End! Many have I known more Famous, some more Knowing, not one so Innocent! R

Word, and represents the His and Her of our Forefathers. There is no doubt but the Ear of a Foreigner, which is the best Judge in this Case, would very much disapprove of such Innovations, which indeed we do our selves in some measure, by retaining the old Form of Words in Writing, and in all the solemn Offices of our Religion.

As in the Instances I have given we have epitomized many of our particular Words to the Detriment of our Tongue, so on other Occasions we have drawn two Words into one, which has likewise very much untuned our Language, and elogged it with Consonants, as mayn't, can't, shan't, won't, and the like, for may not, can not, shall not, will not, &c.

It is perhaps this Humour of speaking no more than we needs must, which has so miserably curtailed some of our Words, that in familiar Writings and Conversations they often lose all but their first Syllables, as in nob res pos vrog and the like, and as all ridiculous Words make their first Entry into a Language by familiar Phrases, I dare not answer for these that they will not in time be looked upon as a part of our Tongue. We see some of our Poets have been so indiscreet as to imitate Hudibras's Doggrel Expressions in their serious Compositions, by throwing out the Signs of our Substantives, which are essential to the English Language. Nay, this Humour of shortning our Language had once run so far, that some of our celebrated Authors, among whom we may reckon Sir Roger L'Estrange in particular, began to prune their Words of all superfluous Letters, as they termed them, in order to adjust the Spelling to the Pronunciation which would have confounded all our Etymologies, and have quite destroyed our Tongue.

We may here likewise observe that our proper Names, when familiarized in English, generally dwindle to Monosyllables, whereas in other modern Languages they receive a softer Turn on this Occasion, by the Addition of a new Syllable. Nick in Italian is Nicolini, Jack in French Jaquet, and so of the rest.

There is another Particular in our Language which is a great Instance of our Frugality of Words, and that is the suppressing of several Particles which must be produced in other Tongues to make a Sentence intelligible. This often perplexes the best Writers, when they find the Relations whom, which, or they at their Mercy whether they may have Admission or not and will never be decided till we have something like an Academy, that by the best Authorities and Rules drawn from the Analogy of Languages shall settle all Controversies between Grammar and Idiom.

I have only considered our Language as it shows the Genius and natural Temper of the English, which is modest, thoughtful and sincere, and which perhaps may recommend the People, though it has spoiled the Tongue. We might perhaps carry the same I thought into other Languages, and deduce a greater Part of what is peculiar to them from the Genius of the People who speak them. It is certain, the light talkative Humour of the French has not a little infected their Tongue, which might be shown by many Instances, as the Genius of the Italians, which is so much addicted to Musick and Ceremony, has moulded all their Words and Phrases to those particular Uses. The Statelyness and Gravity of the Spaniards shews itself to Perfection in the Solemnity of their Language, and the blunt honest Humour of the Germans sounds better in the Roughness of the Hugh Dutel, than it would in a politer Tongue. ACCORDING to the Request of this strange Fellow, I shall Print the following Letter

MR SPECTATOR,

'I shall without any manner of Preface or Apology acquaint you, that I am, and ever have been from my Youth upward, one of the greatest Liars this Island has produced. I have read all the Moralists upon the Subject, but could never find any Effect their Discourses had upon me, but to add to my Misfortune by new Thoughts and Ideas, and making me more ready in my Language, and capable of sometimes mixing seeming Truths with my Improbabilities. With this strong Passion towards Falshood in this kind, there does not live in honestest Man or a sincerer Friend, but my Imagination runs away with me, and whatever is started I have such a Scene of Adventures appears in an Instant before me, that I cannot help uttering them, tho', to my immediate Confusion, I cannot but know I am liable to be detected by the first Man I meet.

'Upon occasion of the mention of the Battel of Pultown, I could not forbear giving an Account of a Kinsman of mine, a young Merchant who was bred at Mosco, that had too much Merit to attend Books of Entries and Accounts, when there was so active a Scene in the Country where he resided, and followed the Czar as a Volunteer. This warm Youth, born at the Instant the thing was spoke of, was the Man who unhorsed the Suedish General, he was the Occasion that the Moscovites kept their fire in so soldier like a manner, and brought up those Troops which were covered from the Enemy at the beginning of the Dry, besides this, he had at last the good Fortune to be the Man who took Count Peper. With all this Fire I knew my Cousin to be the Civillest Creature in the World. He never made any impertinent Show of his Valour, and then he had an excellent Genius for the World in every other kind. I had Letters from him (here I felt in my Pocket) that exactly spoke the Czar's Character, which I knew [perfectly<sup>2</sup>] well and I could not forbear concluding, that I lay with his Imperial Majesty twice or thrice a Week all the while he lodged at Deftford.<sup>3</sup> What is worse than all this, it is

IT is no small Concern to me that I find so many Complaints from that Part of Mankind whose Portion it is to live in Servitude, that those whom they depend upon will not allow them to be even as happy as their Condition will admit of. I here are, as these unhappy Correspondents inform me, Masters who are offended at a cheerful Countenance, and think a Servant is broke loose from them, if he does not preserve the utmost Awe in their Presence. There is one who says, if he looks satisfied, his Master asks him what makes him so pert this Morning if a little sour, Hark ye, Sirrah, are not you paid your Wages? The poor Creatures live in the most extreme Misery together. The Master knows not how to preserve Respect, nor the Servant how to give it. It seems this Person is of so sullen a Nature, that he knows but little Satisfaction in the midst of a plentiful Fortune, and secretly frets to see any Appearance of Content, in one that lives upon the hundredth Part of his Income, who is unhappy in the Possession of the Whole. Unhappy Persons, who cannot possess their own Minds, vent their Spleen upon all who depend upon them which, I think, is expressed in a lively manner in the following Letters.

SIR,

August 2, 1711

'I have read your Spectator of the third of the last Month, and wish I had the Happiness of being preferred to serve so good a Master as Sir ROGER. The Character of my Master is the very Reverse of that good and gentle Knight's. All his Directions are given, and his Mind revealed, by way of Contraries. As when any thing is to be remembered, with a peculiar Cast of Face he cries, Be sure to forget now. If I am to make haste back, Don't come these two Hours, be sure to call by the Way upon some of your Companions. Then another excellent Way of his is, if he sets me any thing to do, which he knows must necessarily take up half a Day, he calls ten times in a Quarter of an Hour to know whether I have done yet. This is his Manner, and the same Perverseness runs through all his Actions, according as the Circumstances vary. Besides all this, he is so suspicious, that he submits himself to the Drudgery of a Spy. He is as unhappy himself as he makes his Servants. He is constantly watching us, and we differ no more in Pleasure and Liberty than as a Gaoles and a Prisoner. He lays Traps for Faults, and no sooner makes a Discovery, but falls into such Language, as I am more ashamed of for coming from him, than for being directed to me. This, Sir, is a short Sketch of a Master I have served upwards of nine Years, and tho' I have never wronged him, I confess my Despair of pleasing him has very much abated my Endeavour to do it. If you will give me leave to steal a Sentence out of my Master's Charadon, I shall tell you my Case in a Word, Being used worse than I deserved, I cared less to deserve well than I had done

I am, SIR,

Your Humble Servant,

RALPH VALET

Dear Mr SIECTER,

'I am the next thing to a Lady's Woman, and am under both my Lady and her Woman. I am so used by them both, that I should be very glad to see them in the SIECTER. My Lady herself is of no Mind in the World, and for that Reason her Woman is of twenty Minds in a Moment. My Lady is one that never knows what to do with herself, she pulls on and puts off every thing she wears twenty times before she resolves upon it for that Day. I stand at one end of the Room, and reach things to her Woman. When my Lady asks for a thing, I hear and have half brought it, when the Woman meets me in the middle of the Room to receive it, and at that instant she says No she will not have it. I then go back, and her Woman comes up to her, and by this time she will have that and two or three things more in an instant. The Woman and I run to each other. I am loaded and delivering the things to her, when my Lady says she wants none of all these things, and we are the dullest Creatures in the World, and she the unhappiest Woman living, for she shan't be dressed in any time. Thus we stand not knowing what to do, when our good Lady with all the Patience in the World tells us as plain as she can speak, that she will have Temper because we have no manner of Understanding, and begins again to dress, and see if we can find out of our selves what we are to do. When she is dressed she goes to Dinner, and after she has dished every thing there, she calls for the Coach, then commands it in again, and then she will not go out at all, and then will go too, and orders the Chariot. Now, good Mr SIECTER, I desire you would in the Behalf of all who serve froward Ladies, give out in your Paper, that nothing can be done without allowing Time for it, and that one cannot be back again with what one was sent for if one is called back before one can go a Step for that they want. And if you please let them know that all Mistresses are as like as all Servants.

I am

Your Loving Friend,

PATIENCE GIDDY

These are great Calamities, but I met the other Day in the five Fields towards Chelsea, a pleasanter Fellow than either of the above represented. A fat Fellow was pulling on in his open Waistcoat, a Boy of fourteen in a Livery, carrying after him his Clerk, upper Coat, Hat, Wig, and Sword. The poor Lad was ready to sink with the Weight, and could not keep up with his Master, who turned back every half Furlong, and wondered what made the lazy Young Dog lag behind.

There is something very unaccountable, that People cannot put themselves in the Condition of the Persons below them, when they consider the Commands they give. But there is nothing more common, than to see a Fellow (who if he were reduced to it, would not be hired by any Man living) lament that he is troubled with the most worthless Dogs in Nature.

It would, perhaps, be running too far out of common Life to urge, that he who is not Master of himself and his own Passions, cannot be a proper Master of another. Equanimity in a Man's own Words and Actions, will easily diffuse it self through his whole Family. Pamphilo has the happiest Household of any Man I know, and that proceeds from the humane regard he has to them in their private Persons, as well as in respect that they are his Servants. If there be any Occasion, wherein they may in themselves be supposed to be to attend their Master's Concerns, by reason of an Attention to their own, he is so good as to place himself in their Condition. I thought it very becoming in him, when at Dinner the other Day he made an Apology for want of more Attendants. He said, One of my Footmen is gone to the Wedding of his Sister, and the other I don't expect to wait, because his Father died but two Days ago.

Utitur in re non Dubia testis est: ot. necessarius

ONE meets now and then with Persons who are extremely learned and knotty in Expounding clear Cases. Tully tells us of an Author that spent some Pages to prove that Cicero's could not perform the great Enterprizes which have made them so illustrious, if they had not had Men. He asserted also, it seems, that a Minister at home, no more than a Commander abroad, could do any thing without other Men were his Instruments and Assistants. On this Occasion he produces the Example of Themistocles, Pericles, Cyrus, and Alexander himself, whom he denies to have been capable of effecting what they did, except they had been followed by others. It is pleasant enough to see such Persons contend without Opponents, and triumph without Victory.

The Author above mentioned by the Orator, is placed for ever in a very ridiculous Light, and we meet every Day in Conversation such as deserve the same kind of Renown, for troubling those with whom they converse with the like Certainties. The Persons that I have always thought to deserve the highest Admiration in this kind are your ordinary Story tellers, who are most religiously careful of keeping to the Truth in every particular Circumstance of a Narration, whether it concern the main End or not. A Gentleman whom I had the Honour to be in Company with the other Day, upon some Occasion that he was pleased to tale, said, He remembered a very pretty Repartee made by a very witty Man in King Charles's time upon the like Occasion. I remember (said he, upon entering into the Tale) much about the time of Oates's Plot, that a Cousin-German of mine and I were at the Bear in Holborn. No, I am out, it was at the Cross Keys, but Jack Thompson was there, for he was very great with the Gentlemen who made the Answer. But I am sure it was spoken some where thereabouts, for we drank a Bottle in that Neighbourhood every Evening. But no matter for all that, the thing is the same but—

He was going on to settle the Geography of the Jest when I left the Room, wondering at this odd turn of Head which can play away its Words, with uttering nothing to the Purpose, still observing its own Impertinencies, and yet proceeding in them. I do not question but he informed the rest of his Audience, who had more Patience than I, of the Birth and Parentage, as well as the Collateral Alliances of his Family who made the Repartee, and of him who provoked him to it.

It is no small Misfortune to any who have a just Value for their Time, when this Quality of being so very Circumstantial, and careful to be exact, happens to shew it self in a Man whose Quality obliges them to attend his Proofs, that it is now Dry, and the like. But this is augmented when the same Genius gets into Authority, as it often does. Nay I have known it more than once ascend the very Pulpit. One of this sort taking in his Head to be a great Admirer of Dr Tillotson and Dr Beveridge, never failed of proving out of these great Authors Things which no Man living would have denied him upon his [own] single Authority. One Day resolving to come to the Point in hand, he said, According to that excellent Divine, I will enter upon the Matter, or in his Words, in the fifteenth Sermon of the Folio Edition, Page 160.

I shall briefly explain the Words, and then consider the Matter contained in them.

This honest Gentleman needed not, one would think, strain his Modesty so far as to alter his Design of Entering into the Matter, to that of Briefly explaining. But so it was that he would not even be contented with that Authority, but added also the other Divine to strengthen his Method, and told us, With the Pious and Learned Dr Beveridge, Page 4th of his 9th Volume, I shall endeavour to make it as plain as I can from the Words which I have now read, wherein for that Purpose we shall consider—This Wiserere was reckoned by the Fash, who did not understand him, a most excellent Preacher, but that he read too much, and was so Humble that he did not trust enough to his own Parts.

Next to these ingenious Gentlemen, who argue for what no body can deny them, are to be ranked a sort of People who do not indeed attempt to prove insignificant things, but are ever labouring to ruse Arguments with you about Matters you will give up to them without the least Controversy. One of these People told a Gentleman who said he saw Mr such a one go this Morning at nine a Clock towards the Gravel-Pits, Sir, I must beg your pardon for that, for tho' I am very loath to have any Dispute with you, yet I must take the liberty to tell you it was nine when I saw him at St James's. When Men of this Genius are pretty far gone in Learning they will put you to prove that Snow is white, and when you are upon that Topick can say that there is really no such thing as Colour in Nature in a Word, they can turn what little Knowledge they have into a ready Capacity of rusing Doubts into a Capacity of being always frivolous and always unanswerable. It was of two Disputants of this impudent and laborious kind that the Cynick said, One of these Fellows is Milking a Ram, and the other holds the Pail

Vera Gloria radices agit, atque etiam profugatur. Ficta omnia celeriter, tanquam flosculi, decidunt, nec simulatam potest quidquam esse duritumum.—Jull

OF all the Affections which attend Human Life, the Love of Glory is the most Ardent. According as this is Cultivated in Princes, it produces the greatest Good or the greatest Evil. Where Sovereigns have it by Impressions received from Education only, it creates an Ambitious rather than a Noble Mind: where it is the natural Bent of the Prince's Inclination, it prompts him to the Pursuit of Things truly Glorious. The two greatest Men now in Europe (according to the common Acceptation of the Word Great) are Lewis King of France, and Peter Emperor of Russia. As it is certain that all Fame does not arise from the Practice of Virtue, it is, methinks, no unpleasing Amusement to examine the Glory of these Potentates, and distinguish that which is empty, perishing, and frivolous, from what is solid, lasting, and important. Lewis of France had his Infancy attended by Crafty and Worldly Men, who made Extent of Territory the most glorious [Instance<sup>1</sup>] of Power, and mistook the spreading of Fame for the Acquisition of Honour. The young Monarch's Heart was by such Conversation easily deluded into a Fondness for vain glory, and upon these unjust Principles to form or fall in with suitable Projects of Invasion, Rapine, Murder, and all the Guilt that attend War when it is unjust. At the same time this Tyranny was hid, Sciences and Arts were encouraged in the most generous Manner, as if Men of higher Faculties were to be bribed to permit the Massacre of the rest of the World. Every Superstructure which the Court of France built upon their first Designs, which were in themselves vicious, was suitable to its false Foundation. The Ostentation of Riches, the Vanity of Equipage, Shrieks of Poverty, and Ignominy of Modesty, were the common Arts of Life. The generous Love of one Woman was changed into Gallantry for all the Sex, and Friendships among Men turned into Commercials of Interest, or mercenary Professions. While these were the Rules of Life, Perjuries in the Prince, and a general Corruption of Manners in the Subject, were the Snarls in which France has Et tangled all her Neighbours. With such false Colours have the Eyes of Lewis been enchanted, from the Debauchery of his early Youth, to the Supposition of his present old Age. Hence it is, that he has the Pretence to have Statues erected to his Prowess, his Valour, his Fortitude, and in the Softness and Luxury of a Court, to be applauded for Magnanimity and Enterprise in Military Achievements.

Peter Alexievitch of Russia, when he came to Years of Manhood, though he found himself Emperor of a vast and numerous People, Master of an endless Territory, absolute Commander of the Lives and Fortunes of his Subjects, in the midst of this unbounded Power and Greatness turned his Thoughts upon Himself and People with Sorrow. Sordid Ignorance and a Brute Manner of Life this Generous Prince beheld and contemned from the Light of his own Genius. His Judgment suggested this to him, and his Courage prompted him to amend it. In order to this he did not send to the Nation from whence the rest of the World has borrowed its Politeness, but himself left his Diadem to learn the true Way to Glory and Honour, and Application to useful Arts, wherein to employ the Laborious, the Simple, the Honest part of his People. Mechanical Employments and Operations were very justly the first Objects of his Labour and Observation. With this glorious Intention he travelled into Foreign Nations in an obscure Manner, above receiving little Honours where he sojourned, but prying into what was of more Consequence, their Arts of Peace and of War. By this means has this great Prince laid the Foundation of a great and lasting Fame, by 'Authors, whose Merit in some respects has given a Satisfaction to their Faults in others. Thus the Imitators of Milton seem to place all the Excellency of that sort of Writing either in the uncouth or antique Words, or something else which was highly vicious, tho' pardonable, in that Great Man. The Admirers of what we call Point, or Turn, look upon it as the particular Happiness to which Corley, Ovid and others owe their Reputation, and therefore imitate them only in such Instances what is Just, Proper and Natural does not seem to be the Question with them, but by what means a quaint Antithesis may be brought about, how one Word may be made to look two Ways, and what will be the Consequence of a forced Allusion. Now tho' such Authors appear to me to resemble those who make themselves fine, instead of being well dressed or graceful, yet the Mischief is, that these Beauties in them, which I call Blemishes, are thought to proceed from Luxuriance of Fancy and Overflowing of good Sense. In one word, they have the Character of being too Witty, but if you would acquaint the World they are not Witty at all, you would, among many others, oblige,

Thus put me upon reflecting on the many Viscarrages which happen in Conversations over Wine, when Men go to the Bottle to remove such Humours as it only stir up and warrens. Thus I could not attribute more to any thing than to the Humour of putting Company upon others which Men do not like themselves. IN the present Impudence of the Town, I have

'that the Witches are a Part of the Story it self, as we find it very particularly related in Hector Boetius, from whom he seems to have taken it. This therefore is a proper Machine where the Business is dark, horrid, and bloody but is extremely foreign from the Affair of Comedy. Subjects of this kind, which are in themselves disagreeable, can at no time become entertaining, but by passing through an Imagination like Shakespeare's to form them, for which Reason Mr Dryden would not allow even Beaumont and Fletcher capable of imitating him

But Shakespeare's Magic could not copy'd be, Within that Circle none durst walk but He<sup>x</sup>

'I should not, however, have troubled you with these Remarks, if there were not something else in this Comedy, which wants to be excoriated more than the Witches. I mean the Freedom of some Passages, which I should have overlook'd, if I had not observed that those Jest can raise the loudest Mirth, though they are painful to right Sense and an Outrage upon Modesty.

'We must attribute such Liberties to the Taste of that Age, but indeed by such Representations a Poet sacrifices the best Part of his Audience to the worst and, as one would think, neglects the Boves, to write to the Orange Witches.

'I must not conclude till I have taken notice of the Moral with which this Comedy ends. The two young Ladies living, given a notable Example of outwitting those who had a Right in the Disposal of them, and marrying without Consent of Parents, one of the unjust Parties, who is easily reconciled, winds up all with this Remark,

Here is a Tale which over rules us still

'We are to suppose that the Gallants are Men of Merit, but if they had been Rakes the License might have serv'd as well. Hans Carvel's Wife<sup>2</sup> was of the same Principle, but has express'd it with a Delicacy which shews she is not serious in her License, but in a sort of humorous Philosophy turns off the Thought of her Guilt, and says,

*That if weak Women go astray,
Her Stars are more in fault than they*

'This, no doubt, is a full Reparation, and dis-misses the Audience with very edifying Impressions.

'These things fall under a Province you have partly pursued already, and therefore demand your Annidversion, for the regulating so Noble an Entertainment as that of the Stage. It were to be wished, that all who write for it hereafter would raise their Genius, by the Ambition of pleasing People of the best Understanding, and leave others who show nothing of the Human Species but Risibility, to seek their Diversion at the Bear Garden, or some other Privileged Place,

THE following Letters being Genuine,<sup>1</sup> and the Images of a Worthy Passion, I am willing to give the old Lady's Admonition to my self, and the Representation of her own Happiness, a Place in my Writings

Mr SPECTATOR, August 9, 1711

'I am now in the sixty seventh Year of my Age, and read you with Approbation but methinks you do not strike at the Root of the greatest Evil in Life, which is the false Notion of Gallantry in Love. It is, and has long been, upon a very ill Foot but I who have been a Wife Forty Years, and was bred in a way that has made me ever since very happy, see through the Folly of it. In a Word, Sir, when I was a young Woman, all who avoided the Vices of the Age were very carefully educated, and all fantastical Objects were turned out of our Sight. The Tapestry Hangings, with the great and venerable Simplicity of the Scripture Stories, had better Effects than now the Loves of Venus and Adonis or Bacchus and Ariadne in your fine present Prints. The Gentleman I am married to made Love to me in Rapture, but it was the Rapture of a Christian and a Man of Honour, not a Romantick Hero or a Whining Coxcomb. Thus put our Life upon a right Basis. To give you an Idea of our Regard one to another, I enclose to you several of his Letters, writ Forty Years ago, when my Lover, and our writt other Day, after so many Years Cohabitation

Your Servant,
Andromache

Madam, August 7, 1671

'If my Vigilance and ten thousand Wishes for your Welfare and Repose could have any force, you last Night slept in Security, and had every good Angel in your Attendance. I have my Thoughts ever fixed on you, to live in constant Fear of every Accident to which Human Life is liable, and to send up my hourly Prayers to avert them from you. I say, Madam, thus to think, and thus to suffer, is what I do for Her who is in Pain at my Approach, and calls all my tender Sorrow impertinence. You are now before my Eyes, my Eyes that are ready to flow with Tenderness, but cannot give relief to my gushing

<sup>1</sup> They are, after the first, with a few changes of phrase and the alteration of date proper to the design of this paper, copies of Steele's own love-letters addressed to Mrs Scurllock, in August and September, 1707, except the first, a recent one, written since marriage

'Heart, that dictates what I am now Saying, and yearns to tell you all its Achings How art thou, oh my Soul, stoln from thy self! How is all thy Attention broken! My Books are blank Paper, and my Friends Intruders I have no hope of Quiet but from your Pity, To grant it, would make more for your Triumph To give Pain is the Tyranny, to make Happy the true Empire of Beauty If you would consider aright, you'd find an agreeable Change in dismissing the Attendance of a Slave, to receive the Complaisance of a Companion I bear the former in hopes of the latter Condition As I live in Chains without murmuring at the Power which inflicts 'em, so I could enjoy Freedom without forgetting the Mercy that gave it.

MADAM, I am

Your most devoted, most obedient Servant

That I made him no Declarations in his Favour, you see he had Hopes of Me when he writ this in the Month following

Madam,

September 3, 1671

'Before the Light this Morning dawned upon the Earth I awaked, and lay in Expectation of its return, not that it cou'd give any new Sense of Joy to me, but as I hoped it would bless you with its cheerful Face, after a Quiet which I wish'd you last Night If my Prayers are heard, the Day appeared with all the Influence of a Merciful Creator upon your Person and Actions Let others, my lovely Charming, talk of a blind Being that disposes their Hearts, I condemn their low Images of Love I have not a Thought which relates to you, that I cannot with Confidence beseech the All-seeing Power to bless me in May he direct you in all your Steps, and reward your Innocence, your Sincerity of Manners, your Prudent Youth, and becoming Piety, with the Continuance of his Grace and Protection This is an unusual Language to Ladies, but you have a Mind elevated above the giddy Motions of a Sex unwearied by Flattery, and misled by a false and short Adoration into a solid and long Contempt Beauty, my fairest Creature, falls in the Possession, but I love also your Mind, your Soul is as dear to me as my own, and if the Advantages of a liberal Education, some Knowledge, and as much Contempt of the World, join'd with the Endeavour towards a Life of strict Virtue and Religion, can qualify me to raise new Ideas in a Breast so well disposed as yours is, our Days will pass away with Joy and old Age, instead of introducing melancholy Prospects of Decay, give us hope of Eternal Youth in a better Life I have but few Minutes from the Duty of my Employment to write in, and without time to read over what I have writ, therefore beseech you to pardon the first Hints of my Mind, which I have expressed in so little Order

I am, dearest Creature,

Your most Obedient,
most Devoted Servant

The two next were written after the Day of our Marriage was fix'd.

Madam,

September 25, 1671

'It is the hardest thing in the World to be in

'Love, and yet attend Business As for me, all that speak to me find me out, and I must lock myself up, or other People will do it for me A Gentleman asked me this Morning what News from Holland, and I answered, She's Exquisitely handsome Another desir'd to know when I had been last at Windsor, I reply'd, She designs to go with me Prudence, allow me at least to kiss your Hand before the appointed Day, that my Mind may be in so ne Composure Methinks I could write a Volume to you, but all the Language on Earth would fail in saying how much, and with what dis interested Passion,

I am ever Yours

September 30, 1671

Dear Creature, Seven in the Morning

'Next to the Influence of Heaven, I am to thank you that I see the returning Day with Pleasure. To pass my Evenings in so sweet a Conversation, and have the Esteem of a Woman of your Merit, has in it a Purity of Happiness no more to be express'd than return'd But I am, my lovely Creature, contented to be on the obliged Side, and to employ all my Days in new Endeavours to convince you and all the World of the Sense I have of your Condescension in Chusing,

MADAM, Your Most Faithful,

Most Obedient Humble Servant

He was, when he writ the following Letter, as agreeable and pleasant a Man as any in England

Madam,

October 20, 1671

'I Beg Pardon that my Paper is not finer, but I am forced to write from a Coffee-house where I am attending about Business. There is a dirty Crowd of Busy Faces all round me talking of Money, while all my Ambition, all my Wealth is Love Love which unmutes my Heart, softens my Humour, enlarges my Soul, and affects every Action of my Life 'Tis to my lovely Charming I owe that many noble Ideas are continually affix'd to my Words and Actions 'Tis the natural Effect of that generous Passion to create in the Admirer some Similitude of the Object admired thus, my Dear, in every Day to improve from so sweet a Companion Look up, my Fair One, to that Heaven which made thee such, and join with me to explore its Influence on our tender innocent Hours, and beseech the Author of Love to bless the Kites he has ordn'd, and mingle with our Happiness a just Sense of our transient Condition, and a Resignation in his Will, which only can regulate our Minds to a steady Endeavour to please him and each other

I am, for Ever,
Your Faithful Servant

I will not trouble you with more Letters at this time, but if you saw the poor wretched Hand which sends you these Minutes, I am sure you will smile to think that there is one who is so gallant as to speak of it still as so welcome a Present, after I or your Years Possession of the Woman whom he writes to

Madam,

Nov 23, 1711

'I heartily beg your Pardon for my Omission to write yesterday It was no failure of my

'tender Regard for you but having been very much perplexed in my Thoughts on the Subject of my List, made me determine to suspend speaking of it till I came to myself. But, my Lovely Creature, know it is not in the Power of Age, or Misfortune, or any other Accident which hangs over Human Life, to take from me the pleasing Esteem I have for you, or the Memory of the bright Figure you appeared in when you gave your Hand and Heart to,

MADAM,

Your most Grateful Husband, and Obedient Servant

Non est vivere sed valere Vita — MURIEL

IT is an unreasonable thing some Men expect of their Acquaintance. They are ever complaining that they are out of Order, or Displeased, or they know not how, and are so far from letting that be a Reason for retiring to their own Homes, that they make it their Argument for coming into Company. What has any body to do with Accounts of a Man's being Indispos'd but his Physician? If a Man laments in Company, where the rest are in Humour enough to enjoy themselves, he should not take it ill if a Servant is ordered to present him with a Porringer of Cowdrie or Posset drink, by way of Admonition that he go Home to Bed. That Part of Life which we ordinarily understand by the Word Conversation, is an Indulgence to the Sociable Part of our Make and should incline us to bring our Proportion of good Will or good Humour among the Friends we meet with, and not to trouble them with Relations which must of necessity oblige them to a real or feigned Affliction. Cares, Distresses, Diseases, Uneasinesses and Dislikes of our own, are by no means to be obtruded upon our Friends. If we would consider how little of this Vicissitude of Motion and Rest, which we call Life, is spent with Satisfaction, we should be more tender of our Friends, than to bring them little Sorrows which do not belong to them. There is no real Life but cheerful Life: therefore Voluntary Sorrows should be sworn before they enter into Company, not to say a Word of themselves till the Meeting breaks up. It is not here pretended, that we should be always [sitting] with Chaplets of Flowers round our Heads, or be crowned with Roses, in order to make our Entertainment agreeable to us, but if (as it is usually observed) they who resolve to be Merry seldom are so, it will be much more unlikely for us to be well-pleased, if they are admitted who are always complaining they are sad. Whatever we do we should keep up the Cheerfulness of our Spirits, and never let them sink below an Inclination at least to be well pleased. The Way to this, is to keep our Bodies in Exercise, our Minds at Ease. That insipid State wherein neither are in Vigour, is not to be accounted any part of our Portion of Being. When we are in the Satisfaction of some Innocent Pleasure, or Pursuit of some laudable Design, we are in the Possession of Life, of Human Life. Fortune will give us Disappointments enough, and Nature is attended with Infirmities enough, without our adding to the unhappy Side of our Account by our Spleen or ill Humour. Poor Cottius, among so many real Evils, a Chronical Distemper and a narrow Fortune, is never heard to complain. That equal Spirit of his, which my Man may have, that, like him, will conquer Pride, Vanity and Affectation, and follow Nature, is not to be broken, because it has no Points to contend for. To be anxious for nothing but what Nature demands is necessary, if it is not the Way to an Estate, is the Way to what Men aim at by getting an Estate. His Temper will preserve Health in the Body, as well as Tranquility in the Mind. Cottius sees the World in a Hurry, with the same Scorn that a Sober Person sees a Man Drunk. Had he been contented with what he ought to have been, how could, says he, such a one have met with such a Disappointment? If another had valued his Mistress for what he ought to have loved her, he had not been in her Power. If her Virtue had had a Part of his Passion, her Levity had been his Cure, she could not then have been false and variable at the same time.

Since we cannot promise ourselves constant Health, let us endeavour at such a Temper as may be our best Support in the Decay of it. Uranus has arrived at that Composure of Soul, and wrought himself up to such a Neglect of every thing with which the Generality of Mankind is enhearted, that nothing but acute Pains can give him Disturbance, and against those too he will tell his intimate Friends he has a Secret which gives him present Ease. Uranus is so thoroughly persuaded of another Life, and endeavours so sincerely to secure an Interest in it that he looks upon Pain but as a quickening of his Pace to an Home, where he shall be better provided for than in his present Apartment. Instead of the melancholy Views which others are apt to give themselves, he will tell you that he has forgot he is Mortal, nor will he think of himself as such. He thinks at the Time of his Birth he entered into an Eternal Being, and the short Article of Death he will not allow an Interruption of Life, since that Moment is not of half the Duration as is his ordinary Sleep. This is his Being one uniform and consistent Series of cheerful Divisions and moderate Cares, without Fear or Hope of Futurity. Health to him is more than Pleasure to another Man, and Sickness less affecting to him than in disposition is to others.

I must confess, if one does not regard Life after this manner, none but Ideots can pass it away with any tolerable Patience. Take a Fine Lady who is of a Delicate Frame, and you may observe from the Hour she rises a certain Weariness of all that passes about her. I know more than one who is much too nice to be quite alive. They are sick of such strange frightful People that they meet, one is so awkward, and another so disagreeable, that it looks like a Penance to breathe the same Air with them. You see this is so very true, that a great Part of Ceremony and Good breeding among Ladies turns upon their Uneasiness, and I'll undertake, if the How d'ye Servants of our Women were to make a Weekly Bill of Sickness, as the Parish Clerks do of Mortality, you would not find in an Account of seven Days, nine in thirty that was not downright Sick or indisposed, or but a very little better than she was, and so forth.

It is certain that to enjoy Life and Health is a constant I erst, we should not think Pleasure necessary, but, if possible, to arrive at an Equality of Mind. It is as mean to be overjoyed upon Occasions of Good Fortune, as to be dejected in Circumstances of Distress. Laughter in one Condition is as unmanly as Weeping in the other. We should not form our Minds to expect Transport on every Occasion, but know how to make it Enjoyment in the out of Pain. Ambition, Envy, vaingrant Desire, or impertinent Mirth will take up our Minds, without we can possess our selves in that Sobriety of Heart which is above all Pleasures, and can be felt much better than described. But the ready Way, I believe, to the right Enjoyment of Life, is by a Prospect towards nothing to live but a very mean Opinion of it. A great Author of our Time has set this in an excellent Light, when with a Philosophick Pity of Human Life, he spoke of it in his Theory of the Earth,<sup>1</sup> in the following manner.

For what is this Life but a Circulation of little mean Actions? We lie down and rise again, dress and undress, feed and wax hungry, root or play, and are w array, and then we lie down again, and the Circle returns. We spend the Day in Trifles, and when the Night comes we throw ourselves into the Bed of Folly, amongst Dreams and broken Thoughts, and wild Imaginations. Our Reason lies asleep by us, and we are for the Time as arrant Brutes as those that sleep in the Stalls or in the Field. Are not the Capacities of Man higher than these? And ought not his Ambitions and Expectations to be greater? Let us be Adventurers for another World 'Tis at least a fair and noble Chance, and there is nothing in this worth our Thoughts or our Passions. If we should be disappointed, we are still no worse than the rest of our Fellow-Mortals: and if we succeed in our Expectations, we are Eternally Happy.

— Notis quam elegans formatus Spectator sicut — 1er

BEAUTY has been the Delight and Torment of the World ever since it began. The Philosophers have felt its Influence so sensibly, that almost every one of them has left us some Saying or other, which has intimated that he too well knew the Power of it. One<sup>2</sup> has told us, that a graceful Person is a more powerful Recommendation than the best Letter that can be writ in your Favour. Another<sup>3</sup> desires the Possessor of it to consider it as a meer Gift of Nature, and not any Perfection of his own. A Third<sup>2</sup> calls it a short liv'd Tyranny, a Fourth,<sup>3</sup> a silent Fraud, because it imposes upon us without the Help of Language. But I think Carnades spoke as much like a Philosopher as any of them, tho' more like a Lover, when he call'd it Royalty without Force. It is not indeed to be denied, that there is something irresistible in a Beauteous Form, the most Severe will not pretend, that they do not feel an immediate Prepossession in Favour of the Handsome. No one denies them the Privilege of being first heard, and being regarded before others in Matters of ordinary Consideration. At the same time the Handsome should consider that it is a Possession, as it were, foreign to them. No one can give it himself, or preserve it when they have it. Yet so it is, that People can bear any Quality in the World better than Beauty. It is the Consolation of all who are naturally too much affected with the Force of it, that a little Attention, if a Man can attend with Judgment, will cure them. Handsome People usually are so fantastically pleas'd with themselves, that if they do not kill at first Sight, as the Phrase is, a second Interview disarms them of all their Power. But I shall make this Paper rather a Warning piece to give Notice where the Danger is, than to propose Instructions how to avoid it when you have fallen in the way of it. Handsome Men shall be the Subject of another Chapter, the Women shall take up the present Discourse.

Amazylis, who has been in Town but one Winter, is extremely improved with the Arts of Good-Breeding, without leaving Nature. She has not lost the Native Simplicity of her Aspect, to substitute that Patience of being stared at, which is the usual Triumph and Distinction of a Town Lady. In Publick Assemblies you meet her careless Eye diverting itself with the Objects around her, insensible that she herself is one of the brightest in the Place.

Dulcissa is quite [of] another Make, she is almost a Beauty by Nature, but more than one by Art. If it were possible for her to let her Fan or any Lamb about her rest, she would do some Part of the Execution she meditates. But tho' she designs her self a Prey she will not stay to be taken. No Painter can give you Words for the different Aspects of Dulcissa in half a Moment, wherever she appears. So little does she accomplish what she takes so much pains for, to be gazy and careless.

Meral is attended with all the Charms of Woman and Accomplishments of Man. It is not to be doubted but she has a great deal of Wit, if she were not such a Beauty. And she would have more Beauty had she not so much Wit. Affectation prevents her Excellencies from walking together. If she has a Mind to speak such a Thing, it must be done with such an Air of her Body and if she has an Inclination to look very careless, there is such a smart Thing to be said at the same Time, that the Design of being admired destroys it self. Thus the unhappy Meral, tho' a

Wit and Beauty, is allowed to be neither, because she will always be both

Abacuda has the Skill as well as Power of pleasing Her Form is majestic, but her Aspect humble All good Men should beware of the Destroyer She will speak to you like your Sister, till she has you sure but is the most venacious of Tyrants when you are so Her Familiarity of Behaviour, her indifferent Questions, and general Conversation, make the silly Part of her Votaries full of Hopes, while the wise fly from her Power She well knows she is too Beautiful and too Witty to be indifferent to any who converse with her, and therefore knows she does not lessen herself by Familiarity, but gains Occasions of Admiration, by seeming Ignorance of her Perfections

Eudasia adds to the Height of her Stature a Nobility of Spirit which still distinguishes her above the rest of her Sex Beauty in others is lovely, in others agreeable, in others attractive but in Eudasia it is commanding Love towards Eudasia is a Sentiment like the Love of Glory The Lovers of other Women are softened into Fondness, the Admirers of Eudasia exalted into Ambition

Eucratia presents her self to the Imagination with a more kindly Pleasure, and as she is Woman, her Praise is wholly Feminine If we were to form an Image of Dignity in a Man, we should give him Wisdom and Valour, as being essential to the Character of Manhood In like manner, if you describe a right Woman in a judicious Sense, she should have gentle Softness, tender Fear and all those Parts of Life, which distinguish her from the other Sex, with some Subordination to it, but such an Inferiority that makes her still more lovely Eucratia is that Creature, she is all over Woman, Kindness is all her Art, and Beauty all her Arms Her Look, her Voice, her Gesture, and whole Behaviour is truly Feminine A Goodness mixed with Fear, gives a Tincture to all her Behaviour It would be Savage to offend her, and Cruelty to use Art to gain her Others are beautiful, but [Eucratia,<sup>1</sup>] thou art Beauty

Onnamente is made for Decent, she has an Aspect as Innocent as the famed Lucrèce, but a Mind as Wild as the more famed Cleopatra Her Face speaks a Vestal, but her Heart a Messalina Who that beheld Onnamente's negligent unob-serving Air, would believe that she hid under that regardless Manner the witty Prostitute, the rapacious Welch, the prodigal Courtesan? She can, when she pleases, adorn those Eyes with Tears like an Infant that is chid She can cast down that pretty Face in Confusion, while you rage with Jealousy, and storm at her Perfidiousness she can wipe her Eyes, tremble and look frightened, till you think yourself a Brute for your Rage, own yourself an Offender, beg Pardon, and make her new Presents

But I go too far in reporting only the Dangers in beholding the Beauties, which I design for the Instruction of the Fair as well as their Beholders and shall end this Rhapsody with mentioning what I thought was well enough said of an Ancient Sage to a Beautiful Youth, whom he saw admiring his own Figure in Brass What, said the Philosopher, could that Image of yours say for it self if it could speak? It might say, (answered the Youth) That it is very Beautiful And are not you ashamed, reply'd the Cynick, to value your self upon that only of which a Piece of Brass is capable? T

IF the following Enormities are not amended upon the first Mention, I desire further Notice from my Correspondents

MR SPECTATOR,

I am obliged to you for your Discourse the other Day upon frivolous Disputants, who with great Warmth, and Enumeration of many Circumstances and Authorities, undertake to prove Matters which no Body living denies You cannot employ your self more usefully than in adjusting the Laws of Disputation in Coffee-houses and accidental Companies, as well as in more formal Debates Among many other things which your own Experience must suggest to you, it will be very obliging if you please to take notice of Wagerers I will not here repeat what Hudibras says of such Disputants, which is so true, that it is almost Proverbial<sup>2</sup> but shall only acquaint you with a Set of young Fellows of the Inns of Court, whose Fathers have provided for them so plentifully, that they need not be very anxious to get Law into their Heads for the Service of their Country at the Bar but are of those who are sent (as the Phrase of Parents is) to the Temple to know how to keep their own One of these Gentlemen is very loud and capacious at a Coffee house which I frequent, and being in his Nature troubled with an Humour of Contradiction, though withal excessive Ignorant, he has found a way to indulge this Temper, go on in Idleness and Ignorance, and yet still give himself the Air of a very learned and knowing Man, by the Strength of his Pocket The Misfortune of the thing is, I have, as it happens sometimes, a greater Stock of Learning than of Money The Gentleman I am speaking of, takes Advantage of the Narrowness of my Circumstances in such a manner, that he has read all that I can pretend to, and runs me down with such a positive Air, and with such powerful Arguments, that from a very Learned Person I am thought a mere Pretender Not long ago I was relating that I had read such a Passage in Tacitus, up starts my young Gentleman in a full Company, and pulling out his Purse offered to lay me ten Guineas, to be struck immediately in that Gentleman's Hands, (pointing to one smoking at another Table) that I was utterly mis-

any thing else therefore I shall translate a Passage in the one, and transcribe a Paragraph out of the other, for the Speculation of this Day Cicero tells us,<sup>1</sup> that Plato reports Socrates, upon receiving his Sentence, to have spoken to his Judge in the following manner

'I have great Hopes, oh my Judges, that it is infinitely to my Advantage that I am sent to Death For it is of necessity that one of these two things must be the Consequence Death must take away all these Senses, or convey me to another Life If all Sense is to be taken away, and Death is no more than that profound Sleep without Dreams, in which we are sometimes buried, oh Heavens! how desirable is it to die? how many Days do we know in Life preferable to such a State? But if it be true that Death is but a Passage to Places which they who lived before us do now inhabit, how much still happier is it to go from those who call themselves Judges, to appear before those that really are such, before Minos, Achadamanthus, Æneus, and Triptolemus, and to meet Men who have lived with Justice and Truth? Is this, do you think, no happy Journey? Do you think it nothing to speak with Orpheus, Musæus, Homer, and Hesiod? I would, indeed, suffer many Deaths to enjoy these Things With what particular Delight should I talk to Palamedes, Ajax, and others, who like me have suffered by the Iniquity of their Judges I should examine the Wisdom of that great Prince, who carried such mighty Forces against Troy and argue with Ulysses and Sisyphus, upon difficult Points, as I have in Conversation here, without being in Danger of being condemned But let not those among you who have pronounced me an innocent Man be afraid of Death No Harm can arrive at a good Man whether dead or living, his Affairs are always under the direction of the Gods, nor will I believe the Fate which is allotted to me myself this Day to have arrived by Chance nor have I ought to say either against my Judges or Accusers, but that they thought they did me an Injury — But I detain you too long, it is Time that I retire to Death, and you to your Affairs of Life which of us has the Better is known to the Gods, but to no Mortal Man

The Divine Socrates is here represented in a Figure worthy his great Wisdom and Philosophy, worthy the greatest mere Man that ever breathed But the modern Discourse is written upon a Subject no less than the Dissolution of Nature itself Oh how glorious is the old Age of that great Man, who has spent his Time in such Contemplations as has made this Being, what only it should be, an Education for Heaven! He has, according to the Lights of Reason and Revelation, which seemed to him clearest, traced the Steps of Omnipotence He has, with a Celestial Ambition, as far as it is consistent with Humility and Devotion, examined the Ways of Providence, from the Creation to the Dissolution of the visible World How pleasing must have been the Speculation, to observe Nature and Providence move together, the Physical and Moral World march the same Pace To observe Paradise and eternal Spring the Seat of Innocence, troubled Seasons and angry Skies the Portion of Wickedness and Vice When this admirable Author has reviewed all that has past, or is to come, which relates to the habitable World, and run through the whole Fate of it, how could a Guardian Angel, that had attended it through all its Courses or Changes, speak more emphatically at the End of his Charge, than does our Author when he makes, as it were, a Funeral Oration over this Globe, looking to the Point where it once stood?

'I let us only, if you please, to take leave of this Subject, reflect upon this Occasion on the Vanity and transient Glory of this habitable World How by the Force of one Element breaking loose upon the rest, all the Vanities of Nature, all the Works of Art, all the Labours of Men, are reduced to Nothing All that we admired and adored before is great and magnificent, is obliterated or vanished and another Form and Face of things, plain, simple, and every where the same, overspreads the whole Earth Where are now the great Empires of the World, and their great Imperial Cities? Their Pillars, Trophies, and Monuments of Glory? Shew me where they stood, read the Inscription, tell me the Victor's Name What Remains, what Impressions, what Difference or Distinction, do you see in this Mass of Fire? Rome it self, eternal Rome, the great City, the Empress of the World, whose Domination and Superstition, ancient and modern, make a great Part of the History of this Earth, what is become of her now? She had her Foundations deep, and her Palaces were strong and sumptuous She glorified her self, and lived deliciously, and said in her Heart, I sit a Queen, and shall see no Sorrow But her Hour is come, she is wiped away from the Face of the Earth, and buried in everlasting Oblivion But it is not Cities only, and Works of Mens Hands, but the everlasting Hills, the Mountains and Rocks of the Earth are melted as Wax before the Sun, and their Place is no where found Here stood the Alps, the Load of the Earth, that covered many Countries, and reached their Arms from the Ocean to the Black Sea, this huge Mass of Stone is softened and dissolved as a tender Cloud into Rain Here stood the African Mountains, and Atlas with his Top above the Clouds there was frozen Caucasus, and Taurus, and Inaus, and the Mountains of Asia, and yonder towards the North, stood the Rhiphaean Hills, cloath'd in Ice and Snow All these are Vanished, dropt away as the Snow upon their Heads Great and Marvellous are thy Works, Just and True are thy Ways, thou King of Saints! MR. SPECTATOR,

THE well Reading of the Common Prayer is of so great Importance and so much neglected, that I take the Liberty to offer to your Consideration some Particulars on that Subject. And what more worthy your Observation than this? A thing so Publick, and of so high Consequence. It is indeed wonderful that the frequent Exercise of it should make the Performers of that Duty more expert in it. This Inability, as I conceive, proceeds from the little Care that is taken of their Reading, while Boys and at School, where when they are got into Le's, they are looked upon as above Englis, the Reading of which is wholly neglected, or at least read to very little purpose without any due Observations made to them of the proper Accent and Manner of Reading by this means they have acquired such ill Habits as won't easily be removed. The only way that I know of to remedy this, is to propose some Person of great Ability, that may be a Pattern for them. Example being most effectual to convince the Learned, as well as instruct the Ignorant.

You may know, Sir, I have been a constant frequenter of the Service of the Church of St. Giles for above these so many Years last past, and till Sunday was Seven might never discovered, to my great Regret the Inconvenience of the Common Prayer. When being at St. Giles's Church-Hill Church I heard the Service read so dutifully, so emphatically, and so fervently, that it was next to an impossibility to be inattentive. My Eyes and my Thoughts could not wander as usual but were confined to my Prayers. I then considered I addressed my self to the Almighty, and not to a beautiful Piece. And what reflected on my former Performances of that Duty, I found I had run over as a writer of Form, in comparison to the Manner in which I then discharged it. My Mind was really affected, and fervent Wishes accompanied my Words. The Confession was read with such a reverend Humility, the Absolution with such a comfortable Authority, the Thanksgivings with such a Religious Joy, as made me feel those Affections of the Mind in a Manner I never did before. To remedy therefore the Grievance above complained of, I humbly propose, that this excellent Reader, upon the next and every Annual Assembly of the Clergy of Ston College, and all other Conventions, should read Prayers before them. For then those that are afraid of stretching their Months, and spoiling their soft Voice, will learn to Read with Clarity, Loudness, and Strength. Others that affect a ridiculous elegant Air by folding their Arms and talking on their Book, will be taught a decent Behaviour, and comely Erection of Body. Those that Read so fast as if impatient of their Work, may learn to speak deliberately. There is another sort of Persons whom I call Pundrick Readers, as being confined to no set measure these pronounce five or six Words with great Deliberation, and the five or six subsequent ones with as great Celerity. The first part of a Sentence with a very exalted Voice, and the latter part with a submissive one. Sometimes again with one sort of a Tone, and immediately after with a very different one. These Gentlemen will learn of my admired Reader in Fervency of Voice and Delivery, and all who are innocent of these Affectations, but read with such an Indifference as if they did not understand the Language, may then be informed of the Art of Reading movingly and fervently, how to place the Emphasis, and give the proper Accent to each Word, and how to vary the Voice according to the Nature of the Sentence. There is certainly a very great Difference between the Reading a Prayer and a Gazette, which I beg of you to inform a Set of Readers who affect forthwith, a certain Gentlemen like Familiarity of Tone, and intend the Language as they go on, crying instead of Pardoneth and Absolveth, Pardons and Absolves. These are often pretty Classical Scholars, and would think it an unpardonable Sin to read Irgis or Martial with so little Taste as they do Divine Service.

The Rev Philip Stubbs, afterwards Archdeacon of St. Albans,

This Indifference seems to me to arise from the Endeavour of avoiding the Imputation of Cant and the false Notion of it. It will be proper therefore to trace the Original and Signification of this Word Cant is, by some People, derived from one Andrew Cant, who, they say, was a Presbyterian Minister in some illiterate Part of Scotland, who by Exercise and Use had obtained the Faculty, alias Gift, of Talking in the Pulpit in such a Drilect, that it's said he understood by none but his own Congregation, and not by all of them. Since Andrew Cant's time, it has been understood in a larger Sense, and signifies all sudden Exclamations, Whinnings, unusual Tones, and in fine all Prying and Preaching, like the unlarned of the Presbyterians. But I hope a proper Elevation of Voice, a due Emphasis and Accent, are not to come within this Description. So that our Readers may still be as unlike the Presbyterians as they please. The Dissenters (I mean such as I have heard) do indeed elevate their Voices, but it is with sudden jumps from the lower to the higher part of them and that with so little Sense or Skill, that their Elevation and Cadence is Bawling and Mutttering. They make use of an Emphasis, but so improperly that it is often placed on some very insignificant Particle, as upon if, or and. Now if these Improperities have so great an Effect on the People, as we see they have, how great an Influence would the Service of our Church, containing the best Prayers that ever were composed, and that in Terms most affecting, most humble, and most expressive of our Wants, and Dependence on the Object of our Worship, dispensed in most proper Order, and void of all Confusion what Influence, I say, would these Prayers have, were they delivered with a due 'Emphasis, and apposite Rising and Variation of Voice, the Sentence concluded with a gentle Cadence, and, in a word, with such an Accent and Turn of Speech as is peculiar to Prayer?

'As the matter of Worship is now managed, in Dissenting Congregations, you find insignificant Words and Phrases rused by a lively Vehemence in our own Churches, the most exalted Sense depreciated, by a dispassionate Indolence. I remember to have heard Dr S—— say in his Pulpit, of the Common prayer, that, at least, it was as perfect as any thing of Human Institution. If the Gentlemen who err in this kind would please to recollect the many Pleasuries they have read upon those who recite good things with an ill Grace, they would go on to think that what in that Case is only Ridiculous, in themselves is Impious. But leaving this to their own Reflections, I shall conclude this Trouble with what Cæsar said upon the Irregularity of Tone in one who read before him, Do you read or sing? If you sing, you sing very ill."

Exempla juvat spinus e pluribus una —Hor

MY Correspondents assure me that the Enormities which they lately complained of, and I published an Account of, are so far from being amended, that new Evils arise every Day to interrupt their Conversation, in Contempt of my Reproofs. My Friend who writes from the Coffee-house near the Temple, informs me that the Gentleman who constantly sings a Voluntary in spite of the whole Company, was more musical than ordinary after reading my Paper, and has not been contented with that, but has danced up to the Glass in the Middle of the Room, and practised Minuet-steps to his own Humming. The incorrigible Creature has gone still further, and in the open Coffee-house, with one Hand extended as leading a Lady in it, he has danced both French and Country-Dances, and admonished his supposed Partner by Smiles and Nods to hold up her Head, and fall back, according to the respective Reings and Evolutions of the Dance. Before this Gentleman began this his Exercise, he was pleased to clear his Throat by coughing and spitting a full half Hour, and as soon as he struck up, he appealed to an Attorney's Clerk in the Room, whether he hit as he ought Since you from Death have saved me! and then asked the young Fellow (pointing to a Chincery Bill under his Arm) whether that was an Opera Score he carried or not? Without staying for an Answer he fell into the Exercise above-mentioned, and practised his Airs to the full House who were turned upon him, without the least Shame or Repentance for his former Transgressions.

<sup>3</sup> Si legis cantas si cantas, male cantas. The word Cant is rather from cantare, as a chinking wluene, than from the Andrew Cants, father and son, of Charles the Second's time.

I am to the last Degree at a Loss what to do with this young Fellow, except I declare him an Outlaw, and pronounce it penal for any one to speak to him in the said House which he frequents, and direct that he be obliged to drink his Tea and Coffee without Sugar, and not receive from any Person whatsoever any thing above mere Necessaries.

As we in England are a sober People, and generally inclined rather to a certain Bashfulness of Behaviour in Publick, it is amazing whence some Fellows come whom one meets with in this Town they do not at all seem to be the Growth of our Island, the Pert, the Talkative, all such as have no Sense of the Observations of others, are certainly of foreign Extraction. As for my Part, I am as much surprised when I see a talkative Englishman, as I should be to see the Indian Pine growing on one of our quick-set Hedges. Where these Creatures get Sun enough, to make them such lively Animals and dull Men, is above my Philosophy.

There are another Kind of Impertinents which a Man is perplexed with in mixed Company, and those are your loud Speakers. These treat Mankind as if we were all deaf, they do not express but declare themselves. Many of these are guilty of this Outrage out of Vanity, because they think all they say is well or that they have their own Persons in such Veneration, that they believe nothing which concerns them can be insignificant to any Body else. For these Peoples sake, I have often lamented that we cannot close our Ears with as much ease as we can our Eyes. It is very uneasy that we must necessarily be under Persecution. Next to these Bawlers, is a troublesome Creature who comes with the Air of your Friend and your Intimate, and that is your Whisperer. There is one of them at a Coffee house which I myself frequent, who observing me to be a Man pretty well made for Secrets, gets by me, and with a Whisper tells me things which all the Town knows. It is no very hard matter to guess at the Source of this Impertinence, which is nothing else but a Method or Mechanick Art of being wise. You never see any frequent in it, whom you can suppose to have anything in the World to do. These Persons are worse than Bawlers, as much as a secret Enemy is more dangerous than a declared one. I wish this my Coffee house Friend would take this for an Intimation, that I have not heard one Word he has told me for these several Years: whereas he now thinks me the most trusty Repository of his Secrets. The Whisperers have a pleasant way of ending the close Conversation, with saying aloud, Do not you think so? Then whisper again, and then aloud, but you know that Person, then whisper again. The thing would be well enough, if they whispered to keep the Tolly of what they say among Friends: but alas, they do it to preserve the Importance of their Thoughts. I am sure I could name you more than one Person whom no Man living ever heard talk upon any Subject in Nature, or ever saw in his whole Life with a Book in his Hand, that I know not how can whisper something like Knowledge of what has and does pass in the World, which you would think he learned from some former Spirit that did not think him worthy to receive the whole Story. But in truth Whispersers deal only in half Accounts of what they entertain you with. A great Help to their Discourse is, 'That the Town says, and People begin to talk very freely, and they had it from Persons too considerable to be named, what they will tell you when things are ripe.' My friend has winked upon me my Day since I came to Town last, and has communicated to me as a Secret, that he designed in a very short time to tell me a Secret, but I shall know what he means he now assures me, in less than a Fortnight's time.

But I must not omit the dearest Part of Mankind, I mean the Ladies, to take up a whole Paper upon Grievances which concern the Men only, but shall humbly propose, that we change Tools for an Instant only. A certain Set of Ladies complain they are frequently perplexed with a Visitant who affects to be wiser than they are, whose Character he hopes to preserve by an obstinate Gravity, and great Guard against discovering his Opinion upon any Occasion whatsoever. A painful Silence has hitherto gained him no further Advantage, than that as he is silent, if he had behaved himself with Freedom, been excepted against but as to this, and that Particular, he now offends in the whole. To relieve these Ladies, my good Friends and Correspondents, I shall exchange my driving Outlaw for their dumb Visitant, and assign the silent Gentleman all the Humors of the Duncer in order in which, I have sent them by the Penny post the following Letters for their Conduct in their new Conversations.

SIR,

'I have, you may be sure, heard of your Irrerigunties without regard to my Observations upon you, but shall not treat you with so much Rigour as you deserve. If you will give your self the trouble to reply to the Piece mentioned in the Postscript to this Letter at Seven this Evening, you will be conducted into a spacious Room well lighted where there are Ideas and Muscles. You will see a young Lady laughing next the Window in the Street, you may take her out for she loves you as well as she does any Man, tho she never saw you before. She never thought in her Life, any more than your self, she will not be surprised when you recost her, nor concerned when you leave her. Hasten from a Place where you are laughed at, to one where you will be admired. You are of no Consequence, therefore go where you will be welcome for being so.

Your most Humble Servant

SIR,

'The Ladies whom you visit, think a wise Man the most impudent Creature living, therefore you cannot be offended that they are displeased with you. Why will you take pains to appear wise where you would not be the more esteemed for being really so? Come in us, forget the Giggles, and let your Inclination go along with you whether you speak or are silent, and let all such Women as are in a Club or Sisterhood, go their own way, there is no Room for you in that Company who are of the common Taste of the Sex.

THE following Letter and my Answer shall take up the present Speculation

My SPECTATOR,

'I am the young Widow of a Country Gentleman who has left me Entire Mistress of a large Fortune, which he agreed to as an Equivalent for the Difference in our Years. In these Circumstances it is not extraordinary to have a Crowd of Admirers, which I have abridged in my own Thoughts, and reduced to a couple of Candidates only, both young, and neither of them disagreeable in their Persons according to the common way of computing, in one the Estate more than deserves my Fortune, and in the other my Fortune more than deserves the Estate. When I consider the first, I own I am so far a Woman I cannot avoid being delighted with the Thoughts of his great, but then he seems to receive such a Degree of Courage from the Knowledge of what he has, he looks as if he was going to confer an Obligation on me, and the Readiness he accounts in with, makes me jealous I am only his Irrig a Repetition of the same things he has said to a hundred Women before. When I consider the other, I see my self approached with so much Modesty and Respect, and such a Doubt of himself, as betrays methinks an Affection within, and a Belief at the same time that he himself would be the only Gainer by my Consent. What an unexceptionable Husband could I make out of both! but since that's impossible, I beg to be concluded by your Opinion, it is absolutely in your Power to dispose of

Your most Obedient Servant, Sylvia

Madam,

You do me great Honour in your Application to me on this important Occasion. I shall therefore talk to you with the Tenderness of a Father, in Gratitude for your giving me the Authority of one. You do not seem to make any great Distinction between these Gentlemen as to their Persons, the whole Question lies upon their Circumstances and Behaviour. If the one is less respectful because he is rich, and the other more obsequious because he is not so, they are in that Point moved by the same Principle, the Consideration of Fortune, and you must place them in each others Circumstances before you can judge of their Inclination To avoid Confusion in discussing this Point, I will call the richer Man Strephon, and the other Florio. If you believe Florio with Strephon's Estate would behave himself as he does now, Florio is certainly your Man but if you think Strephon, were he in Florio's Condition, would be as obsequious as Florio is now, you ought for your own sake to choose Strephon, for where the Men are equal, there is no doubt Riches ought to be a Reason for Preference. After this manner, my dear Child, I would have you abstract them from their Circumstances, for you are to take it for granted, that he who is very humble only because he is poor, is the very same Man in Nature with him who is haughty because he is rich.

When you have gone thus far, as to consider the Figure they make towards you you will please, my Dear, next to consider the Appearance you make towards them. If they are Men of Discerning, they can observe the Motives of your Heart, and Florio can see when he is disregarded only upon your Account of Fortune, which makes you to him a mercenary Creature and you are still the same thing to Strephon, in taking him for his Wealth only. You are therefore to consider whether you had rather oblige, than receive an Obligation.

The Marriage Life is always an unspiced, & venacious, or an happy Condition. The first is, when two People of no Genius or Taste for themselves meet together, upon such a Settlement as has been thought reasonable by Parents and Conveyancers from an exact Valuation of the Land and Cash of both Parties. In this Case the young Lady's Person is no more regarded, than the House and Improvements in Purchase of an Estate but she goes with her Fortune, rather than her Fortune with her. These make up the Crowd or Vulgar of the Rich, and fill up the Lumber of human Race, without Beneficence towards those below them, or Respect towards those above them and lead a despicable, independent and useless Life, without Sense of the Laws of Kindness, Good nature, mutual Offices, and the elegant Satisfaction which flow from Reason and Virtue.

The venacious Life arises from a Conjunction of two People of quick Taste and Resentment, put together for Reasons well known to their Friends, in which especial Care is taken to avoid (what they think the chief of Evils) Poverty, and insure to them Riches, with every Evil besides. These good People live in a constant Constraint before Company, and too great Familiarity alone when they are within Observation they fret at each other's Carriage and Behaviour when alone they revile each other's Person and Conduct. In Company they are in a Purgatory, when only together in an Hell.

The happy Marriage is, where two Persons meet and voluntarily make Choice of each other, without principally regarding, or neglecting the Circumstances of Fortune or Beauty. These may still love in spite of Adversity or Sickness. The former we may in some measure defend our selves from the other is the Portion of our very Make. When you have a true Notion of this sort of Passion, your Humour of living great will vanish out of your Imagination, and you will find Love has nothing to do with State Solitude, with the Person beloved, has a Pleasure, even in a Woman's Mind, beyond Show or Pomp. You are therefore to consider which of your Lovers will like you best undressed, which will bear with you most when out of Humour? and your way to this is to ask your self, which of them you value most for his own sake? and by that judge which gives the greater Instances of his valuing you for your self only.

After you have expressed some Sense of the humble Approach of Florio, and a little Disdain at Strephon's Assurance in his Address, you cry out, What an unexceptionable Husband could I make out of both! It would therefore methinks be a good way to determine your self. Take him in whom what you like is not transferable to another for if you choose otherwise, there is no Hopes your Husband will ever have what you liked in his Rival but intrinsic Qualities in one Man may very probably purchase every thing that is adventitious in [another.] In plainer Terms he whom you take for his personal Perfections will sooner arrive at the Gifts of Fortune, than he whom you take for the sake of his Fortune attain to Personal Perfections. If Strephon is not as accomplished and agreeable as Florio, Marriage to you will never make him so but Marriage to you may make Florio as rich as Strephon. Therefore to make a sure Purchase, employ Fortune upon Certainties, but do not sacrifice Certainties to Fortune.

*Nil habet usque paupertas durius in se,
Quam: quod ridiculos homines facit*— Juv

AS I was walking in my Chamber the Morning before I went last into the Country, I heard the Hawkers with great Vehemence crying about a Paper, entitled, The needy man's Plagues of an empty Purse. I had indeed some time before observed, that the Orators of Grub street had dealt very much in Plagues. They have already published in the same Month, The Plagues of Matrimony, The Plagues of a single Life, The nineteen Plagues of a Chambermaid, The Plagues of a Coachman, The Plagues of a Footman, and The Plague of Plagues. The success these several Plagues met with, probably gave Occasion to the above-mentioned Poem on an empty Purse. However that be, the same Noise so frequently repeated under my Window, drew me insensibly to think on some of those Inconveniences and Mortifications which usually attend on Poverty, and in short, gave Birth to the present Speculation. For after my Fancy had run over the most obvious and common Calumnies which Men of mean Fortunes are liable to, it descended to those little Insults and Contempts, which though they may seem to dwindle into nothing when a Man offers to describe them, are perhaps in themselves more cutting and insupportable than the former. For *en*al with a great deal of Humour and Reason tells us, that nothing bore harder upon a poor Man in his Time, than the continual Ridicule which his Habit and Dress afforded to the Banns of *Ko*re

Dryd

"Is on this Occasion that he afterwards adds the Reflection which I have chosen for my Motto
*W'ant is the Sworn of every wealthy Fool,
And Wit in Rags is turn'd to Ridicule*—Dryd

It must be confess'd that few things make a Man appear more despicable or more prejudicial his Hectors against what he is going to offer, than an awkward or pitiful Dress inasmuch that I fancy, had Fully himself pronounced one of his Orations with a Blunt at about his Shoulders, more People would have laughed at his Dress than have admired his Eloquence. This last Reflection made me wonder at a Set of Men, who, without being subjected to it by the Unkindness of their Fortunes, are contented to draw upon themselves the Ridicule of the World in this Particular. I mean such as take it into their Heads, that the first regular Step to be a Wit is to commence a Sloven. It is certain nothing has so much debased that, which must have been otherwise so great a Character and I know not how to account for it, unless it may possibly be in Complaisance to those narrow Minds who can have no Notion of the same Person's possessing different Accomplishments, or that it is a sort of Sacrifice which some Men are contented to make to Calumny, by allowing it to fasten on one Part of their Character, while they are endeavouring to establish another. Yet however unaccountable this foolish Custom is, I am afraid it could plead a long Prescription, and probably gave too much Occasion for the Vulgar Definition still remaining among us of an Heathen Philosopher.

I have seen the Speech of a Terre-filins, spoken in King Charles II's Reign, in which he describes two very eminent Men, who were perhaps the greatest Scholars of their Age and after having mentioned the entire Friendship between them, concludes, That they had but one Mind, one Purse, one Chamber, and one Hat. The Men of Business were also infected with a Sort of Singularity little better than this. I have heard my Father say, that a broad brim'd Hat, short Hair, and unfolded Hankerchief, were in his time absolutely necessary to denote a notable Man, and that he had known two or three, who aspired to the Character of very notable, wear Shoestrings with great Success.

To the Honour of our present Age it must be allowed, that some of our greatest Geniuses for Wit and Business have almost entirely broke the Neck of these Absurdities.

Victor, after having dispatched the most important Affairs of the Commonwealth, has appeared in an Assembly, where all the Ladies have declared him the gentlest Man in the Company and in Atticus, though every way one of the greatest Geniuses the Age has produced, one sees nothing particular in his Dress or Carriage to denote his Pretensions to Wit and Learning so that at present a Man may venture to cock up his Hat, and wear a fashionable Wig, without being taken for a Rake or a Fool.

The Medium between a Fop and a Sloven is what a Man of Sense would endeavour to keep yet I remember Mr Osborn advises his Son<sup>1</sup> to appear in his Habit rather above than below his Fortune and tells him, that he will find an hundred Suits of Clothes always procures some additional Respect. I have indeed myself observed that my Banker bows lowest to me when I wear my full bottom'd Wig, and writes me Mr or Esq, accordingly as he sees me dressed.

I shall conclude this Paper with an Adventure which I was myself an Eye-witness of very lately.

It happened the other Day to call in at a celebrated Coffee-house near the Temple. I had not been there long when there came in an elderly Man very meanly dressed, and sat down by me. He had a thread bare loose Coat on, which it was plain he wore to keep himself warm, and not to favour his tender Sinit, which seemed to have been at least its Contemporary. His short Wig and Hat were both answerable to the rest of his Apparel. He was no sooner seated than he called for a Dish of Tea but as several Gentlemen in the Room wanted other things, the Boys of the House did not think themselves at leisure to mind him. I could observe the old Fellow was very uneasy at the Affront, and at his being obliged to repeat his Commands several times to no purpose till at last one of the [Lads] presented him with some stale Tea in a broken Dish accompanied with a Plate of brown Sugar which so roused his Indignation, that after several obliging Appellations of Dog and Rascal he asked him aloud before the whole Company, if by he must be i sed with less Respect than that I of them? pointing to a well dressed young Gentleman who was drinking Tea at the opposite Table. The Boy of the House replied with a [great] deal of Pertness, that his Master had two sort of Customers, and that the Gentleman at the other Table had given him ninety a Sexpence for wiping his Shoes. By this time the young Templar, who found his Honour concerned in the Dispute, and that the Lyes of the whole Coffee-house were upon him, he d throw aside a Paper he had in his Hand, and was coming towards us, while we at the Table made what haste we could to get away from the impending Quarrel, but were all of us surprised to see him as he approached nearer put on an Air of Deference, and Respect. To whom the old Man said, Har! you, Sirrah, I'll pay off your extravagant Bills once more, but will take effectual Care for the future, that your Prodigality shall not spirit up a Parcel of Rascals to insult your Father.

Tho' I by no means approve either the Impudence of the Servants or the Extravagance of the Son, I cannot but think the old Gentleman was in some measure justly served for walking in Masquerade, I mean appearing in a Dress so much beneath his Quality and Estate. X

Maximas Virtutes facere omnes, cecesse est Voluptate dominari te — Iull de I'm

I KNOW no one Character that gives Reason a greater Shock, at the same time that it presents a good ridiculous Image to the Imagination, than that of a Man of Wit and Pleasure about the Town. This Description of a Man of Fashion, spoken by some with a Mixture of Scorn and Ridicule, by others with great Gravity is a laudable Distinction, is in every Body's Mouth that spends any Time in Conversation. My friend WILL HOPKINSON has this Expression very frequently, and I never could understand by the Story which follows upon his Mention of such a one, but that his Man of Wit and Pleasure was either a Drunkard too old for Vencheling, or a young lewd Fellow with some Liveliness, who would converse with you, receive kind Offices of you, and at the same time debauch your Sister, or lie with your Wife. According to his Description, a Man of Wit, when he could have Wenches for Crowns apiece which he liked quite as well, would be so extravagant as to bribe Servants, make false Friendships, fight Relations. I say, according to him, plain and simple Vice was too little for a Man of Wit and Pleasure — but he would leave us easy and accessable Wieldedness, to come it the same thing with only the Addition of certain Falshood and possible Murder. WILL thins the Town grown very dull, in that we do not hear so much as we used to do of these Coxcombs, whom (without observing it) he describes as the most infamous Rogues in Nature, with relation to Friendship, Love, or Conversation.

When Pleasure is made the chief Pursuit of Life, it will necessarily follow that such Monsters as these will arise from a constant Application to such Blandishments as naturally root out the Force of Reason and Reflection, and substitute in their Place a general Impunity of Thought, and a constant Prurency of inordinate Desire.

Pleasure, when it is a Man's chief Purpose, dis appoints it self — and the constant Application to it pulls the Faculty of enjoying it, tho' it leaves the Sense of our Inability for that we wish, with a Dislish of every thing else. Thus the intermedrate Seasons of the Man of Pleasure are more heavy than one would impose upon the vilest Criminal. I like him when he is retired too soon after a Debauch, or disappointed in following a worthless Woman without Truth, and there is no Man living whose Being is such a Weight or Vexation as his is. He is an utter Stranger to the pleasing Reflections in the Evening of a well-spent Day, or the Gladness of Heart or Quietness of Spirit in the Morning after profound Sleep or intolent Slumbers. He is not to be at Ease any longer than he can keep Reason and good Sense without his Curtains, otherwise he will be haunted with the Persfection, that he could not believe such a rare the Woman that upon Trial he so ind her. What has he got by his Conquest, but to think meanly of her for whom a Day or two before he had the highest Honour? and of himself for, perhaps, wronging the Man whom of all Men living he himself could least willingly have injured?

Pleasure seizes the whole Man who addict himself to it, and will not give him Leisure for any good Office in Life which contradicts the Gaiety of the present Hour. You may indeed observe in People of Pleasure a certain Complacency and Abreence of all Severity, which the Habit of a loose unconcerned Life gives them, but tell the Man of Pleasure your secret Wants, Cares, or Sorrows and you will find he has given up the Delicacy of his Fictions to the Cravings of his Appetite. He little knows the perfect Joy he loses, for the disappointing Gratifications which he pursues. He looks at Pleasure as he approaches, and comes to him with the Recommendation of warm Wishes, gay Looks, and graceful Motion; but he does not observe how she leaves his Presence with Disorder, Impotence, discontented Shriue, and conscious Imperfection. She makes our Youth inglorious, our Age shameful.

WILL HOPEKINSON gives us twenty Intimations in an Evening of several Hags whose Bloom was given up to his Arms — and would rure a Value to himself for having had, as he phrases it, very good Women. WILL's good Women are the Comfort of his Heart, and support him, I warrant, by the Memory of past Interviews with Persons of their Condition. No, there is not in the World an Occasion wherein Vice makes so phantastical a Figure, as at the Meeting of two old People who have been Partners in unwarrantable Pleasure. To tell a toothless old Lady that she once had a good Set, or a defunct Wencher that he once was the admired Thing of the Town, are Satires instead of Applauses — but on the other Side, consider the old Age of those who have passed their Days in Labour, Industry, and Virtue, their Decays make them but appear the more venerable, and the Imperfections of their Bodies are beheld as a Misfortune to humane Society that their Make is so little durable.

But to return more directly to my Man of Wit and Pleasure. In all Orders of Men, wherever this is the chief Character, the Person who wears it is a negligent Friend, Father, and Husband, and entails Poverty on his unhappy Descendants.

Mortgages, Diseases and Settlements are the Legacies a Man of Wit and Pleasure leaves to his Family. All the poor Rogues that make such lamentable Speeches after every Session at 13-bell were, in their Way, Men of Wit and Pleasure before they fell into the Adventures which brought them thither.

Irresolution and Procrastination in all a Man's Affairs, are the natural Effects of being addicted to Pleasure. Dishonour to the Gentleman and Ruin to the Trader, are the Portion of either whose chief Purpose of Life is Delight. The chief Cause that this Pursuit has been in all Ages received with so much Quarter from the whole Part of Mankind has been that some Men of great Ideas have sacrificed themselves to it. The shining Qualities of such People have given a Beauty to whatever they were engaged in, and a Mixture of Wit has recommended Madness. For let any Man who knows what it is to have passed much Time in a Series of Jollity, Mirth, Wit, or humorous Entertainments, look back at what he was all that while a doing, and he will find that he has been at one Instant sharp to some Man he is sorry to have so fully and impetuously to some one it was Cruelty, to treat with such Freedom, ungracefully noisy at such a Time, unskillfully open at such a Time, and from the whole Course of his applauded Satisfaction, unable in the end to recollect any Circumstance which can add to the Enjoyment of his own Mind alone, or which he would put his Character upon with other Men. Thus it is with those who are here made for becoming Pleasures, but how monstrous is it in the generality of Mankind who pretend this Way without Genius or Inclination towards it? The Scene then is wild to us in Extravagance, thus as if Fools should mimic Madmen. Pleasure of this kind is the interminate Meals and loud Jollities of the common Rate of Country Gentlemen, whose Practice and Way of Enjoyment is to put an End as fast as they can to that little Particle of Reason they have when they are sober. These Men of Wit and Pleasure dispatch their Senses as fast as possible by drinking till they cannot taste, smoking till they cannot see, and roaring till they cannot hear. 1 more warm and pleasing than we meet with among Men who are used to adjust and methodize their Thoughts.

I was this Evening walking in the Fields with my Friend Captain Stryker, and I could not, from the many Relations which I drew him into of what passed when he was in the Service, forbear expressing my Wonder, that the Fear of Death, which we, the rest of Mankind, arm ourselves against with so much Contemplation, Reason and Philosophy, should appear so little in Camps, that common Men march into open Breaches, meet opposite Partitions, not only without Reluctance but with Alacrity. My Friend answered what I said in the following manner: 'What you wonder at may very naturally be the Subject of Admiration to all who are not conversant in Camps, but when a Man has spent some time in that way of Life, he observes a certain Mechanical Courage which the ordinary Race of Men become Masters of from acting always in a Crowd. They see indeed many drop, but then they see many more alive, they observe themselves escape very narrowly, and they do not know why they should not again. Besides which, general way of loose thinking, they usually spend the other Part of their Time in Pleasures upon which their Minds are so entirely lent, that short Labours or Dangers are but a cheap purchase of Jollity, Trunkion Victory, fresh Quarters, new Scenes, and uncommon Adventures. Such are the Thoughts of the Executive Part of an Army, and indeed of the Gross of Mankind in general, but none of these Men of Mechanical Courage have ever made any great Figure in the Profession of Arms. Those who are formed for Command, are such as have reasoned themselves, out of a Consideration of greater Good than Length of Days, into such a Negligence of their Being, as to make it their first Position, that it is one Duty to be resigned, and since it is, in the Prosecution of worthy Actions and Service of Mankind they can put it to habitual Hazard. The Event of our Designs, say they, as it relates to others, is uncertain, but as it relates to ourselves it must be prosperous, while we are in the Pursuit of our Duty, and within the Terms upon which Providence has ensured our Happiness, whether we die or live. All [that] Nature has prescribed must be good, and as Death is natural to us, it is Absurdity to fear it. Fear loses its Purpose when we are sure it cannot preserve us, and we should draw Resolution to meet it from the Impossibility to escape it. Without a Resignation to the Necessity of dying, there can be no Capacity in Man to attempt any thing that is glorious, but when they have once attained to that Perfection, the Pleasures of a Life spent in Martial Adventures, are as great as any of which the human Mind is capable. The Force of Reason gives a certain Beauty, mixed with the Conscience of well doing and Thirst of Glory, to all which before was terrible and ghastly to the Imagination. Add to this, that the Fellowship of Danger, the common good of Mankind, the general Cause, and the manifest

THERE is no sort of People whose Conversation is so pleasant as that of military Men, who derive their Courage and Magnanimity from Thought and Reflection. The many Adventures which attend their Way of Life makes their Conversation so full of Incidents, and gives them so frank an Air in speaking of what they have been Witnesses of, that no Company can be more amiable than that of Men of Sense who are Soldiers. There is a certain irregular Way in their Narrations or Discourse, which has something

'Virtue you may observe in so many Men, who made no Figure till that Day, are so many Centives to destroy the little Consideration of their own Persons. Such are the Heroick Part of Soldiers who are qualified for Leaders. As to the rest whom I before spoke of, I know not how it is, but they arrive at a certain Habit of being void of Thought, insomuch that on occasion of the most imminent Danger they are still in the same Indifference. Nay I remember an Instance of a gay French man, who was led on in Battle by a superior Officer, (whose Conduct it was his Custom to speak of always with Contempt and Raillery) and in the Beginning of the Action received a Wound he was sensible was mortal; his Reflection on this Occasion was, I wish I could be another Hour, to see how this blundering Coxcomb will get clear of this business!

I remember two young Fellows who rid in the same Squadron of a Troop of Horse, who were ever together, they eat, they drink, they in, they in a word, all their Passions and Affections seemed to tend the same Way, and they appeared serviceable to each other in them. We were in the Park of the Evening to march over a River, and the Troop these Gentlemen dismounted to be transported in aerry boat as fast as they could. One of the Friends was now in the Boat while the other was drawn up with others by the Water-side waiting the Return of the Boat. A Disorder happened in the Passage by an unruly Horse and a Gentleman who had the Reins of his Horse negligently under his Arm, was forced into the Water by his Horse's Jumping over the Bank. The Friend on the Shore cry'd out, 'Who's that is drowned now?' He was immediately answer'd, Your Friend, Harry Thompson. He very gravely reply'd, Ay, he had a mail Horse. This short Epitaph from such a Gentleman, without more Words, gave me, at that Time, under Twenty, a very moderate Opinion of the Friendship of Companions. Thus is Affection and every other Motive of Life in the Generality rooted out by the present busy Scene about them: they lament no Man whose Capacity can be supplied by another and where Men converse without Delicacy, the next Man you meet will serve as well as he whom you have lived with half your Life. To such the Devastation of Countries, the Misery of Inhabitants, the Cries of the Pillaged, and the silent Sorrow of the great Unfortunate, are ordinary Objects: their Minds are bent upon the little Gratifications of their own Senses and Appetites forgetful of Compassion, insensible of Glory, avoiding only Shame: their whole Hearts taken up with the trivial Hope of meeting and being merry. These are the People who make up the Gross of the Soldierly. But the fine Gentleman in that Band of Men is such a One as I have now in my Eye, who is foremost in all Danger to which he is ordered. His Officers are his Friends and Companions as they are Men of Honour and Gentle men the private Men his Brethren, as they are of his Species. He is beloved of all that behold him. They wish him in Danger as he views their Ranks, that they may have Occasions to save him at their own Hazard. Mutual Love is the Order of the Files where he commands, every Man afraid for himself and his Neighbour, not lest their Commander should punish them, but lest he should be offended. Such is his Regiment who knows Mankind, and feels their Distresses, so far as to prevent them. Just in distribution, what is their Due, he would thrust himself below their Sailor to wear a Ship of their Cloaths in Lace upon his own and below the most rapacious Agent, should he enjoy a Parthing, above his own Pay. Go on, brave Man, immortal Glory is thy Fortune, and unimmortal Happiness thy Reward.

Of all the impertinent Wishes which we hear expressed in Conversation, there is not one more unworthy a Gentleman or a Man of liberal Education, than that of wishing one's self Younger. I have observed this Wish is usually made upon Sight of some Object which gives the Idea of a past Action, that it is no Dishonour to us that we cannot repeat, or else on what was in itself unuseful when we performed it. It is a certain Sign of a foolish or a dissolute Mind if we want our Youth again only for the Strength of Bones and Sinews which we once were Masters of. It is as my Author has it as absurd in an old Man to wish for the Strength of a Youth, as it would be in a young Man to wish for the Strength of a Bull or a Horse. These Wishes are both equally out of Nature, which should direct in all things that are not contradictory to Justice, Law and Reason. That tho' every old Man has been Young, and every young one hopes to be old, there seems to be a most unnatural Misunderstanding between those two Stages of Life. The unhappy Want of Commerce arises from the insolent Arrogance or Exultation in Youth, and the irrational Despondence or Self pity in Age. A young Man whose Passion and Ambition is to be good and wise, and an old one who has no Inclination to be led or debauched, are quite unconcerned in this Speculation: but the Cocking young Fellow who treads upon the Toes of his Elders, and the old Fool who envies the sawey Pride he sees in him, are the Objects of our present Contempt and Derision. Contempt and Derision are harsh Words, but in what manner can one give Advice to a Youth in the Pursuit and Possession of sensual Pleasures, or afford Pity to an old Man in the Impotence and Desire of Enjoying them? When young Men in public Places betwixt in their Deportment an abundance of Re-ignation to their Appetites they give to other Minds a Prospect of a despicable Age which, if not interrupted by Death in the midst of their Follies must certainly come. When an old Man bewails the Loss of such Grati- fication which are passed, he discovers a mon- strous Inhumanity to that which is not in the Course of Providence to recede. The Slave of an old Man, who is dissatisfied merely for his being such as the most out of all Measures of Reason and good Sense of any being, we have any Ac- count of from the highest Attrib to the lowest Worry. How miserable is the Contemplation to consider a blind, lame old Man (while all Created things, besides himself and Devils are following the Order of Providence) fretting at the Course of things, and being blind to the sole Miscontent in the Creation. But let us a little reflect upon what he has lost by the number of Years. The Pri- vilege is which he had in Youth are not to be abused as they were then, but Reason is more powerful now without the Disturbance of them. An old Gentleman told me this Day in Discourse with a Friend of his reflecting upon some Adventures they had in Youth together cry'd out, Oh Jack, those were happy Days! I bet is true, reply'd his Friend, but it will not do you about our business more quietly than we did then. One would think it should be no small Satisfaction to have come so far in our Journey that the Heat of the Day is over with us. When Life itself is a Fever, as it is in licentious Youth, the Pleasures of it are no other than the Dreams of a Man in that Dis- temper, and it is as absurd to wish the Return of that Season of Life, as for a Man in Health to be sorry for the Loss of gilded Palaces, fast Walks, and flowery Pastures, with which he remembers he was entertained in the troubled Slumbers of a Fit of Sickness.

As to all the rational and worthy Pleasures of our Being, the Continuance of a good Fame, the Contemplation of another Life, the Respect and Commerce of honest Men, our Capacities for such Enjoyments are enlarged by Years. While Health endures, the latter Part of Life, in the Eye of Reason, is certainly the more eligible. The Memory of a well spent Youth gives a perceivable, unmix'd, and elegant Pleasure to the Mind, and to such who are so unfortunate as not to be able to look back on Youth with Satisfaction, they may give themselves no little Consolation that they are under no Impulsion to repeat their Follies, and that they at present despise them. It was prettily said, 'He that would be long an old Man, must begin early to be one.' It is too late to resign a thing after a Man is robbed of it: therefore it is necessary that before the Arrival of Age we bid adieu to the Pursuits of Youth, otherwise several Habits will live in our Imagination when our Limbs cannot be subservient to them. The poor Fellow who lost his Arm last Siege, will tell you, he feels the Fingers that were buried in Flinders like every cold Morning at Chelsea.

The fond Humour of appearing in the gay and fashionable World and being applauded for trivial Excellencies, is what most Youth have Age in Contempt, and makes Age resign with so ill a

Grace the Qualifications of Youth. But this in both Sexes is inverting all things, and turning the natural Course of our Minds, which should build their Appointments and Dislikes upon what Na- ture and Reason dictate, into Chimeras and Con- fusion.

Age in a virtuous Person, of either Sex, car- ries in it an Authority which makes it preferable to all the Pleasures of Youth. If to be saluted, attended, and consulted with Deference, are In- stances of Pleasure, they are such as never fail a virtuous old Age. In the Enumeration of the Imperfections and Advantages of the younger and later Years of Man, they are so near in their Co-incident, that, methinks, it should be incredible we see so little Commerce of Kindness between them. If we consider Youth and Age with Justice, regarding the Assu-nt to Death, Youth has many more Chances to be near it than Age. What Youth can say more than an old Man, 'He shall live till Night?' Youth catches Distempers more easily, its Sickness is more violent, and its Recovery more doubtful. The Youth indeed hopes for many more Days, so earnest the old Man. The Youth's Hopes are ill-grounded for what is more foolish than to place any Confidence upon an Uncer- tainty? But the old Man has not Room so much as for Hope. He is still happier than the Youth, he has already enjoyed what the other does but hope for. One wishes to live long the other has lived long. But this is there any thing in human Life, the Duration of which can be called long? There is nothing which must end to be valued for its Continuance. If Hours, Days, Months, and Years pass away, it is an matter what Hour, what Day, what Month, or what Year we die. The Applause of a good Actor is due to him at what ever Scene of the Play he makes his Exit. It is thus in the Life of a Man of Sense, a short Life is sufficient to manifest himself a Man of Honour and Virtue when he comes to be such he has lived too long, and while he is such, it is of no Consequence to him how long he shall be so, pro- vided he is so to his Life's End.

MR SPECTATOR,
YOU are frequent in the mention of Matters which concern the feminine World, and take upon you to be very severe against Men upon all those Occasions. But all this while I am afraid you have been very little conversant with Wo- men, or you would know the generosity of them are not so angry as you imagine at the general Vices (among 'em). I am apt to believe (beg- ging your Pardon) that you are still what I my- self was once, a queer modest Fellow, and therefore, for your Information, shall give you a short Account of my self, and the Reasons why I was forced to wench, drink, play, and do every the Commerce of Lovers, and that of all other Dealers, who are, in a kind, Adversaries. A sealed Bond, or a Bank-Note, would be a pretty Gallantry to convey unseen into the Hands of one whom a Director is charmed with; otherwise the City-Loiterers are still more unreasonable than those at the other End of the Town. At the New Exchange they are eloquent for want of Cash, but in the City they ought with Cash to supply their want of Eloquence.

If one might be serious on this prevailing Folly, one might observe, that it is a melancholy thing, when the World is mercenary even to the buying and selling our very Persons, that young Women, tho' they have never so great Attractions from Nature, are never the nearer being happily disposed of in Marriage. I say, it is very hard under this Necessity, it shall not be possible for them to go into a way of Trade for their Maintenance, but their very Excellencies and personal Perfections shall be a Disadvantage to them, and subject them to be treated as if they stood there to sell their Persons to Prostitution. There cannot be a more melancholy Circumstance to one who has made any Observation in the World, than one of those erring Creatures exposed to Bankruptcy. When that happens, none of these toying Tools will do any more than any other Man they meet to preserve her from Infamy, Insult, and Distemper. A Woman is naturally more helpless than the other Sex, and a Man of Honour and Sense should have this in his View in all Manner of Commerce with her. Were this well weighed, Inconsideration, Ribaldry, and Nonsense, would not be more natural to entertain Women with than Men, and it would be as much Impertinence to go into a Shop of one of these young Women without buying, as into that of any other Trader. I shall end this Speculation with a Letter I have received from a pretty Milliner in the City.

MR SPECTATOR,

I have read your Account of Beauties, and was not a little surprized to find no Character of my self in it. I do assure you I have little else to do but to give Audience as I am such. Here are Merchants of no small Consideration, who call in as certainly as they go to Change, to say something of my roguish Eye. And here is one who makes me once or twice a Week tumble over all my Goods, and then owns it was only a Gallantry to see me act with these pretty Hands. Then lays out three Pence in a little Ribbon for his Wrist bands, and thinks he is a Man of great Vivaity. There is an ugly Thing not far off me, whose Shop is frequented only by People of Business, that is all Day long as busy as possible. Must I that am a Beauty be treated with for nothing but my Beauty? Be pleased to assign Rates to my kind Glances, or make all pay who come to see me, or I shall be undone by my Admirers for want of Customers. Albacinda, Eudasia and all the rest would be used just as we are, if they were in our Condition: therefore pry consider the Distress of us the lower Order of Beauties, and I shall be

I DO not think any thing could make a pleasanter Entertainment, than the History of the reigning Favourites among the Women from Time to Time about this Town. In such an Account we ought to have a faithful Confession of each Lady for what she liked such and such a Man, and he ought to tell us by what particular Action or Dress he believed he should be most successful. As for my part, I have always made as easy a Judgment when a Man dresses for the Ladies, as when he is equipped for Hunting or Coursing. The Woman's Man is a Person in his Air and Behaviour quite different from the rest of our Species. His Garb is more loose and negligent, his Manner more soft and indolent, that is to say, in both these Cases there is an apparent Ludeavour to appear unconcerned and careless. In catching Birds the Fowlers have a Method of imitating their Voices to bring them to the Snare; and our Women's Men have always a Similitude of the Creature they hope to betray, in their own Conversation. A Woman's Man is very knowing in all that passes from one Family to another, has little pretty Officeusesness, is not at a loss what is good for a Cold, and it is not amiss if he has a Bottle of Spirits in his Pocket in case of any sudden Indisposition.

Curiosity having been my prevailing Passion, and indeed the sole Entertainment of my Life, I have sometimes made it my business to examine the Course of Intrigues as well as the Manners and Accomplishments of such as have been most successful that Way. In all my Observation, I never knew a Man of good Understanding a general Favourite; some Singularity in his Behaviour, some Whim in his Way of Life, and what would have made him ridiculous among the Men, has recommended him to the other Sex. I should be very sorry to offend a People so fortunate as these of whom I am speaking, but let any one look over the old Beau's, and he will find the Man of Success was remarkable for quarrelling impertinently for their Sales, for dressing unlike the rest of the World, or passing his Days in an insipid Assiduity about the Fair Sex, to gain the Figure he made amongst them. Add to this that he must have the Reputation of being well with other Women, to please any one Woman of Gallantry for you are to know, that there is a mighty Ambition among the light Part of the Sex to gain Slaves from the Dominion of others. My Friend WILL HONEYCOMB says it was a common Bite with him to lay Suspicious that he was favoured by a Lady's Enemy, that is some rival Beauty, to be well with herself. A little Spite is natural to a great Beauty, and it is ordinary to snap up a disagreeable Fellow lest another should have him. That impudent Lord Barbace fares well among all the Ladies he converses with, for no other Reason in the World but that he has the Skill to keep them from Explication one with another Did they know there is not one who likes him in her Heart, each would declare her Scorn of him the next Moment but he is well received by them because it is the Fashion, and Opposition to each other brings them insensibly into an Imitation of each other What adds to him the greatest Grace is, the pleasant Thief, as they call him, is the most constant Creature living, has a wonderful deal of Wit and Humour, and never wants something to say besides all when, he has a most successful danger is Tongue if you should provoke him.

To make a Woman's Man he must not be a Man of Sense, or a Fool the Business is to entertain, and it is much better to have a Facility of arguing, than a Capacity of judging right. But the pleasures of all the Women's Equipage are your regular Visitors these are Volunteers in their Service, without Hopes of Pay or Preferment It is enough that they can lead out from a publick Place, that they are admitted on a publick Day, and can be allowed to pass away part of that heavy Load, their Time, in the Company of the Fair But commend me above all others, to those who are known for your Runners of Ladies these are the choicest Spirits which our Age produces We have several of these irresistible Gentlemen among us when the Company is in Town These Fellows are accomplished with the Knowledge of the ordinary Occurrences about Court and Town, have that sort of good Breeding which is exclusive of all Morality, and consists only in being publickly decent, privately dissolute.

It is wonderful how far a fond Opinion of herself can carry a Woman to make her have the least Regard to a professed known Woman's Man But is scarce one of all the Women who are in the Tour of Gallantries ever hears any thing of what is the common Sense of sober Minds but are entertained with a continual Round of Flatteries, they cannot be Mistresses of themselves enough to make Arguments for their own Conduct from the Behaviour of these Men to others It is so far otherwise, that a general Name for Falseness in this kind, is a Recommendation and the Coxcomb, loaded with the Favours of many others, is received like a Victor that disdains his Trophies, to be a Victim to the present Charmer

If you see a Man more full of Gesture than ordinary in a publick Assembly, if loud upon no Occasion, if negligent of the Company round him, and yet laying wait for destroying by that Negligence, you may take it for granted that he has ruined many a Fair One The Woman's Man expresses himself wholly in that Motion which we call Strutting In elevated Chest, a pined Hat, a measurable Step, and a surveying Eye, are the Marks of him Now and then you see a Gentleman with all these Accomplishments but alas any one of them is enough to undo Thousands When a Gentleman with such Perfections adds to it suitable Learning there should be publick Warning of his Residence in Town, that we may remove our Wives and Daughters It happens sometimes that such a fine Man has read all the Miscellany Poems, a few of our Comedies, and has the Translation of Ovid's Epistles by

Heart Oh if it were possible that such a one could be as true as he is charming but that is too much, the Women will share such a dear false Man A little Gallantry to hear him Talk one would indulge one's self in, let him reckon the 'Sticks of one's Fun, say something of the Cupids 'in it, and then call one so many soft Names which 'a Man of his Learning has at his Fingers Ends 'There sure is some Excuse for Frailty, when 'attracted by such a Force against a weak Woman' Such is the Soliloquy of many a Lady one might name, at the sight of one of these who makes it no Iniquity to go on from Day to Day in the Sin of Woman's Slaughter

It is certain that People are got into a Way of Affectation, with a manner of overlooking the most solid Virtue, and admiring the most trivial Excellencies The Woman is so far from expecting to be contemned for being a very injudicious silly Animal, that while she can preserve her Features and her Vein, she knows she is still the Object of Desire and there is a sort of secret Ambition, from reading frivolous Books, and keeping a frivolous Company, each side to be unable in Imperfection, and arrive at the Characters of the Dear Deceiver and the Perjured Fair T

I AM very much at a loss to express by any Word that occurs to me in our Language that which is understood by Indols in Latin The natural Disposition to any Particular Art, Science, Profession, or Trade, is very much to be consulted in the Care of Youth, and studied by Men for their own Conduct when they form to themselves any Scheme of Life It is wonderfully hard indeed for a Man to judge of his own Capacity impartially that may look great to me which may appear little to another, and I may be carried by Fondness towards myself so far, as to attempt Things too high for my Talents and Accomplishments But it is not methinks so very difficult a Matter to make a Judgment of the Abilities of others, especially of those who are in their Infancy My Common place Book directs me on this Occasion to mention the Dawning of Greatness in Alexander, who being asked in his Youth to contend for a Prize in the Olympick Games, answered he would, if he had Kings to run against him Cassius, who was one of the Conquerors against Cæsar, gave us great a Proof of his Temper, when in his Childhood he struck a Play fellow, the Son of Sylla, for saying his Father was Master of the Roman People. Scipio is reported to have answered, (when some Flatterers at Supper were asking him what the Romans should do for a General after his Death) Take Marius Marius was then a very Boy, and had given no Instances of his Valour, but it was visible to Scipio from the Manners of the Youth that he had a Soul formed for the Attempt and Execution of great Undertakings. I must confess I have very often with much Sorrow beheld the Misfortune of the Children of Great Britain, when I consider the Ignorance and Undiscerning of the Generality of Schoolmasters. The hurried Liberty we talk of is but a mere Reward for the long Servitude, the many Heart aches and Terrors, in which our Childhood is exposed in going through a Grammar School. Many of these stupid Tyrants exercise their Cruelty without any manner of Distinction of the Capriciousness of Children, or the Intention of Parents in their Behalf. There are many excellent Teachers which are worthy to be no less rich and cultivated with all possible Diligence and Care, that were never designed to be acquainted with Aristotle, Pully, or Virgil, and there are as many who have Capriciousness for understanding every Word those great Persons have writ, and yet were not born to have any Relish of their Writings. For want of this common and obvious discerning in those who have the Care of Youth we have so many hundred unaccountable Creatures every Age whipped up into great Scholars, that are for ever near a right Understanding, and will never arrive at it. These are the Scandal of Letters, and these are generally the Men who are to teach others. The Sense of Shame and Honour is enough to keep the World itself in Order without Corporal Punishment, much more to train the Minds of uncorrupted and innocent Children. It happens, I doubt not, more than once in a Year, that a Lad is christened for a Block-head, when it is good Apprehension that makes him incapable of knowing what his Teacher means. A brisk Imagination very often may suggest an Error, which I had could not have fallen into, if he had been as heavy in conjecturing as his Master in explaining. But there is no Mercy even towards a wrong Interpretation of his Learning, the Sufferings of the Scholars Body are to rectify the Mistakes of his Mind.

I am confident that no Boy who will not be allured to Letters without Blows, will ever be brought to any thing with them. A great or good Mind must necessarily be the worse for such Indignities, and it is a sad Charge to lose of its Virtue for the Improvement of its Knowledge. No one who has gone through what they call a great School, but must remember to have seen Children of excellent and ingenious Natures, (as has afterwards appeared in their Manhood) I say no Man has passed through this way of Education, but must have seen an ingenious Creature expiring with Shame with pale Looks, beseeching Sorrow, and silent Tears, throw up its honest Eyes, and kneel on its tender Knees to no inexorable Block-head, to be forgiven the false Quantity of a Word in making a Latin Verse. The Child is punished, and the next Day he commits a like Crime, and so a third with the same Consequence. I would have asked any reasonable Man whether this I had, in the Simplicity of his native Innocence, full of Shame, and capable of any Impression from that Grace of Soul, was not fitter for any Purpose in this Life, than after that Spark of Virtue is extinguished in him, tho' he is able to write twenty Verses in an Evening?

Seneca says, after his exalted way of Talking, As the immortal Gods never want any Virtue, tho' they are endow'd with all that is good, so then are some Men who have so natural a Propensity to what they should follow, that they learn it almost as soon as they learn it. Plants and Vegetables are cultivated into the Production of finer Fruit than they would yield without that Care and yet we cannot entertain Hopes of producing a tenacious conscious Spirit into Acts of Virtue, without the same Method as is used to cut Limber, or give new Shape to a Piece of Stone.

It is wholly to this dreadful Practice that we may attribute a certain Hardness and Ferocity which some Men, tho' liberally educated, carry about them in all their Behaviour. So be bred like a Gentleman, and punished like a Malefactor, must, as we see it does, produce that illiberal Stupidity which we see sometimes in Men of Letters.

The Spartan Boy who suffered the Fox (which he had stolen and hid under his Coat) to eat into his Bowels, I dare say had not half the Wit or Petulance which we learn at great Schools among us. But the glorious Scour of Honour, or rather Fear of Shame, which he demonstrated in that Action, was worth all the Learning in the World without it.

It is an unthinking very melancholy Consideration, that a little Negligence can spoil us, but great Industry is necessary to improve us: the most excellent Natures are soon depreciated, but evil Tempers are long before they are exalted into good Habits. To help this by Punishments, is the same thing as killing a Man to cure him of a Drunkenness, when he comes to suffer Punishment in that one Circumstance, he is brought below the Existence of a rational Creature, and is in the State of a Brute that moves only by the Administration of Stripes. But since this Custom of educating by the Lash is suffered by the Gentry of Great Britain, I would prevail only that honest heavy Lads may be dismissed from Slavery sooner than they are at present, and not whipped on to their fourteenth or fifteenth Year, whether they expect any Progress from them or not. Let the Child's Capriciousness be forthwith examined, and [he] sent to some Melancholy Way of Life, without respect to his Birth, if Nature designed him for nothing higher. Let him go before he has innocently suffered, and is debased into a Dereliction of Mind for being what it is no Guilt to be, a plain Man. I would not here be supposed to have said, that our learned Men of either Robe who have been whipped at School, are not still Men of noble and liberal Minds, but I am sure they had been much more so than they are, had they never suffered that Infamy.

But tho' there is so little Care, as I have ob-

This Particularity a Set of Gigglers thought the most necessary Thing to be taken notice of in his whole Discourse, and made it an Occasion of Mirth during the whole time of Sermon. You should see one of them run to burst behind a I ut, another pointing to a Communion in another Verse, and a fourth with a rich Composure, as if she would if possible stifle her Laughter. There were many Gentlemen who looked at them stedfastly but this they took for ogling and admiring them. There was one of the merry ones in particular, that found out but just then that she had but five Fingers, for she fell a reckoning the pretty Pieces of Ivory over and over again to find her self Imployment and not laugh out. Would it not be expedient, Mr SPECTATOR, that the Churchwarden should hold up his Wand on these Occasions and keep the Decency of the Place as a Magistrate does the Peace in a Court of law here?

WHEN I was at Grand Cairo I picked up several Oriental Manuscripts which I have still by me. Among others I met with one entitled, The Visions of Mirzah, which I have read over with great Pleasure. I intend to give it to the Publick when I have no other Entertainment for them and shall begin with the first Vision, which I have translated Word for Word as follows

'On the fifth Day of the Moon which according to the Custom of my Forefathers I always keep holy, after having washed my self, and offered up my Morning Devotions, I ascended the high Hills of Megadot in order to pass the rest of the Day in Meditation and Prayer. As I was here

'uring my self on the Tops of the Mountains I

'fell into a profound Contemplation on the Vanity of human Life and pressing from one Thought to another, Surely, said I, Man is but a Shadow and I live a Dream. While I was thus musing, I cast my Eyes towards the Summit of a Rock that was not far from me, where I discerned one in the Habit of a Shepherd, with a little Musical Instrument in his Hand. As I looked upon him he applied it to his Lips, and began to play upon it. The Sound of it was exceeding sweet, and I wrought into a Variety of Tunes that were inexpressibly melodious and altogether different from any thing I had ever heard. They put me in mind of those heavenly Airs that are played to the dejected Souls of good Men upon their first Arrival in Paradise, to wear out the Impressions of the last Agonies, and qualify them for the Pleasures of that happy Place. My Heart melted away in secret Rapture.

'I had been often told that the Rock before me was the Haunt of a Genius, and that several of us had been entertained with Musick who had passed by it, but never heard that the Musician had before made himself visible. When he had ended my Thoughts by these transporting Airs which he played to taste the Pleasures of his Conversation, as I looked upon him like one astonish'd, he beckon'd to me, and by the waving of his Hand directed me to approach the Place where he sat. I drew near with that Reverence which is due to a superior Nature and as my Heart was entirely subd'd by the ravishing Strain I had heard, I fell down at his Feet and wept. The Genius smel'd upon me with a Look of Compassion and Affability that furnished him to my Imagination, and at once dispell'd all the Fears and Apprehensions with which I approached him. He lifted me from the Ground, and taking me by the hand Mirzah, said he I have heard thee in thy Soliloquies follow me.

'He then led me to the highest Pinnacle of the Rock, and placing me on the Top of it. Cast thy Eyes Eastward and he, and tell me what thou seest. I see, said I, a huge Valley and prodigious Tide of Water rolling through it. The Valley that thou seest said he is the Vale of Misery, and the Tide of Water that thou seest is part of the great Tide of Immortality. What is the Reason said I that the Tide I see rises out of it? The first Mist at once I nd, and again loses itself in the thick Mist at the other? What thou seest said he, is that Portion of Immortality which is called Time, measured out by the Sun, and reaching from the Beginning of the World to its Consummation. I examine now, said he this Sea that is bound'd with Darkness at both Ends, and tell me what thou discoverest in it. I see a Bridge, said I, standing in the Mist of the Tide. The Bridge thou seest said he is human Life consider it attentively. Upon a more search Survey of it, I found that it consisted of three-score and ten entire Arches, with several broken Arches which added to those that were entire made up the Number about a hundred. As I was counting the Arches the Genius told me that this Bridge consisted at first of a thousand Arches but that a great Flood swept away the rest, and left the

'Bridge in the ruinous Condition I now beheld it. But tell me further, said he, what thou discoverest on it. I see Multitudes of People passing over it, said I, and a black Cloud hanging on each End of it. As I looked more attentively, I saw several of the Passengers dropping thro' the Bridge, into the great Tide that flowed underneath it, and upon further Examination, perceived there were innumerable Trap doors that lay concealed in the Bridge, which the Passengers no sooner trod upon, but they fell thro' them into the Tide and immediately disappeared. The hidden Pit falls were set very thick at the Entrance of the Bridge, so that the Throngs of People no sooner broke through the Cloud but many of them fell into them. They grew thinner towards the Middle, but multiplied and lay closer together towards the End of the Arches that were entire.

There were indeed some Persons, but their Number was very small, that continued a kind of hobbling March on the broken Arches, but fell through one after another, being quite tired and spent with so long a Walk.

I passed some time in the Contemplation of this wonderful Structure, and the great Variety of Objects which it presented. My Heart was filled with a deep Melancholy to see several dropping unexpectedly in the midst of Mirth and Jollity, and catching at every thing that stood by them to save themselves. Some were looking up towards the Heavens in a thoughtful Posture, and in the midst of a Speculation stumbled and fell out of Sight. Multitudes were very busy in the Pursuit of Bubbles that glittered in their Eyes, and danced before them, but often when they thought themselves within the reach of them, their Footing failed and down they sunk. In this Confusion of Objects, I observed some with Scyteters in their Hands, and others with Urinals, who ran to and fro upon the Bridge, thrusting several Persons on Trip-door, which did not seem to lie in their Way, and which they might have escaped had they not been forced upon them.

The Genius seeing me indulge my self in this melancholy Prospect, told me I had dwelt long enough upon it. Take thine Eyes off the Bridge, said he, and tell me if thou yet seest any thing thou dost not comprehend. Upon looking up, What mean said I, those great Flocks of Birds that are perpetually hovering about the Bridge, and settling upon it from time to time? I see Vultures, Harpies, Ravens, Cormorants, and among many other feathered Creatures several little winged Boys, that perch in great Numbers upon the middle Arches. These, said the Genius, are Envy, Avarice, Superstition, Despair, Love, with the like Cares and Passions that infest human Life.

I here fetched a deep Sigh, Alas, said I, Man was made in vain! How is he given way to Misery and Mortality! tortured in Life, and swallowed up in Death! The Genius being moved with Compassion towards me, bid me quit

'so uncomfortable a Prospect. Look no more, said he, on Man in the first Stage of his Existence, in his setting out for Eternity, but cast thine Eye on that thiel Mist into which the Tide bears the several Generations of Mortals that fall into it. I directed my Sight as I was ordered, and (whether or no the good Genius strengthened it with any supernatural Force, or dissipated Part of the Mist that was before too thick for the Eye to penetrate) I saw the Valley opening at the further End, and spreading forth into an immense Ocean, that had a huge Rock of Adamant running through the midst of it, and dividing it into two equal Parts. The Clouds still rested on one half of it, inasmuch that I could discover nothing in it. But the other appeared to me a vast Ocean planted with innumerable Islands, that were covered with Fruits and Flowers, and interspersed with a thousand little shining Seas that ran among them. I could see Persons dressed in glorious Habits with Garlands upon their Heads, passing among the Trees, lying down by the Side of Fountains, or resting on Beds of Flowers, and could hear a confused Harmony of singing Birds, falling Waters, human Voices, and musical Instruments. Gladness grew in me upon the Discovery of so delightful a Scene. I wished for the Wings of an Eagle, that I might fly away to those happy Seats. But the Genius told me there was no Passage to them, except through the Gates of Death that I saw opening every Moment upon the Bridge. The Islands, said he, that he so rich and great before thee, and with which the whole Tree of the Ocean appears spotted is far as thou canst see, are more in Number than the Sands on the Sea shore, there are Myriads of Islands behind those which thou here discoverest, reaching further than thine Eye, or even thine Imagination can extend itself. These are the Mansions of good Men after Death who according to the Degree and Kinds of Virtue in which they excelled, are distributed among these several Islands, which abound with Pleasures of different Kinds and Degrees, suitable to the Relishes and Perfections of those who are settled in them. Every Island is a Paradise accommodated to its respective Inhabitants. Are not these, O Mirzah, Habitations worth contending for? Does Life appear miserable, that gives thee Opportunities of earning such a Reward? Is Death to be feared, that will convey thee to so happy an Existence? Think not Man was made in vain, who has such an Eternity reserved for him. I grazed with inexpressible Pleasure on these happy Islands. At length, said I, shew me now, I beseech thee, the Secrets that he hid under those dark Clouds which cover the Ocean on the other side of the Rock of Adamant. The Genius making me no Answer, I turned about to address myself to him a second time, but I found that he had left me. I then turned again to the Vision which I had been so long contemplating, but instead of the rolling Tide, the reeling Bridge, and the happy Islands, I saw nothing but the long hollow Valley of Bagdat, with Oxen, Sheep, and Camels grazing upon the Sides of it.

—*Cum mens divinos, atque os
Magna sonaturum, des rominis Iugis honorem*
Hor

THERE is no Character more frequently given to a Writer, than that of being a Genius. I have heard many a little Sonneteer called a fine Genius. There is not an Heroick Scribler in the Nation, that has not his Admirers who think him a great Genius, and as for your Smatterers in Tragedy, there is scarce a Man among them who is not cried up by one or other for a prodigious Genius.

My design in this Paper is to consider what is properly a great Genius, and to throw some Thoughts together on so uncommon a Subject.

Among great Geniuses those few draw the Admiration of all the World upon them, and stand up as the Prodiges of Mankind, who by the meer Strength of natural Parts, and without any Assistance of Arts or Learning, have produced Works that were the Delight of their own Times, and the Wonder of Posterity. There appears something nobly wild and extravagant in these great natural Geniuses, that is infinitely more beautiful than all the Turn and Polishing of what the French call a Bel Esprit, by which they would express a Genius refined by Conversation, Reflection, and the Reading of the most polite Authors. The greatest Genius [which] runs through the Arts and Sciences, takes a kind of Tincture from them, and falls unavoidably into Imitation.

Many of these great natural Geniuses that were never disciplined and broken by Rules of Art, are to be found among the Ancients, and in particular among those of the more Eastern Parts of the World. Homer has innumerable Flights that Virgil was not able to reach, and in the Old Testament we find several Passages more elevated and sublime than any in Homer. At the same time that we allow a greater and more daring Genius to the Ancients, we must own that the greatest of them very much failed in, or, if you will, that they were very much above the Nicety and Correctness of the Moderns. In their Similitudes and Allusions, provided there was a Likeness, they did not much trouble themselves about the Decency of the Comparison. Thus Solomon resembles the Nose of his Beloved to the Tower of Labanon which looketh toward Damascus, as the Coming of a Thief in the Night, is a Similitude of the same kind in the New Testament. It would be endless to make Collections of this Nature. Homer illustrates one of his Heroes encompassed with the Enemy by an Ass in a Field of Corn that has his Sides belaboured by all the Boys of the Village without stirring a Foot for it and another of them tossing to and fro in his Bed and hurring with Resentment, to a Piece of Flesh broiled on the Coals. This particular Failure in the Ancients, opens a large Field of Rallery to the little Wits, who can laugh at an Indecency but not relish the Sublime in these Sorts of Writings. The present Emperor of Persia, conformable to this Eastern way of Thinking, amidst a great many pompous Titles, denominated himself The Sun of Glory and the Nutmeg of Deli. In short, to cut off all Cavilling against the Ancients and particularly those of the warmer Climates, who had most Heat and Life in their Imaginations, we are to consider that the Rule of observing what the French call the Bienstance in an Allusion, has been found out of later Years, and in the colder Regions of the World, where we would make some Amends for our want of Force and Spirit, by a scrupulous Nicety and Exactness in our Compositions. Our Countryman Shakespear was a remarkable Instance of this first kind of great Geniuses.

I cannot quit this Head without observing that Pindar was a great Genius of the first Class, who was hurried on by a natural Fire and Impetuosity to vast Conceptions of things and noble Salies of Imagination. At the same time, can any thing be more ridiculous than for Men of a sober and moderate Fancy to imitate this Poet's Way of Writing in those monstrous Compositions which go among us under the Name of Pindricks? When I see People copying Works which, as Horace has represented them, are singular in their Kind, and immutable, when I see Men following Irregularities by Rule, and by the little Tricks of Art straining after the most unbounded Flights of Nature, I cannot but apply to them that Passage in Seneca.

—*Incerta hæc si tu postules Ratione certis facere, nihil plus agas,
Quàm si des operam, ut cum ratione insanas*

In short a modern Pindarick Writer, compared with Pindar, is like a Sister among the Camisars<sup>1</sup> compared with Virgil's Sibl. There is the Distortion, Grimace, and outward Figure, but no thing of that divine Impulse which raises the Mind above its self, and makes the Sounds more than human.

[There is another kind of great Geniuses which I shall place in a second Class, not as I think them inferior to the first, but only for Distinction's sake, as they are of a different kind. This second Class of great Geniuses are those that have formed themselves by Rules, and submitted the Greatness of their natural Talents to the Corrections and Restrains of Art. Such among the Graeks were Plato and Aristotle, among the Romans, Virgil and Tully, among the English, Milton and Sir Francis Bacon.

<sup>1</sup> The Camisars, or French Prophets, originally from the Cevennes, came into England in 1707. With violent agitations and distortions of body they prophesied and claimed also the power to work miracles, even venturing to prophesy that Dr Emes, a convert of theirs, should rise from the dead five months after burial.

'and seemed to carry such an Air of Importance in his Looks, that I could not help inquiring who he was, and was immediately answered, That he did not value himself upon nothing, for that he and his Ancestors had won so many Hats, that his ParLOUR looked like a Haberdasher's Shop. However this Thirst of Glory in them all, was the Reason that no one Man staid Lord of the Ring for above three Falls while I was amongst them.

'The young Muds, who were not Lookers on at these Exercises, were themselves engaged in some Diversion and upon my asking a Farmer's Son of my own Parish what he was gazing at with so much Attention, he told me, That he was seeing Betty Welch, whom I knew to be his Sweet-Heart, pitch a Bar.

'In short, I found the men endeavour'd to shew the Women they were no Cowards, and that the whole Company strived to recommend themselves to each other, by making it appear that they were all in a perfect State of Health, and fit to undergo any Fatigues of bodily Labour.

'Your Judgment upon this Method of Love and Gallantry, as it is at present practised amongst us in the Country, will very much oblige,
SIR, Yours, &c

If I would here put on the Scholar and Politician I might inform my Readers how these bodily Exercises or Games were formerly encouraged in all the Commonwealths of Greece, from whence the Romans afterwards borrowed their Pentathlon, which was composed of Running, Wrestling, Leaping, Throwing, and Boxing, tho' the Prizes were generally nothing but a Crown of Cypress or Parsley, Hats not being in fashion in those Days. That there is an old Statute, which obliges every Man in England, having such an Estate, to keep and exercise the long Bow by which Means our Ancestors excelled all other Nations in the Use of that Weapon, and we had all the real Advantages, without the Inconvenience of a standing Army. And that I once met with a Book of Projects, in which the Author considering to what noble Ends that Spirit of Emulation, which so remarkably shews itself among our common People in these Wakes, might be directed, proposes that for the Improvement of all our handicraft Trades there should be annual Prizes set up for such Persons as were most excellent in their several Arts. But laying aside all these political Considerations, which might tempt me to pass the Limits of my Paper, I confess the greatest Benefit and Convenience that I can observe in these Country Festivals is the bringing young People together, and giving them an Opportunity of shewing themselves in the most advantageous Light. A Country Fellow that throws his Rival upon his Back, has generally as good Success with their common Mistress as nothing is more usual than for a nimble footed Wench to get a Husband at the same time she wins a Smock. Love and Marriages are the natural Effects of these anniversary Assemblies. I must therefore very much approve the Method by which my Correspondent tells me each Sex endeavour's to recommend it self, to the other, since nothing seems more likely to promise a healthy Offspring or a happy Cohabitation. And I believe I may assure my Country Friend, that there has been many a Court Lady who would be contented to exchange her crony young Husband for Tom Short, and several Men of Quality who would have parted with a tender Yoke fellow for Black Kate.

I am the more pleas'd with having Love made the principal End and Design of these Meetings, as it seems to be most agreeable in the Intent for which they were at first instituted, as we are informed by the learned Dr Kenet, with whose Words I shall conclude my present Paper.

These Wakes, says he, were in Imitation of the ancient agapai, or Love-Fests, and were first established in England by Pope Gregory the Great, who in an Epistle to Melitus the Abbot gave Order that they should be kept in Sheds or Arbores made up with Branches and Boughs of Trees round the Church.

He adds, That this laudable Custom of Wakes prevailed for many Ages, till the nice Puritans began to exclaim against it as a Remnant of Popery and by degrees the precise Humour grew so popular, that at an Exeter Assizes the Lord Chief Baron Walter made an Order for the Suppression of all Wakes, but on Bishop Laud's complaining of this innovating Humour, the King commanded the Order to be reversed. X

NOTHING that is not a real Crime makes a Man appear so contemptible and little in the Eyes of the World as Inconstancy, especially when it regards Religion or Party. In either of these Cases, tho a Man perhaps does but his Duty in changing his Side, he not only makes himself hated by those he left, but is seldom heartily esteemed by those he comes over to.

In these great Articles of Life, therefore, a Man's Conviction ought to be very strong, and if possible so well timed that worldly Advantages may seem to have no Share in it, or Mankind will be ill natured enough to think he does not change Sides out of Principle, but either out of Levity of Temper or Prospects of Interest. Converts and Renegadoes of all kinds should take particular care to let the World see they set upon honourable Motives or whatever Approbations they may receive from themselves, and Applauses from those they converse with, they may be very well assured that they are the Scorn of all good Men, and the publick Marks of Infamy and Derision.

Irresolution on the Schemes of Life [which?] offer themselves to our Choice, and Inconstancy in pursuing them, are the greatest and most universal Causes of all our Disquiet and Unhappiness. When [Ambition] pulls one Way, Interest another, Inclination a third, and perhaps Reason contrary to all, a Man is likely to pass his Time but ill who has so many different Parties to please. When the Mind hovers among such a Variety of Allurements, it had better settle on a Way of Life that is not the very best we might have chosen, than grow old without determining our Choice, and go out of the World as the greatest Part of Mankind do, before we have resolved how to live in it. There is but one Method of setting our selves at Rest in this Particular, and that is by adhering stedfastly to one great End as the chief and ultimate Aim of all our Pursuits. If we are firmly resolved to live up to the Dictates of Reason, without any Regard to Wealth, Reputation, or the like Considerations, any more than as they fall in with our principal Design, we may go through Life with Steadiness and Pleasure but if we act by several broken Views, and will not only be virtuous, but wealthy, popular, and every thing that has a Value set upon it by the World, we shall live and die in Misery and Repentance.

One would take more than ordinary Care to guard ones self against this particular Imperfection, because it is that which our Nature very strongly inclines us to for if we examine our selves thoroughly, we shall find that we are the most changeable Beings in the Universe. In respect of our Understanding we often embrace and reject the very same Opinions, whereas Beings above and beneath us have probably no Opinions at all, or at least no Wavering and Uncertainties in those they have. Our Superiors are guided by Intuition, and our Inferiors by Instinct. In respect of our Wills, we fall into Crimes and recover out of them, are amiable or odious in the Eyes of our great Judge, and pass our whole Life in offending and asking Pardon. On the contrary, the Beings underneath us are not capable of sinning nor those above us of repenting. The one is out of the Possibilities of Duty, and the other fixed in an eternal Course of Sin, or an eternal Course of Virtue.

There is scarce a State of Life, or Stage in it which does not produce Changes and Revolutions in the Mind of Man. Our Schemes of Thought in Infancy are lost in those of Youth these too take a different Turn in Manhood, till old Age often leads us back into our former Infancy. A new Title or an unexpected Success throws us out of ourselves, and in a manner destroys our Identity. A cloudy Day, or a little Sun shine, have as great an Influence on many Constitutions, as the most real Blessings or Misfortunes. A Dream varies our Being, and changes our Condition while it lasts and every Passion, not to mention Health and Sickness, and the greater Alterations in Body and Mind, makes us appear almost different Creatures. If a Man is so distinguished among other Beings by this Infirmary, what can we think of such as make themselves remarkable for it even among their own Species? It is a very trifling Character to be one of the most variable Beings of the most variable Kind, especially if we consider that He who is the great Standard of Perfection has in him no Shadow of Change, but is the same Yesterday, To-day, and for ever.

As this Mutability of Temper and Inconsistency with our selves is the greatest Weakness of human Nature, so it makes the Person who is remarkable for it in a very particular Manner more ridiculous than any other Infirmary whatsoever, as it sets him in a greater Variety of foolish Lights, and distinguishes him from himself by an Opposition of partly coloured Characters. The most humorous Character in Horace is founded upon this Unevenness of Temper and Irregularity of Conduct.

porting [ones'] self under Affliction. The utmost we can hope for in this World is Contentment, if we run at any thing higher, we shall meet with nothing but Grief and Disappointments. A Man should direct all his Studies and Endeavours at making himself easy now, and happy hereafter.

The Truth of it is, if all the Happiness that is dispersed through the whole Race of Mankind in this World were drawn together, and put into the Possession of any single Man, it would not make a very happy Being. I thought on the contrary, if the Miseries of the whole Species were fixed in a single Person, they would make a very miserable one.

I am engaged in this Subject by the following Letter, which, though subscribed by a fictitious Name, I have reason to believe is not Imaginary.

'I am one of your Disciples, and endeavour to 'have up to your Rules, which I hope will incline 'you to pity my Condition. I shall open it to you 'in a very few Words. About three Years since 'a Gentleman, whom, I am sure, you yourself 'would have approved, made his Addresses to me. 'He had every thing to recommend him but in 'I state, so that my Friends, who all of them ap- 'plauded his Person, would not for the sake of 'both of us favour his Passion. For my own 'part, I resigned my self up entirely to the Dis- 'cretion of those who knew the World much 'better than my self, but still lived in hopes that 'some Juncture or other would make me happy 'in the Man, whom, in my Heart, I preferred to 'all the World being determined if I could not 'have him, to have no Body else. About three 'Months ago I received a Letter from him, re- 'quainting me, that by the Death of an Uncle he 'had a considerable Estate left him, which he said 'was welcome to him upon no other Account, but 'as he hoped it would remove all Difficulties that 'lay in the Way to our mutual Happiness. You 'may well suppose, Sir, with how much Joy I re- 'ceived this Letter, which was followed by se- 'veral others filled with those Expressions of Love 'and Joy, which I verily believe no Body felt 'more sincerely, nor knew better how to describe 'than the Gentleman I am speaking of. But Sir, 'how shall I be able to tell it you by the first 'Week's Post I received a Letter from an intimate 'Friend of this unhappy Gentleman, acquainting 'me that as he had just settled his Affairs, and 'was preparing for his Journey, he fell sick of a 'Fever and died. It is impossible to express to 'you the Distress I ran in upon this Occasion. I 'can only have Recourse to my Devotions and 'to the reading of good Books for my Consola- 'tion. And as I always take a particular Delight 'in those frequent Admonitions which 'you give to the Publick, it would be a very great 'Piece of Charity in you to lend me your Assist- 'ance in this Conjunction. If after the reading 'of the Letter you and your self in a Humour, 'rather to rally and ridicule, than to Comfort

'me, I desire you would throw it into the Fire, 'and think no more of it but if you are touched 'with my Misfortune, which is greater than I 'know how to bear, your Counsels may very 'much Support, and will infinitely Oblige the af- 'flicted

A Disappointment in Love is more hard to get over than any other, the Passion itself so softens and subdues the Heart, that it disables it from struggling or bearing up against the Woes and Distresses which befall it. The Mind meets with other Misfortunes in her whole Strength she stands collected within her self, and sustains the Shock with all the Force (which) is natural to her but a Heart in Love has its Foundations sapped, and immediately sinks under the Weight of Accidents that are disagreeable to its Favourite Passion.

In Afflictions Men generally draw their Consolations out of Books of Morality, which indeed are of great use to fortify and strengthen the Mind against the Impressions of Sorrow. Monsieur St. Evremont, who does not approve of this Method, recommends Authors (who) are apt to stir up Mirth in the Mind of the Readers, and fancies Don Quixote can give more Relief to an heavy Heart than Plutarch or Seneca, as it is much easier to divert Grief than to conquer it. This doubtless may have its Effects on some Tempers. I should rather have recourse to Authors of a quite contrary kind, that give us Instances of Calamities and Misfortunes, and shew Human Nature in its greatest Distresses.

If the Affliction we groan under be very heavy, we shall find some Consolation in the Society of great Sufferers as our selves, especially when we find our Companions Men of Virtue and Merit. If our Afflictions are light, we shall be comforted by the Comparison we make between our selves and our Fellow Sufferers. A Loss at Scr, a Fit of Sickness, or the Death of a Friend, are such Trifles when we consider whole Kingdoms laid in Ashes, Families put to the Sword, Wretches shut up in Dungeons, and the like Calamities of Mankind, that we are out of Countenance for our own Weakness, if we sink under such little Strokes of Fortune.

Let the Disconsolate Leonora consider, that at the very time in which she languishes for the Loss of her deceiver I over, there are Persons in several Parts of the World just perishing in a Shipwreck others crying out for Mercy in the Terror of a Death bed Repentance others lying under the Tortures of an infamous Execution, or the like dreadful Calamities and she will find her Sorrows vanish at the Appearance of those which are so much greater and more astonishing.

I would further propose to the Consideration of my afflicted Disciple, that possibly what she now looks upon as the greatest Misfortune, is not really such in itself. For my own part, I question not but our Souls in a separate State will look back on their Lives in quite another View, than what they had of them in the Body, and that what they

The Mind that hath any Cast towards Devotion, naturally flies to it in its Afflictions

When I was in France I heard a very remarkable Story of two Lovers, which I shall relate at length in my to-Morrow's Paper, not only because the Circumstances of it are extraordinary, but because it may serve as an Illustration to all that can be said on this last Head and shew the Power of Religion in abating that particular Anguish which seems to lie so heavy on Leopold. The Story was told me by a Priest, as I travelled with him in a Stage Coach. I shall give it my Reader as well as I can remember, in his own Words, after having premised, that if Consolations may be drawn from a wrong Religion and a misguided Devotion, they cannot but flow much more naturally from those which are founded upon Reason, and established in good Sense

CONSTANTIA was a Woman of extraordinary Wit and Beauty, but very unhappy in a Father, who having arrived at great Riches by his own Industry, took delight in nothing but his Money. Theodosius was the younger Son of a decayed Family of great Parts and Learning, improved by a genteel and virtuous Education. When he was in the twentieth year of his Age, he became acquainted with Constantia, who had not then passed her fifteenth. As he lived but a few Miles Distance from her Father's House, he had frequent opportunities of seeing her and by the Advantages of a good Person and a pleasing Conversation, made such an Impression in her Heart as it was impossible for time to efface. He was himself no less smitten with Constantia. A long Acquaintance made them still discover new Beauties in each other, and by Degrees roused in them that mutual Passion which had an Influence on their following Lives. It unfortunately happened, that in the midst of this intercourse of Love and Friendship between Theodosius and Constantia, there broke out an irreparable Quarrel between their Parents, the one blaming himself too much upon his Birth, and the other upon his Possessions. The Father of Theodosius, that he contracted an unreasonable Aversion towards his Son, insomuch that he forbade him his House, and charged his Daughter upon her Duty never to see him more. In the mean time to break off all Communication between the two Lovers, who he knew entertained secret Hopes of some favourable Opportunity that should bring them together, he found out a young Gentleman of a good Fortune and an agreeable Person, whom he pitched upon as a Husband for his Daughter. He soon conceived this Affair so well, that he told Constantia it was his Design to marry her to such a Gentleman, and that her Wedding should be celebrated on such a Day. Constantia, who was conversed with the Authority of her Father, and unable to object anything to so advantageous a Match, received the Proposal with a profound Silence, which her Father commended in her, as the most decent manner of a Virgin's giving her Consent to an Overture of that kind. The Noise of this intended Marriage soon reached Theodosius, who, after a long tumult of Passions which naturally rise in a Lover's Heart on such an Occasion, writ the following letter to Constantia.

'The Thought of my Constantia, which for some years has been my only Happiness, is now become a greater Torment to me than I am able to bear. Must I then live to see you another's? The Streets, the Fields and Meadows, where we have so often talked together, grow painful to me. Life itself is become a Burden. May you long be happy in the World, but forget that there was ever such a Man in it.

THEODOSIUS

This Letter was conveyed to Constantia that very Evening, who fainted at the Reading of it and the next Morning she was much more alarmed by two or three Messengers, that came to her Father's House one after another to inquire if she had heard any thing of Theodosius, who it seems had left his Chamber about Midnight, and could nowhere be found. The deep Melancholy, which had hung upon his Mind some time before, made them apprehend the worst that could befall him. Constantia, who knew that nothing but the Report of her Marriage could have driven him to such Extremities, was not to be comforted. She now accused her self for having so tamely given an Ear to the Proposal of a Husband, and looked upon the new Lover as the Murderer of Theodosius. In short, she resolved to suffer the utmost Effects of her Father's Displeasure, rather than enmesh with a Marriage which appeared to her so full of Guilt and Horror. The Father seeing himself entirely rid of Theodosius, and desirous to keep a considerable Portion in his Family, was not very much concerned at the obstinate Refusal of his Daughter and did not find it very difficult to excuse himself upon this Account to his intended Son in Law, who had all along regarded this Alliance rather as a Marriage of Convenience than of Love. Constantia had now no Relief but in her Devotions and Exercises of Religion, to which her Afflictions had so entirely subjected her Mind, that after some Years had abated the Violence of her Sorrows, and settled her Thoughts in a kind of Tranquillity, she resolved to pass the Remainder of her Days in a Convent. Her Father was not displeased with [1] Resolution, [which?] would save Money in his Family, and readily complied with his Daught-ter's Intentions. Accordingly in the twenty-fifth Year of her Age, while her Beauty was yet in all its Height and Plomb, he carried her to a neighbouring City, in order to look out a Sisterhood of Nuns among whom to place his Daughter.

There was in this Place a Father of a Convent who was very much renowned for his Piety and exemplary Life and as it is usual in the Romish Church for those who are under any great Afflic-tion, or Trouble of Mind, to apply themselves to the most eminent Confessors for Pardon and Consolation, our beautiful Virgin took the Opportunity of confessing herself to this celebrated Father.

We must now return to Theodosius, who the very Morning that the above mentioned Inquiries had been made after him, arrived at a religious House in the City, where now Constantia resided and desiring that Secrecy and Concealment of the Fathers of the Convent, which is very usual upon any extraordinary Occasion, he made himself one of the Order, with a private Vow never to enquire after Constantia whom he looked upon as given away to his Rival upon the Day on which, according to common Fame, their Marriage was to have been solemnized. Having in his Youth made a good Progress in Learning, that he might decate [himself]<sup>1</sup> more entirely to Religion, he entered into holy Orders, and in a few Years became renowned for his Sanctity of Life and those pious Sentiments which he inspired into all [whom]<sup>2</sup> conversed with him. It was this holy Man to whom Constantia had determined to apply herself in Confession, tho' neither she nor any other besides the Prior of the Convent, knew any thing of his Name or Family. The day, the amiable Theodosius had now taken upon him the Name of Father Francis, and was so far concealed in a long Beard, a [shaven]<sup>3</sup> Head, and a religious Habit, that it was impossible to discover the Man of the World in the venerable Conventual.

As he was one Morning shut up in his Con-fessional, Constantia kneeling by him opened the State of her Soul to him and after having given him the History of a Life full of Innocence, she burst out in Tears, and entered upon that Part of her Story in which he himself had so great a Share.
My Behaviour, says she, has I fear been the Death of a Man who had no other Fault but that of loving me too much. Heaven only knows how dear he was to me whilst he liv'd, and how bitter the Remembrance of him has been to me since his Death. She here paused, and lifted up her Eyes that stream'd with Tears towards the Father who was so moved with the Sense of her Sorrows that he could only command his Voice, which was broke with Sighs and Sobbings, so far as to bid her proceed. She followed his Directions, and in a Flood of Tears pour'd out her Heart before him.
The Father could not forbear weeping aloud, in somewhat that in the Agonies of his Grief the Seat shook under him. Constantia, who thought the good Man was thus moved by his Compassion towards her, and by the Horror of her Guilt, proceeded with the utmost Contrition to acquaint him with that Vow of Virginity in which she was going to engage herself, as the proper Atonement for her Sins, and the only Sacrifice she could make to the Memory of Theodosius. The Father, who by this time had pretty well composed himself, burst out in unmuterous joy, hearing that Name to which he had been so long desirous, and upon receiving this his news of an unparalleled Fidelity from one who he thought had several Years since given herself up to the Possession of another.

Amidst the Interruptions of his Sorrow, seeing his Penitent overwhelmed with Grief, he was only able to bid her from time to time be comforted
— I tell her that her Sins were forgiven her—

That her Guilt was not so great as she apprehended— That she should not suffer her self to be afflicted above Measure. After which he recovered himself enough to give her the Absolu-tion in Form directing her at the same time to return to him again the next Day, that he might encourage her in the pious Resolutions she had taken, and give her suitable Exhortations for her behaviour in it. Constantia retired, and the next Morning renewed her Applications. Theodosius having renewed his Soul with proper Thoughts and Reflections, exerted himself on this Occasion in the best Manner he could to animate his Penitent in the Course of Life she was entering upon, and wear out of her Mind those groundless Fears and Apprehensions which had taken Possession of it concluding with a Promise to her, that he would from time to time continue his Admonitions when she should have taken upon her the holy Veil. The Rules of our respective Orders, says he, will not permit that I should see you, but you may assure your self not only of having a Place in my Prayers, but of receiving such frequent Instructions as I can convey to you by Letters. Go on cheerfully in the glorious Course you have undertaken and you will quickly find such a Peace and Satisfaction in your Mind, which it is not in the Power of the World to give.

Constantia's Heart was so elevated with the Discourse of Father Francis, that the very next Day she entered upon her Vow. As soon as the Solemnities of her Reception were over, she returned, as it is usual, with the Abbess into her own Apartment.

The Abbess had been informed the Night before of all that had passed between her Novice and Father Francis. From whom she now delivered to her the following Letter.

'As the first fruits of those Joys and Consola-
'tions which you may expect from the Life you 'are now engaged in, I must requirunt you that 'Theodosius, whose Death sits so heavy upon 'your Thoughts, is still alive and that the Father,
'to whom you have confessed your self, was once
'that Theodosius whom you so much lament.
'The love which we have had for one another will 'make us more happy in its Disappointment than
'it could have done in its Success. Providence
'has disposed of us for our Advantage, tho' not
'according to our Wishes. Consider your Theo'dosius still as dead, but assure your self of one 'who will not cease to pray for you in Father with the Contents of the Letter and upon reflecting on the Voice of the Person, the Behaviour, and above all the extreme Sorrow of the Father during her Confession, she discovered Theodosius in every Particular. After having wept with Tears of Joy, it is enough, says she, Theodosius is still in Being. I shall live with Comfort and die in Peace.

The Letters which the Father sent her afterwards are yet current in the Nunnery where she resided and are often read to the young Religious, in order to inspire them with good Resolutions and Sentiments of Virtue. It so happened, that after Constantia had lived about ten Years in the Cloyster, a violent Plaver broke out in the Place, which swept away great Multitudes and among others Theodosius. Upon his Death bed he sent his Benediction in a very moving Manner to Constantia, who at that time was herself so far gone in the same fatal Disorder that she lay delirious. Upon the Interval which generally precedes Death in Sickneses of this Nature, the Abbess, finding that the Physician had given her over, told her that Theodosius was just gone before her, and that he had sent her his Benediction in his last Moments. Constantia received it with Pleasure. And now, says she, If I do not ask anything improper, let me be buried by Theodosius. My Vow reaches no farther than the Grave. What I ask is, I hope no Violation of it. — She died soon after, and was interred according to her Request.

Their Tombs are still to be seen with a short Latin Inscription over them to the following Purpose.

Here lie the Bodies of Father Francis and Sister Constance. They were lonely in their Lives, and in their Deaths they were not divided. C

I HAVE often wished, that as in our Constitution there are several Persons whose Business it is to watch over our Laws, our Liberties and Commerce, certain Men might be set apart as Superintendants of our Language, to hinder any Words of a Foreign Coin from passing among us, and in particular to prohibit any French Phrases from becoming Current in this Kingdom, when those of our own Stamp are altogether as valuable. The present War has so adulterated our Tongue with strange Words, that it would be impossible for one of our Great Grandfathers to know what his Posterity have been doing, were he to read their Exploits in a Modern News Paper. Our Warriors are very industrious in propagating the French Language, at the same time that they are so gloriously successful in beating down their Power. Our Soldiers are Men of strong Heads for Action, and perform such Feats as they are not able to express. They want Words in their own Tongue to tell us what it is they Achieve, and therefore send us over Accounts of their Performances in a Jargon of Phrases, which they learn among their Conquered Enemies. They ought however to be provided with Secretaries, and assisted by our Foreign Ministers, to tell their Story for them in plain English, and to let us know in our Mother-Tongue what it is our brave Country-Men are about. The French would indeed be in the right to publish the News of the present War in English Phrases, and make their Campaigns intelligible. Their People might flatter themselves that things are not so bad as they really are, were they thus polluted with Foreign Terms, and thrown into Shades and Obscurity, but the English cannot be too clear in their Narrative of those Actions, which have raised their Country to a higher Pitch of Glory than it ever yet arrived at, and which will be still the more admired the better they are explained.

For my part, by that time a Siege is carried on two or three Days, I am altogether lost and bewildered in it, and meet with so many inexplicable Difficulties, that I scarce know what Side has the better of it, till I am informed by the Tower Guns that the Place is surrendered. I do indeed make some Allowances for this Part of the War, Fortifications having been foreign Inventions, and upon that Account abounding in foreign Terms. But when we have won Battels (which I may be described in our own Language, why are our Papers filled with so many unintelligible Exploits, and the French obliged to lend us a Part of their Tongue before we can know how they are Conquered? They must be made necessary to their own Disgrace, as the Britons were formerly so artificially wrought in the Curtin of the Roman Theatre, that they seemed to draw it up in order to give the Spectators an Opportunity of seeing their own Defeat celebrated upon the Stage. hard Words and dark Expressions in which our News Papers do so much abound I have seen many a prudent Citizen, after having read every Article, inquire of his next Neighbour what News the Mail had brought.

I remember in that remarkable Year when our Country was delivered from the greatest Fears and Apprehensions, and raised in the greatest Height of Gladness it had ever felt since it was a Nation, I mean the Year of bi centum, I had the Copy of a Letter sent me out of the Country, which was written from a young Gentleman in the Army to his Father, a Man of a good Estate and plain Sense. As the Letter was very modestly chequered with this Modern Military Eloquence, I shall present my Reader with a Copy of it.

SIR,

Upon the Junction of the French and Bavarian Armies they took Post behind a great Morass which they thought impracticable. Our General the next Day sent a Party of Horse to reconnoitre them from a little Hauteur, at about a [Quarter of an Hour's] distance from the Army, who returned again to the Camp unobserved through several Defiles, in one of which they met with a Party of French that had been Marauding, and made them all Prisoners at Discretion. The Day after a Drum arrived at our Camp, with a Message which he would communicate to none but the General: he was followed by a Trumpet who they say behaved himself very bravely, with a Message from the Duke of Bavaria. The next Morning our Army being divided into two Corps, made a Movement towards the Enemy. You will hear in the Public Prints how we treated them, with the other Circumstances of that glorious Day. I had the good Fortune to be in that Regiment that pushed the Genes d'Armes. Several French Battalions, who some say were a Corps de Reserve, made a Show of Resistance, but it only proved a Gasconade, for upon our preparing to fill up a little Fossé, in order to attack them, they bent the Charge, and sent us Charlie Blanche. Their Commandant, with a great many other General Officers, and Troops without number, are made Prisoners of War, and will I believe give you a Visit in England, the Cartel not being yet settled. Not questioning but these Particulars will be very welcome to you, I congratulate you upon them, and am your most dutiful Son, &c.

The Father of the young Gentleman upon the Perusal of the Letter found it contained great News, but could not guess what it was. He immediately communicated it to the Curate of the Parish, who upon the reading of it, being vexed to see any thing he could not understand, fell into a kind of a Passion, and told him that his Son had sent him a Letter that was neither Fish, nor Flesh, nor good Red-Herring. I wish, says he, the Captain may be Compos Mentis, he talks of a saucy Trumpet, and a Drum that carries Messages then who is this Charlie Blanche? He must either banter us or he is out of his Senses. The Father, who always looked upon the Curate as a learned Man, began to fret inwardly at his Son's Usage, and producing a Letter which he had written to him about three Posts before, You see here, says he, when he writes for Money he knows how to speak intelligibly enough: there is no Man in England can express himself clearer, when he wants a new Furniture for his Horse. In short, the old Man was so puzzled upon the Point, that it might have fared ill with his Son, had he not seen all the Prints about three Days after filled with the same Terms of Art, and that Charles only writ like other Men. ARISTOTLE tells us that the World is a Copy or Transcript of those Ideas which are in the Mind of the first Being, and that those Ideas, which are in the Mind of Man, are a Transcript of the World. To this we may add, that Words are the Transcript of those Ideas which are in the Mind of Man, and that Writing or Printing are the Transcript of Words.

As the Supreme Being has expressed, and as it were printed his Ideas in the Creation, Men express their Ideas in Books, which by this great Invention of these latter Ages may last as long as the Sun and Moon, and perish only in the general Wreck of Nature. This Cowley in his Poem on the Resurrection, mentioning the Destruction of the Universe, has those admirable Lines

Now all the rude extended Sky,
And all th' harmonious Worlds on high,
And Virgil's sacred Work shall die

There is no other Method of fixing those Thoughts which arise and disappear in the Mind of Man, and transmitting them to the last Periods of time: no other Method of giving a Permanency to our Ideas, and preserving the Knowledge of any particular Person, when his Body is mixed with the common Mass of Matter, and his Soul retired into the World of Spirits. Books are the Legacies that a great Genius leaves to Mankind, which are delivered down from Generation to Generation, as Presents to the Posterity of those who are yet unborn.

All other Arts of perpetuating our Ideas continue but a short Time. Statues can last but a few Thousands of Years, Edifices fewer, and Colours still fewer than Edifices. Michael Angelo, Ioniana, and Raphael, will hereafter be what Phidias, Vitruvius, and Apelles are at present the Names of great Statuaries, Architects and Painters, whose Works are lost. The several Arts are expressed in moulding Materials. Nature sinks under them, and is not able to support the Ideas which are imprinted upon it.

The Circumstance which gives Authors an Advantage above all these great Masters, is this, that they can multiply their Originals, or rather can make Copies of their Works, to what Number

But the Folly of him who lets his Fancy place him in distant Scenes untroubled and uninterrupted, is very much preferable to that of him who is ever forcing a Belief, and defending his Untruths with new Inventions. But I shall harken to let this Liar in Soliloquy, who calls himself a CASTLE-BUILDER, describe himself with the same Unreservedness as formerly appeared in my Correspondent above mentioned. If a Man were to be serious on this Subject, he might give very grave Admonitions to those who are following any thing in this Life, on which they think to place their Hearts, and tell them that they are really CASTLE BUILDERS. Fame, Glory, Wealth, Honour, have in the Prospect pleasing Illusions, but they who come to possess any of them will find they are Ingredients towards Happiness, to be regarded only in the second Place, and that when they are valued in the first Degree, they are as disappointing as any of the Phantoms in the following Letter

Mr SPECTATOR,

Sept 6, 1711

'I am a Fellow of a very odd Frame of Mind, as you will find by the Sequel and think myself too fool enough to deserve a Place in your Paper. I am unhappily far gone in Building, and am one of that Species of Men who are properly denominated Castle Builders, who scorn to be beholden to the Earth for a Foundation, or dig in the Bowels of it for Materials, but erect their Structures in the most unstable of Elements, the Air, Fancy alone laying the Line, marking the Extent, and shaping the Model. It would be difficult to enumerate what august Palaces and stately Porticoes have grown under my forming Imagination, or what verdant Meadows and shady Groves have started into Being, by the powerful Force of a warm Fancy. A Castle builder is even just what he pleases, and as such I have grasped imaginary Scepters, and delivered uncontrollable Edicts, from a Throne to which conquered Nations yielded Obedience. I have made I know not how many Inroads into France, and ravaged the very Heart of that Kingdom, I have dined in the Lozars, and drunk Cham-pagne at Versailles, and I would have you take Notice, I am not only able to vanquish a People already cowed and accustomed to Flight, but I could, Almanzor-like, drive the British General from the Field, were I less a Protestant, or had ever been affronted by the Confederates. There is no Art or Profession, whose most celebrated Masters I have not eclipsed. Where ever I have afforded my Salutary Preference, I have ceased to burn, and Agues to shake the Human Fabric. When an eloquent I have been upon me, in apt Gesture and proper Ordeence, I have animated each Sentence, and grazing Crowds have found their Passions work'd up into Rage, or soothed into a Calm. I am short and not very well made, yet upon Sight of a fine Woman, I have stretched into proper Stature, and filled with a good Air and Mien. These are the very Phantoms that dance before my willing Eyes

'and compose my Day-Dreams. I should be the most contented happy Man alive, were the Chimerical Happiness, which springs from the Paintings of the Fancy less fleeting and transitory. But alas! it is with Grief of Mind I tell you, the least Breath of Wind has often demolished my magnificent Edifices, swept away my Groves, and left no more Trace of them than if they had never been. My Lachrypher has sunk and vanished by a Rap on my Door, the Salutation of a Friend has cost me a whole Continent, and in the same Moment I have been pulled by the Sleeve, my Crown has fallen from my Head. The ill Consequence of these Reveries is inconceivably great, seeing the loss of imaginary Possessions makes Impressions of real Woe. Besides, had Oeconomy in visible and apparent in Builders of invisible Mansions. My Tenant's Advertisements of Ruins and Dilapidations often cast a Damp on my Spirits, even in the Instant when the Sun, in all his Splendor, gilds my Eastern Palaces. Add to this the pensive Drudgery in Building, and constant grasping Aerol frowels, districts and shatters the Mind, and the fond Builder of Babel's is often cursed with an incoherent Diversity and Confusion of Thoughts. I do not know to whom I can more properly apply myself for Relief from this fantastical Evil, than to your self, whom I earnestly importune to accommodate me with a Method how to settle my Head and cool my Brain-pan. A Discretion on Castle Building may not only be serviceable to myself, but all Architects, who display their Skill in the thin Element. Such a Favour would oblige me to make my next Soliloquy not contain the Prizes of my dear Self, but of the SPECTATOR, who shall, by complying with this, make me

'Years since I felt his heavy Hand, yet still once 'a Month at least I dream of him, so strong an 'Impression did he make on my Mind 'Tis a 'Sign he has fully terrified me waking, who still 'continues to haunt me sleeping

'And yet I may say without Vanity, that the 'Business of the School was what I did without 'great Difficulty and I was not remarkably 'unlucky, and yet such was the Master's Severity
'that once a Month, or oftner, I suffered as much 'as would have satisfied the Law of the Land for 'a Petty Larceny

'Many a white and tender Hand, which the 'fond Mother has passionately kissed a thousand
'and a thousand times, have I seen whipped till
'it was covered with Blood perhaps for smiling,
'or for going a Yard and half out of a Gate, or
'for writing an O for an A, or an A for an O
'These were our great Faults Many a brave
'and noble Spirit has been there broken others
'have run from thence and were never heard of 'afterwards

'It is a worthy Attempt to undertake the Cause
'of distressed Youth and it is a noble Piece of 'Knight-Errantry to enter the Lists against so 'many armed Pedagogues 'Tis pity but we had 'a Set of Men, polite in their Behaviour and 'Method of Teaching, who should be put into a 'Condition of being above flattering or flogging the 'Parents of those they instruct We might then 'possibly see Learning become a Pleasure, and 'Children delighting themselves in that which
'now they abhor for coming upon such hard
'Terms to them What would be a still greater 'Happiness arising from the Cure of such In'structors, would be, that we should have no more
'Pedants, nor any bred to Learning who had not 'Genius for it I am, with the utmost Sincerity,

MR. SPECTATOR,

'You have represented several sorts of Imper-
'fections singly, I wish you would now proceed,
'and describe some of them in Sets It often 'happens in publick Assemblies, that a Party who 'came thither together, or whose Impertinencies
'are of an equal Piece, set in Concert, and are so 'full of themselves as to give Disturbance to all 'that are about them Sometimes you have a Set of 'Whisperers, who lay their Heads together in order
'to sacrifice every Body within their Observa'tion sometimes a Set of Laughers, that keep 'up an insipid Mirth in their own Corner, and by 'their Noise and Gestures shew they have no
'Respect for the rest of the Company You
'frequently meet with these Sets at the Opera,
'the Play, the Water-works, and other publick
'Meetings, where their whole Business is to draw 'off the Attention of the Spectators from the 'Entertainment, and to fix it upon themselves,
'and it is to be observed that the Impertinence
'is ever loudest, when the Set happens to be made 'up of three or four Females who have got what 'you call a Woman's Man among them

'I am at a loss to know from whom People of

MAN is subject to innumerable Pains and Sorrows by the very Condition of Humanity, and yet, as if Nature had not sown Evils enough in Life, we are continually adding Grief to Grief, in aggravating the common Calamity by our cruel Treatment of one another Every Man's natural Weight of Afflictions is still made more heavy by the Envy, Malice, Treachery, or Injustice of his Neighbour At the same time that the Storm beats upon the whole Species, we are falling foul upon one another

Half the Misery of Human Life might be extinguished, would Men alleviate the general Curse they lie under, by mutual Offices of Compassion, Benevolence, and Humanity There is nothing therefore which we ought more to encourage in our selves and others, than that Disposition of Mind which in our Language goes under the Title of Good-nature, and which I shall chuse for the Subject of this Day's Speculation

Good nature is more agreeable in Conversation than Wit, and gives a certain Air to the Countenance which is more amiable than Beauty It shows Virtue in the fairest Light takes off in some measure from the Deformity of Vice, and makes even Folly and Impertinence supportable

There is no Society or Conversation to be kept up in the World without Good nature, or something which must bear its Appearance, and supply its Place For this Reason Mankind have been forced to invent a kind of Artificer Humankind, which is what we express by the Word Good-breeding For if we examine thoroughly the Idea of what we call so we shall find it to be nothing else but in Imitation and Mimicry of Good-nature, or in other Terms, Affability, Comphiance and easiness of Temper reduced into an Art.

These exterior Snows and Appearances of Humanity render a Man wonderfully popular and beloved when they are founded upon a real Good-nature but without it are like Hypocrisy in Religion, or a bare Form of Holiness, which, when it is discovered, makes a Man more detestable than professed Impiety

Good nature is generally born with us Health, Prosperity and kind Treatment from the World are great Chenshers of it where they find it, but nothing is capable of forcing it up, where it does not grow of itself It is one of the Blessings of a happy Constitution, which Education may improve but not produce.

Xenophon<sup>1</sup> in the Life of his Imaginary Prince, whom he describes as a Pattern for Real ones, is always celebrating the Philanthropy or Good-nature of his Hero, which he tells us he brought into the World with him, and gives many remarkable Instances of it in his Childhood, as well as in all the several Parts of his Life Nay, on his Death-bed, he describes him as being pleased, that while his Soul returned to him (who<sup>2</sup>) made it, his Body should incorporate with the great Mother of all things, and by that means become beneficial to Mankind For which Reason, he gives his Sons a positive Order not to enshrine it in Gold or Silver, but to lay it in the Earth as soon as the Life was gone out of it.

An Instance of such an Overflowing of Humanity, such an exuberant Love to Mankind, could not have entered into the Imagination of a Writer, who had not a Soul filled with great Ideas, and a general Benevolence to Mankind

In that celebrated Passage of Salust,<sup>3</sup> where Cæsar and Cato are placed in such beautiful, but opposite Lights Cæsar's Character is chiefly made up of Good nature, as it shewed it self in all its Forms towards his Friends or his Enemies, his Servants or Dependents, the Guilty or the Distressed As for Cato's Character, it is rather awful than amiable Justice seems most agreeable to the Nature of God, and Mercy to that of Man. A Being who has nothing to Pardon in himself, may reward every Man according to his Works but he whose very best Actions must be seen with Grains of Allowance, cannot be too mild, moderate, and forgiving For this reason, among all the monstrous Characters in Human Nature, there is none so odious, nor indeed so exorbitantly Ridiculous, as that of a rigid severe Temper in a Worthless Man

This Part of Good nature, however, which consists in the pardoning and overlooking of Faults, is to be exercised only in doing our selves Justice, and that too in the ordinary Commerce and Occurrences of Life for in the publick Administrations of Justice, Mercy to one may be Cruelty to others

It is grown almost into a Maxim, that Good-natured Men are not always Men of the most Wit This Observation, in my Opinion, has no

Foundation in Nature. The greatest Wits I have conversed with are Men eminent for their Humanity. I take therefore this Remark to have been occasioned by two Reasons. First, Because Ill nature. Among ordinary Observers passes for Wit. A spiteful Saying gratifies so many little Passions in those who hear it, that it generally meets with a good Reception. The Laugh rises upon it, and the Man who utters it is looked upon as a shrewd Satyrast. This may be one Reason, why a great many pleasant Compositions appear so surprisingly dull, when they have endeavour'd to be Merry in Print, the Publick being more just than Private Clubs or Assemblies, in disingushing between what is Wit and what is Ill nature.

Another Reason why the Good-natured Man may sometimes bring his Wit in Question, is, perhaps, because he is apt to be moved with Compression for those Misfortunes or Infirmities, which another would turn into Ridicule, and by that means gain the Reputation of a Wit. The Ill-natured Man, though but of equal Parts, gives himself a larger Field to expatiate in: he exposes those Faults in Human Nature which the other would cast a Veil over, laughs at Vices which the other either excuses or conceals, gives utterance to Reflections which the other stifles, fills indifferently upon Friends or Enemies, exposes the Person [who] has oblig'd him, and, in short, sticks at nothing that may establish his Character of a Wit. It is no Wonder therefore he succeeds in it better than the Man of Humanity, as a Person who makes use of indirect Methods, is more likely to grow Rich than the Fair Trader. L.

HENRY BOYLE, ESQ.:

SIR,

AS the profest Design of this Work is to entertain its Readers in general, without giving Offence to any particular Person, it would be difficult to find out so proper a Patron for it as Your Self, there being none whose Merit is more universally acknowledged by all Parties, and who has made himself more Friends and fewer Enemies. Your great Abilities, and unquestioned Integrity, in those high Employments, which You have passed through, would not have been able to have rais'd You this general Approbation, had they not been accompanied with that Moderation in an high Fortune, and that Affability of Manners, which are so conspicuous through all Parts of your Life. Your Aversion to any Ostentatious Arts of setting to Show those great Services which you have done the Publick, has not hitherwise a little contributed to that Universal Acknowledgment which is paid You by your Country.

The Consideration of this Part of Your Character, is that which hinders me from enlarging on those Extraordinary Talents, which have given You so great a Figure in the British Senate, as well as on that Elegance and Politeness which appear in Your more retir'd Conversation. I should be unpardonable, if, after what I have said, I should longer detain You with an Address of this Nature. I cannot, however, conclude it without owning those great Obligations which You have had upon,

*In amore hæc omnia insunt vitia injuria,

UPON looking over the Letters of my female Correspondents, I find several from Women

<sup>1</sup> Henry Boyle, to whom the third volume of the Spectator is dedicated was the youngest son of Charles, Lord Clifford one of the family founded by the Richard, Earl of Cork, who bought Raleigh's property in Ireland from March, 1701, to February, 1707. Henry Boyle was King William's Chancellor of the Exchequer. He was then, till September, 1720, one of the principal Secretaries of State. He had materially helped complaining of jealous Husbands, and at the same time protesting their own Innocence and desiring my Advice on this Occasion. I shall therefore take this Subject into my Consideration, and the more willingly, because I find that the Marquis of Halifax, who in his Advice to a Daughter,<sup>2</sup> has instructed a Wife how to behave her self towards a false, an intemperate, a choleric, a sullen, a covetous, or a silly Husband, has not spoken one Word of a Jealous Husband.

Addison by negotiating between him and Lord Godolphin respecting the celebration of the Battle of Blenheim. On the accession of George I Henry Boyle became Lord Carlton and President of the Council. He died in 1724 and had his Life written by Addison's cousin Budgell.

<sup>2</sup> Miscellanies by the late Lord Marquis of Halifax. (George Saville, who died in 1695), 1701, pp 18—31

Jealousy is that Pain which a Man feels from the Apprehension that he is not equally beloved by the Person whom he entirely loves Now, he cause our Inward Passions and Inclinations can never make themselves visible, it is impossible for a jealous Man to be thoroughly cured of his Suspensions. His Thoughts hung it best in a State of Doubtfulness and Uncertainty and are never capable of receiving any Satisfaction on the advantageous Side so that his Enquiries are most successful when they discover nothing His Pleasure arises from his Disappointments, and his Life is spent in Pursuit of a Secret that destroys his Happiness if he chance to find it.

An ardent Love is always a strong Ingredient in this Passion for the same Affection which stirs up the jealous Man's Desires, and gives the Party beloved so beautiful a Figure in his Imagination, makes him believe she kindles the same Passion in others, and appears as amiable to all Beholders And as Jealousy thus arises from an extraordinary Love, it is of so delicate a Nature, that it scorns to take up with any thing less than an equal Return of Love. Not the warmest Expressions of Affection, the softest and most tender Hypocrisy, are able to give any Satisfaction, where we are not persuaded that the Affection is real and the Satisfaction mutual I or the jealous Man wishes himself a kind of Deity to the Person he loves He would be the only Pleasure of her Senses, the Employment of her Thoughts and is angry at every thing she admires, or takes Delight in, besides himself

Phaedra's Request to his Mistress, upon his leaving her for three Days, is immutably beautiful and natural

*Cum milite isto praesens, absens ut sis
Dies, noctesque me ames, nec desideres
Me somnia me expectas de me cogites
Me speras me te oblectes in eum tota sis Meus fac sis postremo cum unus, quando ego sum tutus — Ter. Eun.*

The Jealous Man's Discourse is of so malignant a Nature, that it converts all he takes into its own Nourishment A cool Behaviour sets him on the Rack, and is interpreted as an instance of Aversion or Indifference a fond one raises his Suspensions, and looks too much like Dissimulation and Artifice If the Person he loves be cheerful, her Thoughts must be employed on another and if sad, she is certainly thinking on himself In short, there is no Word or Gesture so insignificant, but it gives him new Hints, feeds his Suspensions, and furnishes him with fresh Matters of Discovery So that if we consider the effects of this Passion, one would rather think it proceeded from an inveterate Hatred than an excessive Love for certainly none can meet with more Disquietude and Uneasiness than a suspected Wife, if we except the jealous Husband

* When you are in company with that Soldier, behave as if you were absent but continue to love me by Day and by Night want me dream of me expect me think of me wish for me delight in me be wholly with me in short, be my very Soul, as I am yours

But the great Unhappiness of this Passion is, that it naturally tends to alienate the Affection which it is so solicitous to engross, and that for these two Reasons, because it lays too great a Constraint on the Words and Actions of the suspected Person, and at the same time shows you have no honourable Opinion of her both of which are strong Motives to Aversion

Nor is this the worst Effect of Jealousy for it often draws after it a more fatal Train of Consequences, and makes the Person you suspect guilty of the very Crimes you are so much afraid of It is very natural for such who are treated ill and upbraided falsely, to find out an intimate Friend that will hear their Complaints, condole their Sufferings, and endeavour to soothe and to swage their secret Resentments Besides, Jealousy puts a Woman often in Mind of an ill Thing that she would not otherwise perhaps have thought of, and fills her Imagination with such an unlucky Idea, as in time grows familiar, excites Desire, and loses all the Shame and Horror which might at first attend it Nor is it a Wonder if she who suffers wrongfully in a Man's Opinion of her, and has therefore nothing to forfeit in his Esteem, resolves to give him reason for his Suspensions, and to enjoy the Pleasure of the Crime, since she must undergo the Ignominy Such probably were the Considerations that directed the wise Man in his Advice to Husbands, Be not jealous over the Wife of thy bosom, and teach her not an evil Lesson against thy self Eccles.

And here, among the other Torments which this Passion produces, we may usually observe that none are greater Mourners than jealous Men, when the Person [who] provoked their Jealousy is taken from them Then it is that their Love breaks out furiously, and throws off all the Mixture of Suspicion [which] Jealousy and smothered it before The beautiful Parts of the Character rise uppermost in the jealous Husband's Memory, and upbraid him with the ill Usage of so divine a Creature as was once in his Possession whilst all the little Imperfections, that were [before] so unwise to him, wear off from his Remembrance, and shew themselves no more

We may see by what has been said, that Jealousy takes the deepest Root in Men of morose Dispositions and of these we may find three kinds who are most over run with it

The First are those who are conscious to themselves of an Infirmary, whether it be Weakness, Old Age, Deformity, Ignorance, or the like These Men are so well acquainted with the inamiable Part of themselves, that they have not the Confidence to think they are really beloved, and are so distrustful of their own Merits, that all Fondness towards them puts them out of Countenance, and looks like a Jest upon their Persons They grow suspicious in their first looking in a Glass, and are stung with Jealousy at the sight of a Wrinkle A handsome Fellow immediately alarms them, and every thing that looks young or gay turns their thoughts upon their Wives

A Second Sort of Men, who are most liable to * Eccles. ix. 1

4 [formerly]

this Passion, are those of cunning, wary, and distrustful Tempers. It is a Fault very justly found in Histories composed by Politicians, that they leave nothing to Chance or Humour, but are still for deriving every Action from some Plot and Contrivance, for drawing up a perpetual Scheme of Causes and Events, and preserving a constant Correspondence between the Camp and the Council-Table. And thus it happens in the Affairs of Love with Men of too refined a Thought. They put a Construction on a Look, and find out a Design in a Smile: they give new Senses and Significations to Words and Actions, and are ever tormenting themselves with Fancies of their own raising. They generally act in a Disguise themselves, and therefore mistake all outward Shows and Appearances for Hypocrisy in others: so that I believe no Men see less of the Truth and Reality of Things, than these great Refiners upon Incidents [who] are so wonderfully subtle and over-wise in their Conceptions.

Now what these Men fancy they know of Women by Reflection, your lewd and vicious Men believe they have learned by Experience. They have seen the poor Husband so misled by Tricks and Artifices, and in the midst of his Enquiries so lost and bewilder'd in a crooked Intreague, that they still suspect an Under-Plot in every female Action, and especially where they see any Resemblance in the Behaviour of two Persons, are apt to fancy it proceeds from the same Design in both. These Men therefore bear hard upon the suspected Party, pursue her close through all her Turnings and Windings, and are too well acquainted with the Chace, to be slung off by any false Steps or Doubles. Besides, their Acquaintance and Conversation has lain wholly among the vicious Part of Woman-kind, and therefore it is no Wonder they censure all alike, and look upon the whole Sex as a Species of Impostors. But if, notwithstanding their private Experience, they can get over these Prejudices, and entertain a favourable Opinion of some Women, yet their own loose Desires will stir up new Suspicions from another Side, and make them believe all Men subject to the same Inclinations with themselves.

Whether these or other Motives are most predominant, we learn from the modern Histories of America, as well as from our own Experience in this Part of the World, that Jealousy is no Northern Passion, but rages most in those Nations that lie nearest the Influence of the Sun. It is a Misfortune for a Woman to be born between the Tropicks, for there lie the hottest Regions of Jealousy, which as you come Northward cools all along with the Climate, till you scarce meet with any thing like it in the Polar Circle. Our own Nation is very temperately situated in this respect, and if we meet with some few disordered with the Violence of this Passion, they are not the proper Growth of our Country, but are many Degrees nearer the Sun in their Constitutions than in their Climate.

After this frightful Account of Jealousy, and the Persons [who] are most subject to it, it will be but fair to shew by what means the Passion may be best allay'd, and those who are possessed with it set at Ease. Other Faults indeed are not under the Wife's Jurisdiction, and should, if possible, escape her Observation, but Jealousy calls upon her particularly for its Cure, and deserves all her Art and Application in the Attempt. Besides, she has this for her Encouragement, that her Endeavours will be always pleasing, and that she will still find the Affection of her Husband rising towards her in proportion as his Doubts and Suspicion wax sh for as we have seen all along, there is so great a Mixture of Love in Jealousy as is well worth separating. But this shall be the Subject of another Paper. L

No 171 ] Saturday, Sept 15, 1711 [Addison

Credula res amor est— Ovid Met.

HAVING in my Yesterday's Paper discovered the Nature of Jealousy, and pointed out the Persons who are most subject to it, I must here apply myself to my fair Correspondents, who desire to live well with a Jealous Husband, and to ease his Mind of its unjust Suspicions.

The first Rule I shall propose to be observed is, that you never seem to dislike in another what the Jealous Man is himself guilty of, or to admire any thing in which he himself does not excel. A Jealous Man is very quick in his Applications, he knows how to find a double Edge in an Injunctive, and to draw a Satyr on himself out of a Panegyrick on another. He does not trouble himself to consider the Person, but to direct the Character, and is secretly pained or confounded as he finds more or less of himself in it. The Commendation of any thing in another, stirs up his Jealousy, as it shews you have a Value for others, besides himself: but the Commendation of that which he himself wants, inflames him more, as it shews that in some Respects you prefer others before him. Jealousy is admirably described in this View by Horace in his Ode to Lydia [1]

*Quam tibi, Lydia, Telephi
Cerecem roseam, et cerea Telephi
Laudas brachia, vae meum
Ferox est difficile bile tuius securi
Tui cuncta virei s mihi, et color
Cui sedem manet iumor et u genas
Furtim labitur argenteus
Quam lentis punctis maceretur ignibus*

*When Telephus thus so oft ful Charms,
His rose Neck and winding Arms,
With endless Raptures you recite,
And in the pleasing Name delight,
My Heart, inflam'd by jealous Heats,
With numberless Resentments beats,
From my pale Cheek the Colour flies,
And all the Man and me dies*

<sup>2</sup> [that]

<sup>3</sup> [part of which I find Translated to my Hand.]

*By Turns my hidden Grief appears In rising Sighs and falling Tears,
That show too well the warm Desires,
The silent, slow, consuming Fires,
Which on my inward Vitals prey,
And melt my wretched Soul away.*

The Jealous Man is not indeed angry, if you dislike another but if you find those Faults which are to be found in his own Character, you discover not only your Dislike of another, but of himself. In short, he is so desirous of improving all your Love, that he is grieved at the want of any Charm, which he believes his Power to raise it and if he finds by your Cares on others, that he is not so respectable in your Opinion as he might be, he naturally concludes you could love him better if he had other Qualifications, and that by consequence your Affection does not rise so high as he thinks it ought. If therefore his Character be grave or sullen, you must not be too much pleased with a Jest, or transported with any thing that is gay and diverting. If his Beauty be none of the best, you must be a professed Admirer of Prudence, or any other Quality he is Master of, or at least vain enough to think he is.

In the next place you must be sure to be free and open in your Conversation with him and to let in light upon your Actions, to unravel all your Designs, and discover every Secret however trifling or indifferent. A jealous Husband has a particular Aversion to Winks and Whispers, and if he does not see to the Bottom of every thing, will be sure to go beyond it in his Fears and Suspicions. He will always expect to be your chief Confidant, and where he finds himself kept out of a Secret, will believe there is more in it than there should be. And here it is of great concern, that you preserve the Character of your Sincerity uniform and of a piece for if he once finds a false Gloss put upon any single Action he quickly suspects all the rest, his warring Imagination immediately takes a false Hint and runs off with it into several remote Consequences, till he has proved very ingenious in working out his own Misery.

If both these Methods fail, the best way will be to let him see you are much cast down and distressed for the ill Opinion he entertains of you, and the Disquietudes he himself suffers for your Sake. There are many who take a kind of barbarous Pleasure in the Jealousy of those who love them that insult over an ailing Heart, and triumph in their Charms which are able to excite so much Uneasiness.

Anceps ipse licet tormentis gaudet amantis
Juv

But these often carry the Humour so far, till their affected Coldness and Indifference quite kills all the Fondness of a Lover, and are then sure to meet in their Turn with all the Contempt and Scorn that is due to so insolent a Behaviour. On the contrary, it is very probable a melancholy, dejected Carriage, the usual effects of injured Innocence, may often the jealous Husband into Pity, make him sensible of the Wrong he does you, and work out of his Mind all those Fears and Suspicions that make you both unhappy. At least it will have this good Effect, that he will keep his Jealousy to himself and repine in private, either because he is sensible it is a Weakness, and will therefore hide it from your knowledge, or because he will be apt to fear some ill Effect it may produce, in cooling your Love towards him, or diverting it to another.

There is still another Secret that can never fail, if you can once get it believed, and which is often prized by Women of greater Candour, than Virtue. This is to change Sides for a while with the jealous Man and to turn his own Passion up on himself. To take some Occasion of growing jealous of him, and to follow the Example he himself hath set you. This Counterfeited Jealousy will bring him a great deal of Pleasure, if he thinks it real for he knows experimentally how much Love goes along with this Passion, and will besides feel something like the Satisfaction of a Revenge in seeing you under all his own Tortures. But this, indeed, is an Artifice so difficult and at the same time so dangerous, that it ought never to be put in Practice, but by such as have Skill enough to cover the Deceit, and Innocence to render it excusable.

I shall conclude this Essay with the Story of Herod and Mariamne, as I have collected it out of Josephus, which may serve almost as an Example to whatever can be said on this Subject.

Mariamne had all the Charms that Beauty, Wit and Youth could give a Woman, and Herod all the Love that such Charms are able to raise in a man and voracious Disposition. In the midst of this his fondness for Mariamne, he put her Brother to Death as he did her Father not many Years after. The Arbitrariness of the Action was represented to Mar' Antioch, who immediately summoned Herod into Egypt, to answer for the Crime that was there laid to his Charge. Herod attributed the Summons to Antioch's Desire of Mariamne, whom therefore, before his Departure he gave into the Custody of his Uncle Joseph, with private Orders to put her to Death, if any such Violence was offered to himself. This Joseph was much delighted with Mariamne's Conversation, and endeavoured, with all his Art and Rhetoric, to set out the excess of Herod's Passion for her but when he still found her Cold and Incredulous, he inconsiderately, told her, as a certain Instance of her Lord's Affection, the private Orders he had left behind him, which plainly shewed, according to Joseph's Interpretation, that he could neither Live nor Die without her. This Barbarous Instance of a wild unreasonable Passion quite put out, for a time, those little Remains of Affection she still had for her Lord. Her Thoughts were so wholly taken up with the Cruelty of his Orders, that she could not consider the kindness that produced them, and therefore represented him in her Irrigation, rather under the frightful Idea of a Murderer than a Lover. Herod was at length requited and dismissed by Mari At ory, when his Soul was all in Flames for his Marianne but before their Meeting, he was not a little alarm'd at the Report he had heard of his Uncle's Conversation and Familiarity with her in his Absence. This therefore was the first Discourse he entertain'd with her in which she found it no easy matter to quiet his Suspensions. But at last he appeared so well satisfied of her Innocence that from Reproaches and Wranglings he fell to Tears and Embraces. Both of them rep. very tenderly at their Reconciliation, and Hercl poured out his whole Soul to her in the warmest Protestations of Love and Constancy when amidst all his Sighs and Languishings she asked him, whether the private Orders he left with his Uncle Joseph were an Instance of such an unkind Affection. The Jealous King was immediately rosed at so unexpected a Question and concluded his Uncle must have been too Familiar with her, before he would have discovered such a Secret. In short, he put his Uncle to Death, and very difficultly prevailed upon himself to spare Marianne.

After this he was forced on a second Journey into Egypt, when he committed his Lady to the Care of Solernus, with the same private Orders he had before given his Uncle if any Mischief befel himself. In the mean while Marianne so vor upon Solernus by her Presents and obliging Conversation, that she drew all the Secre. from him, with which Ferns had intrusted him so that after his Return when he flew to her with all the Transports of Joy and Love, she received him coldly with Sighs and Tears, and all the Marks of Indifference and Aversion. His Reception so stirred up his Inigation that he had certainly slain her with his own Hands, had not he feared he himself should have become the greater Sufferer by it. It was no long after this, when he had another violent Return of Love upon him Marianne was therefore sent for to him, whom he endeavour'd to soften and reconcile with all possible conjugal Caresses and Endearments but she declined his Embraces, and answer'd all his Fondness with bitter Injunctives for the Death of her Father and her Brother. This Behaviour so incensed Hercl, that he very hardly refrained from striking her when in the Heat of their Quarrel there came in a Witness, subjoind some of Marianne's Enemies, who accus'd her to the King of a Design to poison him. Hercl was now prevail'd to hear any thing in her Prejudice, and immediately ordered her Servant, to be stretch'd upon the Rack who in the Extremity of his Torments confess'd, that his Mistress's Aversion to the King rose from [something] Solernus is told her but as for any Design of poisoning, he utterly disown'd the least Knowledge of it. This Confession quickly prov'd fatal to Solernus, who now lay under the same Suspensions and Sentence that Joseph had before him on the like Occasion. Nor would Hercl rest here but accus'd her with great Vehemence of a Design upon his Life, and by his Authority with the Judges had her publicly Condemned and Executed. Hercl soon after her Death grew melancholy and dejected retiring from the Publick Administration of Affairs into a solitary Forest, and there abandoning himself to all the black Considerations, which naturally arise from a Passion made up of Love, Remorse Pity and Despair, he used to rave for his Marianne, and to call upon her in his distracted Fits and in all probability would soon have follow'd her, had not his Thoughts been seasonably called off from so sad an Object by Publick Storms, which at that time were nearly threaten'd him. No sol ri Scier hic q a est remota a Jistitia, Calliditas potius quae in Sapientia est esse-larile, etiam etiam si is parat is ei ferantur, si ei ei confidit, non ut liate co-r in u ferat, Audacia potius in iudicat, quam Fortitudo. Plauto apud Tull

THERE can be no greater Injury to humane Society than that good Talents among Men should be held honourable to those who are endowed with them without any Regard to their use. The Gifts of Nature and Accomplishments of Art are valuable, but as they are exerted in the Interest of Virtue or governed by the Rules of Honour. We ought to abstract our Minds from the Observation of any Excellence in those we converse with, all we have taken some Notice, or received some good Information of the Disposition of their Minds otherwise the Beauty of their Persons, or the Charms of their Wit may make us fond of those whom our Reason and Judgment will tell us we ought to abhor.

When we suffer our selves to be thus carried away by meer Beauty or meer Wit, Omnis arte, with all her Vice, will wear away as much of our Good-will as the most innocent Virgin or discreetest Matron and there cannot be a more abject Slavery in this World, than to doat upon what we think we ought to contemn. Yet this must be our Condition in all the Parts of Life, if we suffer our selves to approve any Thing but what tends to the Promotion of what is good and honourable. If we would take true Pains with our selves to consider all Things by the Light of Reason and Justice, tho' a Man were in the Height of Youth and amorous Inclinations, he would look upon a Coquet with the same Contempt or Inaffection as he would upon a Coxcomb. The wanton Carnage in a Woman, would disappoint her of the Admiration which she meets and the vain Dress or Discourse of a Man would destroy the Comeliness of his Shape or Goodness of his Understanding. I say the Goodness of his Understanding for it is no less common to see Men of Sense commerce Coxcombs, than beautiful Women become unamorous. When this happens in either, the Favour we are naturally inclined to give to the good Qualities they have from Nature should abate in Proportion. But however just it is to measure the Value of Men by the Application of their Talents, and not by the Erudence of those

Qualities abstracted from their Use I say, however just such a Way of judging is, in all Ages as well as this, the Contrary has prevailed upon the Generality of Mankind. How many low Devices have been preserved from one Age to another, which had perished as soon as they were made, if Painters and Sculptors had been esteemed as much for the Purpose as the Execution of their Designs? Modest and well-governed Imaginations have by this Means lost the Representations of Ten Thousand charming Portraits, filled with Images of innate Truth, generous Zeal, courageous Truth, and tender Humanity, instead of which, Satyrs, Furies, and Monsters are recommended by those Arts to a shameful Utility.

The unjust Application of laudable Talents, is tolerated, in the general Opinion of Men, not only in such Cases as are here mentioned, but also in Matters which concern ordinary Life. If a Lawyer were to be esteemed only as he uses his Parts in contending for Justice, and were immediately despicable when he appeared in a Cause which he could not but know was an unjust one, how honourable would his Character be? And how honourable is it in such among us, who follow the Profession no otherwise than as labouring to protect the Injured, to subdue the Oppressor, to imprison the careless Debtor, and do right to the painful Artificer? But many of this excellent Character are overlooked by the greater Number who affect covering a weak Place in a Client's Title, diverting the Course of an Enquiry, or finding a skilful Refuge to palliate a Falsehood. Yet it is still called Eloquence in the latter, though thus unjustly employed, but Resolution in an Assassin is according to Reason quite as laudable, as Knowledge and Wisdom exercised in the Defence of an ill Cause.

Were the Intention stedfastly considered, as the Measure of Approbation, all Falsehood would soon be out of Countenance and an Address in imposing upon Mankind, would be as contemptible in one State of Life as another. A Couple of Courtiers making Professions of Esteem, would make the same Figure under Breach of Promise, as two Knights of the Post convicted of Perjury. But Conversation is fallen so low in point of Morality, that as they say in a Burgum, Let the Buyer look to it, so in Friendship, he is the Man in Danger who is most apt to believe. He is the more likely to suffer in the Commerce, who begins with the Obligation of being the more ready to enter into it.

But those Men only are truly great, who place their Ambition rather in acquiring to themselves the Conscience of worthy Enterprizes, than in the Prospect of Glory which attends them. These exalted Spirits would rather be secretly the Authors of Events which are serviceable to Mankind, than, without being such, to have the public Fame of it. Where therefore an eminent Man is robbed by Artifice, or Detraction, it does but increase by such Endeavours of its Enemy. The impotent Pains which are taken to sully it, or diffuse it among a Crowd to the Injury of a single Person will naturally produce the contrary Effect. The Inc will blaze out, and burn up all that attempt to smother what they cannot extinguish.

There is but one thing necessary to keep the Possession of true Glory, which is, to hear the Opposers of it with Patience, and preserve the Virtue by which it was acquired. When a Man is thoroughly perswaded that he ought neither to admire, wish for, or pursue any thing but what is exactly his Duty, it is not in the Power of Seasons, Persons, or Accidents to diminish his Value. He only is a great Man who can neglect the Applause of the Multitude, and enjoy himself independent of its Favour. This is indeed an arduous Task, but it should comfort a glorious Spirit that it is the highest Step to which human Nature can arrive. Triumph, Applause, Acclamation, are dear to the Mind of Man, but it is still a more exquisite Delight to say to your self, you have done well, than to hear the whole human Race pronounce you glorious, except you your self can join with them in your own Reflections. A Mind thus equal and uniform may be deserted by little fashionable Admirers and Followers, but will ever be had in Reverence by Souls like it self. The Branches of the Oak endure all the Seasons of the Year, though its Leaves fall off in Autumn, and these too will be restored with the returning Spring.

—*Remove fera monstra, tuasque
Saxificos vultus, quæcunque ea, tolle Medusæ*
Ovid Met

IN a late Paper I mention'd the Project of an Ingenious Author for the erecting of several Handicraft Prizes to be contended for by our British Artizans, and the Influence they might have towards the Improvement of our several Manufactures. I have since that been very much surprized by the following Advertisement which I find in the Post Boy of the 11th Instant, and again repeated in the Post-Boy of the 15th.

On the 9th of October next will be run for upon Coleshill Heath in Warwickshire, a Plate of 6 Guineas Value, 3 Heats, by any Horse, Mare or Gelding that hath not won above the Value of £5, the winning Horse to be sold for £10, to carry 10 Stone Weight, if 14 Hands high, if above or under to carry or be allowed Weight for Inches, and to be entered Friday the 5th at the Swan in Coleshill, before Six in the Evening. Also a Plate of less Value to be run for by Asses. The same Day a Gold Ring to be run for by Men.

The first of these Diversions, that is to be exhibited by the £10 Race Horses, may probably have its Use, but the two last, in which the Asses and Men are concerned seem to me altogether extraordinary and unaccountable. Why they should keep Running Asses at Coleshill or how making Mouths turns to account in Warwickshire, more than in any other Parts of England, I cannot comprehend. I have looked over all the Olympic Games, and do not find any thing in them like an Ass-Race, or a Match at Grinning.

How ever it be, I am informed that several Asces are now kept in Body Cloaths, and sweated every Morning upon the Heath, and that all the Country Fellows within ten Miles of the Stew, grinn an Hour or two in their Glasses every Mornint, in order to qualify themselves for the gth of October. The Prize, which is proposed to be Grinn'd for, has rused such an Amlution among the Common People of Out-grinnint, one another that many very discerning Persons are afraid it should spoil mo t of the Faces in the Country and that a Warwickshire Man will be known by his Grinn, as Roman Catholics, imagine a Kentish Man is by his Jail. The Gold Ring which is made the Prize of Deformity, is just the Reverse of the Golden Apple that was formerly made the Prize of Beauty, and should carry for its Posy the old Motto inverted

Detur tetrora

Or to accommodate it to the Capreity of the Combatants,

*The frightfull st Grinner
Be the Winner*

In the mean while I would advise a Dutch Painter to be present at this great Controversy of Faces, in order to make a Collection of the most remarkable Grinns that shall be there exhibited.

I must not here omit an Account which I lately received of one of these Grinning-Matches from a Gentleman, who, upon reading the above-mentioned Advertisement, entertained a Coffee house with the following Narrative. Upon the taking of Namur, amidst other publick Rejoicings made on that Occasion, there was a Gold Ring given by a Whig Justice of Peace to be grinn'd for. The first Competitor that entered the Lists, was a blisk swarthy French Man, who accidentally passed that way, and being a Man naturally of a sutherd Look, and hard Features, promised himself good Success. He was placed upon a Table in the great Point of View, and looking upon the Company like Milton's Death,

*Grinn'd [horribly*] a Ghastly Smile*—

His Muscles were so drwn together on each side of his Face, that he shew'd twenty Teeth at a Grinn, and put the County in some pain, lest a Foreigner should carry away the Honour of the Day but upon a further Tryal they found he was Master only of the merry Grinn.

The next that mounted the Table was a Mile-content in those Days, and a great Master in the whole Art of Grinning, but particularly excelled in the angry Grinn. He did his Part so well, that he is said to have made half a dozen Women miscarry but the Justice being appressed by one who stood near him, that the Fellow who Grinn'd in his Face was a Jacobite, and being unwilling that a Disaffected Person should win the Gold Ring and be looked upon as the best Grinner in the Country, he ordered the Oath to be tendered unto him upon his quitting the Table, which the Grinner refusing, he was set aside as an unqualified Person. There were several other Grin-ticque figures, that presented themselves, which it would be too tedious to describe. I must not however omit a Ploughman who lived in the farther Part of the Country, and being very lucky in a Pair of long Lanthorn Jaws, wrung his face into such a hideous Grinnace that every Feature of it appeared under a different Distortion. The whole Company stood astonished at such a complicated Grinn, and were ready to assign the Prize to him, had it not been proved by one of his Antagonists, that he had practised with Verjuice for some Days before, and had a Crib found upon him at the very time of Grinning, upon which the best Judges of Grinning declared it is their Opinion, that he was not to be looked upon as a fair Grinner, and therefore ordered him to be set aside as a Cheat.

The Prize, it seems, fell at length upon a Coblur Giles Gorryon by Name, who produced several new Grinns of his own Invention, having been used to cut Faces for many Years together over his Last. At the very first Grinn he cast every Human Feature out of his Countenance at the second he became the Face of a Spout at the third a P'phoon, at the fourth the Head of a Bree Viol and at the fifth a Pair of Nut-Cracks. The whole Assembly wondered at his Accomplishments, and bestowed the King on him unanimously but, what he esteemed more than all the rest, a Country Wench, whom he had wooed in vain for above five Years before, was so charmed with his Grinns, and the Appluses which he received on all Sides, that she Married him the Week following, and to this Day wears the Prize upon her Finger, the Coblur having made use of it as his Wedding-Ring.

This Piper might perhaps seem very impertinent, if it grew serious in the Conclusion. I would nevertheless leave it to the Consideration of those who are the Patrons of this monstrous Trial of Skill, whether or no they are not guilty, in some measure, of an Affront to their Species, in treating after this manner the Human Face Divine, and turning that Part of us, which has so great an Image impressed upon it, into the Image of a Monkey, whether the raising such silly Competitions among the Ignorant, proposing Prizes for such useless Accomplishments, filling the common People's Heads with such Senseless Ambitions, and inspiring them with such absurd Ideas of Superiority and Preheminence, has not in it something Immoral as well as Ridiculous. Hæc mentium et victi ni frustra contendere Thyrsus —Virg

THERE is scarce any thing more common than Animivities between Parties that cannot subsist by their Agreement this was well represented in the Sedition of the Members of the humane Body in the old Roman Fable It is often the Case of lesser confederate States against a superior Power, which are hardly held together, though the Union is necessary for their common Safety and this is always the Case of the landed and trading Interest of Great Britain the Trader is sed by the Product of the Land, and the landed Man cannot be clothed but by the Skill of the Trader and yet those Interests are ever jarring

We had last Winter an Instance of this at our Club, in Sir ROGER DE COVERLEY and Sir ANDREW FREEPORT, between whom there is generally a constant, though friendly, Opposition of Opinions It happened that one of the Company, in an Historical Discourse, was observing, that Carthaginians Faith was a proverbial Phrase to intimate Breach of Leagues Sir ROGER said it could hardly be otherwise That the Carthaginians were the greatest Traders in the World and as Gain is the chief End of such a People, they never pursue any other The Means to it are never regarded, they will, if it comes easily, get Money honestly but if not, they will not scruple to attain it by Fraud or Cozenage And indeed, what is the whole Business of the Trader's Account, but to over reach him who trusts to his Memory? But were that not so, what can there great and noble be expected from him whose Attention is for ever fixed upon brilliancing his Books, and watching over his Expenses? And at best, let Frugality and Parsimony be the Virtues of the Merchant, how much is his punctual Dealing below a Gentleman's Charity to the Poor, or Hospitality among his Neighbours?

CAPTAIN SENTRY observed Sir ANDREW very diligent in hearing Sir ROGER, and had a mind to turn the Discourse, by taking notice in general, from the highest to the lowest Parts of human Society, there was a secret, tho' unjust, Way among Men, of indulging the Seeds of ill Nature and Envy, by comparing their own State of Life to that of another, and grudging the Approach of their Neighbour to their own Happiness and on the other Side, he who is the less at his Ease, repines at the other who, he thinks, has unjustly the Advantage over him Thus the Civil and Military Lists look upon each other with much ill Nature the Soldier repines at the Courtier's Power, and the Courtier rallies the Soldier's Honour or, to come to lower Instances, the private Men in the Horse and Foot of an Army, the Curmen and Coachmen in the City Streets, mutually look upon each other with ill Will, when they are in Competition for Quarters or the Way, in their respective Motions.

* Punica fides

It is very well, good Captain, interrupted Sir ANDREW You may attempt to turn the Discourse if you think fit but I must however have a Word or two with Sir ROGER, who, I see, thinks he has paid me off, and been very severe upon the Merchant I shall not, continued he, at this time remind Sir ROGER of the great and noble Monuments of Charity and Public Spirit, which have been erected by Merchants since the Reformation, but at present content myself with what he allows us, Parsimony and Frugality If it were consistent with the Quality of so ancient a Baronet as Sir ROGER, to keep an Account, or measure Things by the most inflexible Way, that of Numbers, he would prefer our Parsimony to his Hospitality If to drink so many Hogsheads is to be Hospitable, we do not contend for the Fame of that Virtue but it would be worth while to consider, whether so many Artificers at work ten Days together by my Appointment, or so many Peasants made merry on Sir ROGER's Charge, are the Men more obliged? I believe the Families of the Artificers will thank me, more than the Households of the Peasants shall Sir ROGER Sir ROGER gives to his Men, but I place mine above the Necessity, or Obligation of my Bounty I am in very little Pain for the Roman Proverb upon the Carthaginian Traders, the Romans were their professed Enemies I am only sorry no Carthaginian Histories have come to our Hands, we might have been taught perhaps by them some Proverbs against the Roman Generosity, in fighting for and bestowing other People's Goods But since Sir ROGER has taken Occasion from an old Proverb to be out of Humour with Merchants, it should be no Offence to offer one not quite so old in their Defence When a Man happens to break in Holland, they say of him that he has not kept true Accounts This Phrase, perhaps, among us, would appear a soft or humorous way of speaking, but with that exact Nation it bears the highest Reproach for a Man to be Mistaken in the Calculation of his Expence, in his Ability to answer future Demands, or to be impertinently sanguine in putting his Credit to too great Adventure, are all Instances of as much Infamy as with any Nation to be failing in Courage or common Honesty

Numbers are so much the Measure of every thing that is valuable, that it is not possible to demonstrate the Success of any Action, or the Prudence of any Undertaking, without them I say this in Answer to what Sir ROGER is pleased to say, That little that is truly noble can be expected from one who is ever poring on his Cash-book, or ballancing his Accounts When I have my Returns from abroad, I can tell to a Shilling, by the Help of Numbers, the Profit or Loss by my Adventure but I ought also to be able to shew that I had Reason for making it, either from my own Experience or that of other People, or from a reasonable Presumption that my Returns will be sufficient to answer my Expence and Hazard and this is never to be done without the Skill of Numbers For Instance, if I am to trade to Surinam, I ought beforehand to know the Demand of our Manufactures there, as well as of their Silks in England, and the customary Prices that are given for both in each Country I ought

I am afraid, by some Lines in this Letter, that my young Student is touched with a Distemper which he hardly seems to dream of, and is too far gone in it to receive Advice. However, I shall endeavour in due time on the Abuse which he mentions, living my self observ'd a Nest of Jacobites near the Temple, who make it their Diversion to draw up the Eyes of young Templars, that at the same time they may see them stumble in an unlucky Gutter which runs under the Window

Mr SPECTATOR,

I have lately read the Conclusion of your forty-seventh Speculation upon Butts with great Pleasure, and have ever since been thoroughly persuaded that one of those Gentlemen is extremely necessary to civilize Conversation. I had an Entertainment last Week upon the Water for a Lady to whom I make my Addresses, with several of our Friends of both Sexes. To divert the Company in general, and to shew my Mistress in particular my Genius for Raillery, I took one of the most celebrated Butts in Town along with me. It is with the utmost Shame and Confusion that I must acquaint you with the Sequel of my Adventure. As soon as we were got into the Boat, I play'd a Sentence or two at my Butt which I thought very smart, when my ill Genius, who I verily believe inspir'd him purely for my Destruction, suggested to him such a Reply, as got all the Laughter on his Side. I was dash'd at so unexpected a Turn, which the Butt perceiving, resolv'd not to let me recover my self, and pursuing his Victory, rallied and tossed me in a most unmerciful and barbarous manner 'till we came to Chelsea. I had some small Success while we were eating Chesse Cakes but coming Home he renew'd his Attacks with his former good Fortune, and equal Diversion to the whole Company. In short, Sir, I must ingeniously own that I was never so handled in all my Life and to complement my Misfortune, I am since told that the Butt, flushed with his late Victory, had made a Visit or two to the dear Object of my Wishes, so that I am at once in danger of losing all my Pretensions to Wit, and my Mistress (into) the Bargain. This, Sir, is a true Account of my present Troubles, which you are the more oblig'd to assist me in, as you were your self in a great measure the Cause of them, by recommending to us an Instrument, and not instructing us at the same time how to play upon it.

I have been thinking whether it might not be highly convenient, that all Butts should wear an Inscription affixed to some Part of their Bodies, shewing on which Side they are to be come at, and that if any of them are Persons of unequal Tempers, there should be some Method taken to inform the World at what Time it is safe to attack them, and when you had best to let them alone. But, submitting these Matters to your more serious Consideration,

I am, SIR,
Yours, &c

I have, indeed, seen and heard of several young

Gentlemen under the same Misfortune with my present Correspondent. The best Rule I can lay down for them to avoid the like Calamities for the future, is thoroughly to consider not only Whether their Companions are weak, but Whether themselves are ill.

The following Letter comes in me from Exeter, and being credibly inform'd that what it contains is Matter of Fact, I shall give it my Reader as it was sent me.

Mr SPECTATOR, Exeter, Sept 7

You were pleas'd in a late Speculation to take notice of the Inconvenience we lie under in the Country, in not being able to keep Pace with the Fashion. But there is another Misfortune which we are subject to, and is no less grievous than the former, which has hitherto escaped your Observation. I mean, the living Things paid upon us for London Fashions, which were never once heard of there.

A Lady of this Place had some time since a Box of the newest Ribbons sent down by the Coach. Whether it was her own malicious Invention, or the Wantonness of a London Milliner, I am not able to inform you. But, among the rest, there was one Cherry coloured Ribbon, consisting of about half a Dozen Yards, made up in the Figure of a small Head Dress. The said Lady had the Assurance to affirm, amidst a Circle of Ironic Inquisitors, who were present at the opening of the Box, that this was the newest Fashion worn at Court. Accordingly, the next Sunday we had several Females, who came to Church with their Heads dress'd wholly in Ribbons, and look'd like so many Victims ready to be Sacrific'd. This is still a reigning Mode among us. At the same time we have a Set of Gentlemen who take the Liberty to appear in all Public Places without any Buttons to their Coats, which they supply with several little Silver Hairs, tho' our freshest Advices from London make no mention of any such Fashion, and we are something shy of affording Matter to the Button-Makers for a second Petition.

What I would humbly propose to the Publick is, that there may be a Society erected in London, to consist of the most skillful Persons of both Sexes, for the Inspection of Modes and Fashions, and that hereafter no Person or Persons shall presume to appear singularly habited in any Part of the Country, without a Testimonial from the foresaid Society, that their Dress is answerable to the Mode at London. By this means, Sir, we shall know a little whereabout we are.

If you could bring this Matter to bear, you

* In 1609 the Button-Makers sent a petition to Parliament, which produced the Act of the 8th year of Anne (1709), framed because 'the maintenance and subsistence of many thousands of men, women and children depends upon the making of silk, mohair, lamp, and thread buttons, and button holes with the needle,' and these have been ruined by 'a late unforeseen practice of making and binding button-holes with cloth, serge, &c

'would very much oblige great Numbers of your 'Country Friends, and among the rest,
Your very Humble Servant,

Sai—I ac

THERE are in the following Letter Matters, which I, a Bachelor, cannot be supposed to be acquainted with therefore shall not pretend to explain upon it till further Consideration, but leave the Author of the Epistle to express his Condition his own Way

MR SPECTATOR,

I do not deny but you appear in many of your Papers to understand Human Life pretty well, but there are very many Things which you cannot possibly have a true Notion of, in a single Life, these are such as respect the married State otherwise I cannot account for your having overlooked a very good Sort of People, which are commonly called in Scorn the Hen-peck. You are to understand that I am one of those innocent Mortals who suffer Derision under that Word for being governed by the best of Wives. It would be worth your Consideration to enter into the Nature of Affection it self, and tell us, according to your Philosophy, why it is that our Dears shall do what they will with us, shall be froward, ill natured, assuming, sometimes vaine, at others rail, then swoon away, then come to Life, have the Use of Speech to the greatest Impunity ungrainable, and then sink away again, and all because they fear we do not love them enough that is, the poor things love us so heartily, that they cannot thinl it possible we should be able to love them in so great a Degree, which makes them take on so. I say Sir, a true good natured Man, whom Rakes and Libertines call Hen-peck, shall fall into all these different Moods with his dear Life, and at the same time see they are wholly put on and yet not be hard hearted enough to tell the dear good Creature that she is an Hypocrite. This sort of good Man is very frequent in the populous and wealthy City of London, and is the true Hen-peck Man, the kind Creature cannot break through his Kindnesses so far as to come to an Explanation with the tender Soul, and therefore goes on to comfort her when nothing ails her, to appease her when she is not angry, and to give her his Cash when he knows she does not want it, rather than be uneasy for a whole Month, which is the time which a froward Woman takes to come to her self, if you have Courage to stand out.

There are indeed several other Species of the Hen-peck and in my Opinion they are certainly the best Subjects the Queen has and for that Reason I take it to be your Duty to keep us above Contempt

I do not know whether I make my self under'stood in the Representation of an Hen-peck Life, but I shall take leave to give you an Account of my self, and my own Spouse. You are to know that I am reckoned no Fool, have on several Occasions been tried whether I will take ill Usage, and yet the Event has been to my Advantage and yet there is not such a Slave in Turkey as I am to my Dear. She has a good Share of Wit, and is what you call a very pretty agreeable Woman. I perfectly dote on her, and my Affection to her gives me all the Anxieties imaginable but that of jealousy. My being thus confident of her, I take, as much as I can judge of my Heart, to be the Reason, that whatever she does, tho' it be never so much against my Inclination, there is still left something in her Manner that is irritable. She will sometimes look at me with an assumed Grandeur, and pretend to resent that I have not had Respect enough for her Opinion in such an Instance in Company. I cannot but smile at the pretty Anger she is in and then she pretends she is used like a Child. In a Word, our great Debate is, which has the Supremacy in point of Understanding. She is eternally forming an Argument of Debate to which I very indolently answer, 'Thou art mighty pretty. To this she answers, 'All the World but you think I have as much Sense as your self. I repeat to her, Indeed you are pretty. Upon this there is no Patience she will throw down any thing about her, stamp and pull off her Head-Cloaths. Fie, my Dear, say I how can a Woman of your Sense fall into such an intemperate Rage? This is an Argument which never fails. Indeed, my Dear, say she, you make me mad sometimes, so you do, with the silly Way you have of treating me like a pretty Idiot. Well, what have I got by putting her into good Humour? Nothing, but that I must convince her of my good Opinion by my Practice, and then I am to give her Possession of my little Ready Money, and for a Day and half following, dislike all she dislikes, and extol every thing she approves. I am so exquisitely fond of this Daring, that I seldom see any of my Friends, am uneasy in all Companies till I see her again and when I come home she is in the Dumps, because she says she is sure I cannot so soon enjoy because I think her handsome. I dare not upon this Occasion laugh but tho' I am one of the warmest Churchmen in the Kingdom, I am forced to rail at the Times, because she is a violent Whig. Upon this we talk Politics so long, that she is convinced I kiss her for her Wisdom. It is a common Practice with me to ask her some Question concerning the Constitution, which she answers me in general out of Harrington's Oceana. Then I commend her

<sup>2</sup> The Oceana is an ideal of an English commonwealth written by James Harrington, after the execution of Charles I. It was published in 1656, having for a time been stopped at press by Cromwell's government. After the Restoration, Harrington was sent to the Tower by Charles II on a false accusation of conspiracy. Removed to Plymouth, he there lost his health and some part of his reason, which he did not regain before his

I weep for him that was in trouble? was not my Soul grieved for the poor? Let me be weighed in an even balance, that God may know mine Integrity. If I did despise the cause of my manservant or my maid servant when they contended with me. What then shall I do when God riseth up? and when he visiteth, what shall I answer him? Did not he that made me in the womb, make him? and did not one fashion us in the womb? If I have withheld the poor from their desire, or have caused the eyes of the widow to fail, or have eaten my morsel myself alone, and the fatherless hath not eaten thereof. If I have seen any perish for want of cloathing, or any poor without covering. If his lions have not blessed me, and if he were not warmed with the fleece of my sheep. If I have lifted up my hand against the fatherless, when I saw my help in the gate, then let mine arm fall from my shoulder-blade, and mine arm be broken from the bone. If I have rejoiced at the Destruction of him that hated me, or lifted up myself when evil found him. (Neither have I suffered my mouth to sin, by wishing a curse to his soul). The stranger did not lodge in the street, but I opened my doors to the traveller. If my land cry against me, or that the furrors likewise thereof complain. If I have eaten the fruits thereof without money, or have caused the owners thereof to lose their Life, Let thistles grow instead of wheat, and cockle instead of barley.

Comus in uxorem ——— Hor

I CANNOT defer taking Notice of this Letter

Mr SPECTATOR,

'I am but too good a Judge of your Paper of the 15th Instant, which is a Master-piece I mean that of Jealousy. But I think it unworthy of you to speak of that Torture in the Breast of a Man, and not to mention also the Prings of it in the Heart of a Woman. You have very judiciously and with the greatest Penetration imaginable, considered it as Woman is the Creature of whom the Diffidence is raised, but not a Word of a Man who is so unmerciful as to move Jealousy in his Wife, and not care whether she is so or not. It is possible you may not believe there are such Tyrants in the World, but alas, I can tell you of a Man who is ever out of Humour in his Wife's Company, and the pleasantest Man in the World every where else, the greatest Sloven at home when he appears to none but his Family, and most exactly well dressed in all other Places. Alas, Sir, is it of Course, that to deliver one's self wholly into a Man's Power without Possibility of Appeal to any other Jurisdiction but to his own Reflection, is so little an Obligation to a Gentleman, that he can be offended and fall into a Rage, because my Heart swells Tears into my Eyes when 'I see him in a cloudy Mood? I pretend to no Succour, and hope for no Relief but from him self and yet he that has Sense and Justice in every thing else, never reflects, that to come home only to sleep off an Intemperance, and spend all the Time he is there as if it were a Punishment, cannot but give the Anguish of a jealous Mind. He always leaves his Home as if he were going to Court, and returns as if he were entering a Gaol. I could add to this, that from his Company and his usual Discourse, he does not scruple being thought an abandoned Man, as to his Morals. Your own Imagination will say enough to you concerning the Condition of me his Wife and I wish you would be so good as to represent to him, for he is not ill-natured, and reads you much, that the Moment I hear the Door shut after him, I throw myself upon my Bed, and drown the Child he is so fond of with my Tears, and often frighten it with my Cries that I curse my Being, that I run to my Glass all over bathed in Sorrows, and help the Utterance of my inward Anguish by beholding the Gush of my own Calamities as my Tears fall from my Eyes. This looks like an imagined Picture to tell you, but indeed this is one of my Pastimes. Hitherto I have only told you the general Temper of my Mind, but how shall I give you an Account of the Distraction of it? Could you but conceive how cruel I am one Moment in my Resentment, and at the ensuing Minute, when I place him in the Condition my Anger would bring him to, how compassionate, it would give you some Notion how miserable I am, and how little I deserve it. When I remonstrate with the greatest Gentleness that is possible against unhandsome Appearances, and that married Persons are under particular Rules, when he is in the best Humour to receive this, I am answered only, that I expose my own Reputation and Sense if I appear jealous. I wish, good Sir, you would take this into serious Consideration, and admonish Husbands and Wives what Terms they ought to keep towards each other. Your Thoughts on this important Subject will have the greatest Reward, that which descends on such, is feel the Sorrows of the Afflicted. Give me leave to subscribe me self,

Your unfortunate
humble Servant,
CELINDA

I had it in my Thoughts, before I received the Letter of this Lady, to consider this dreadful Prison in the Mind of a Woman, and the Smart she seems to feel does not abate the Inclination I had to recommend to Husbands a more regular Behaviour, than to give the most exquisite of Torments to those who love them, nay whose Torment would be abated if they did not love them.

It is wonderful to observe how little is made of this inexpressible Injury, and how easily Men get into a Habit of being least agreeable where they are most obliged to be so. But this Subject deserves a distinct Speculation, and I shall observe for a Day or two the Behaviour of two or three happy Pairs I am acquainted with, before I pretend to make a System of Conjugal Morality. I design in the first Place to go a few Miles out of Town, and there I know where to meet one who practises all the Parts of a fine Gentleman in the Duty of an Husband. When he was a Butcher long Business made him particularly negligent in his Habit but now there is no young Lover living so exact in the Care of his Person. One who asked why he was so long washing his Mouth, and so delicate in the Choice and Wearing of his Linen, was answered, Because there is a Woman of Merit obliged to receive me kindly, and I think it incumbent upon me to make her Inclination go along with her Duty.

If a Man would give himself leave to think, he would not be so unreasonable as to expect Debauchery and Innocence could live in Commerce together, or hope that Flesh and Blood is capable of so strict an Allegiance, as that a fine Woman must go on to improve her self 'till she is as good and impassive as an Angel, only to preserve a Fidelity to a Brute and a Satyr. The Lady who desires me for her Sake to end one of my Papers with the following Letter, I am persuaded, thinks such a Perseverance very impracticable.

Husband,

*Centuriae seniorum agitant expertia fruges
Celsi pretereunt austera Poemata Rhanus
Omne tulit punctum qui miscuit utile dulci, Lectorem delectando, pariterque monendo* — Hor

I MAY cast my Readers under two general Divisions, the Mercurial and the Saturnine. The first are the gay Part of my Disciples, who require Speculations of Wit and Humour the others are those of a more solemn and sober Turn, who find no Pleasure but in Papers of Morality and sound Sense. The former call every thing that is Serious, Stupid, the latter look upon every thing as Impertinent that is Ludicrous. Were I always Grave, one half of my Readers would fall off from me. Were I always Merry, I should lose the other. I make it therefore my Endeavour to find out Entertainments of both Kinds, and by that means perhaps consult the Good of both, more than I should do, did I always write to the particular Taste of either. As they neither of them know what I proceed upon, the sprightly Reader, who takes up my Paper in order to be diverted, very often finds himself engaged unawares in a serious and profitable Course of Thinking as on the contrary, the thoughtful Man, who perhaps may hope to find something Solid, and full of deep Reflection, is very often insensibly betrayed into a Fit of Mirth. In a word, the Reader sits down to my Entertainment without knowing his Bill of Fare, and has therefore at least the Pleasure of hoping there may be a Dish to his Palate.

I must confess, were I left to my self, I should rather am at instructing than diverting, but if we will be useful to the World, we must take it as we find it. Authors of professed Severity discourage the looser Part of Mankind from having any thing to do with their Writings. A man must have Virtue in him, before he will enter upon the reading of a Seneca or an Epictetus. The very title of a Moral Treatise has something in it austere and shocking to the careless and Inconsiderate.

For this Reason several unthinking Persons fall in my way, who would give no Attention to Lectures delivered with a Religious Seriousness or a Philosophick Gravity. They are snared into Sentiments of Wisdom and Virtue when they do not think of it, and if by that means they arrive only at such a Degree of Consideration as may dispose them to listen to more studied and elaborate Discourses, I shall not think my Speculations useless. I might likewise observe, that the Gloominess in which sometimes the Minds of the best Men are involved, very often stands in need of such lively Incitements to Mirth and Laughter, as are apt to disperse Melancholy, and put our Faculties in good Humour. To which some will add, that the British Climate, more than any other, makes Entertainments of this Nature in a manner necessary.

If what I have here said does not recommend, it will at least excuse the Variety of my Speculations. I would not willingly Laugh but in order to instruct, or if I sometimes fail in this Point, when my Mirth ceases to be instructive, it shall never cease to be Innocent. A scrupulous Conduct in this Particular has, perhaps, more Merit in it than the Generality of Readers imagine. did they know how many Thoughts occur in a Point of Humour, which a discreet Author in Modesty suppresses how many Strokes in Railery present themselves, which could not fail to please the ordinary Taste of Mankind, but are stifled in their Birth by reason of some remote Tendency which they carry in them to corrupt the Minds of those who read them. did they know how many Glances of Ill nature are industriously avoided for fear of doing Injury to the Reputation of another they would be apt to think kindly of those Writers who endeavour to make themselves diverting, without being Immoral. One may apply to these Authors that Passage in Wallis,<sup>1</sup>

*Poets lose half the Praise they would have got,
Were it but known what they discreetly blot*

As nothing is more easy than to be a Wit, with all the above-mentioned Liberties, it requires some Genius and Invention to appear such without them.

What I have here said is not only in regard to the Publick, but with an Eye to my particular Correspondent who has sent me the following Letter, which I have castrated in some Places upon these Considerations.

SIR,

'Having lately seen your Discourse upon a 'Misch of Grinning, I cannot forbear giving you

'a Manager for himself, all the People he had acquired were such only as he had reduced by his Wars, and were left in his Possession by the Peace, he had conquered not above one third Part of Flanders, and consequently no more than one third Part of the Inhabitants of that Province

'About 100 Years ago the Houses in that Country were all Numbered, and by a just Computation the Inhabitants of all Sorts could not then exceed 750000 Souls. And if any Man will consider the Desolation by almost perpetual Wars, the numerous Armies that have lived almost ever since at Discretion upon the People, and how much of their Commerce has removed for more Security to other Places, he will have little Reason to imagine that their Numbers have since increased, and therefore with one third Part of that Province that Prince can have gained no more than one third Part of the Inhabitants, or 250000 new Subjects, even tho' it should be supposed they were all contented to live still in their native Country, and transfer their Allegiance to a new Master

'The Fertility of this Province, its convenient Situation for Trade and Commerce, its Capacity for furnishing Employment and Subsistence to great Numbers, and the vast Armies that have been maintained here, make it credible that the remaining two Thirds of Flanders are equal to all his other Conquests, and consequently by all he cannot have gained more than 750000 new Subjects, Men, Women and Children, especially if a Deduction shall be made of such as have retired from the Conqueror to live under their old Masters

'It is Time now to set his Loss against his Profit, and to shew for the new Subjects he had acquired, how many old ones he had lost in the Acquisition. I think that in his Wars he has seldom brought less into the Field in all Places than 200000 fighting Men, besides what have been left in Garrisons, and I think the common Computation is, that of an Army, at the latter End of a Campaign, without Sieges or Battle, scarce Four Fifths can be mustered of those that came into the Field at the Beginning of the Year. His Wars at several Times till the last Peace have held about 20 Years, and if 40000 yearly lost, or a fifth Part of his Armies, are to be multiplied by 20, he cannot have lost less than 800000 of his old Subjects, all able body'd Men, a greater Number than the new Subjects he had acquired

'But this Loss is not all. Providence seems to have equally divided the whole Mass of Mankind into different Sexes, that every Woman may have her Husband, and that both may equally contribute to the Continuance of the Species. It follows then, that for all the Men that have been lost, as many Women must have lived single, and it were but Chirtry to believe they have not done all the Service they were capable of doing in their Generation. In so long a Course of Years great part of them must have died, and all the rest must go off at last without leaving any Representatives behind. By this Account he must have lost not only 800000 Subjects, but double

'that Number, and all the Increase that was reasonably to be expected from it

'It is said in the last War there was a Famine in his Kingdom, which swept away two Millions of his People. This is hardly credible. If the loss was only of one fifth Part of that Sum, it was very great. But 'tis no wonder there should be Famine, where so much of the People's Substance is taken away for the King's Use, that they have not sufficient left to provide against Accidents, where so many of the Men are taken from the Plough to serve the King in his Wars, and a great part of the Lillage is left to the weaker Hands of so many Women and Children. Whatever was the Loss, it must undoubtedly be placed to the Account of his Ambition

'And so must also the Destruction or Banishment of 3 or 400000 of his reformed Subjects: he could have no other Reasons for ruining those Lives so very cheap, but only to recommend himself to the Bigotry of the Spanish Nation

'How should there be Industry in a Country, where all Property is precarious? What Subject will sow his Land that his Prince may reap the whole Harvest? Parsimony and Frugality must be Strangers to such a People, for will any Man save to day what he has Reason to fear will be taken from him to morrow? And where is the Encouragement for marrying? Will any Man think of raising Children, without any Assurance of Cloathing for their backs, or so much as Food for their Bellies? And thus by his fatal Ambition he must have lessened the Number of his Subjects not only by Slaughter and Destruction, but by preventing their very Births, he has done as much as was possible towards destroying Posterity itself

'Is this then the great, the invincible Le-wis? This the immortal Man, the tout-puissant, or the Almighty, as his Flatterers have called him? Is this the Man that is so celebrated for his Conquests? For every Subject he has acquired, has he not lost three that were his Inheritance? Are not his Troops fewer, and those neither so well fed, or clothed, or paid, as they were formerly, tho' he has now so much greater Cause to exert himself? And what can be the Reason of all this, but that his Revenue is a great deal less, his Subjects are either poorer, or not so many to be plundered by constant Taxes for his Use?

'It is well for him he had found out a Way to steal a Kingdom, if he had gone on conquering as he did before his Ruin had been long since finished. This brings to my Mind a saying of King Pyrrhus, after he had a second time beat the Romans in a pitched Battle, and was complimented by his Generals: I es, says he, such another Victory and I am quite undone. And since I have mentioned Pyrrhus, I will end with a very good, though known Story of this ambitious mad Man. When he had shewn the utmost Fondness for his Expedition against the Romans, Cynens his chief Minister asked him what he proposed to himself by this War? Why, says Pyrrhus, to conquer the Aprians, and reduce all Italy to my Obedience. What then? says Cynens. To pass over into Sicily, says Pyrrhus, and then all the Sicilians must be our Subjects. And what 'does your Majesty intend next? Why truly, says the King, to conquer Carthage, and make myself Master of all Africa. And what, Sir, says the Minister is to be the End of all your Expeditions? Why then, says the King for the rest of our Lives we'll sit down to good Wine. How, Sir, replied Cynæas, to better than we have now before us? Have we not already as much as we can drink?<sup>1</sup>

'Riot and Excess are not the becoming Characters of Princes but if Pyrrhus and Lævius had debauched like Istellus, they had been less hurtful to their People.

Your humble Servant,
PHILARIMUS

I AM more pleased with a Letter that is filled with Touches of Nature than of Wit the following one is of this kind

SIR,

'Among all the Distresses which happen in Families, I do not remember that you have touched upon the Marriage of Children without the Consent of their Parents. I am one of these<sup>2</sup> unfortunate Persons. I was about fifteen when I took the Liberty to choose for my self and have ever since languished under the Displeasure of an inexorable Father, who, though he sees me happy in the best of Husbands, and blessed with very fine Children, can never be prevailed upon to forgive me. He was so kind to me before this unhappy Accident, that indeed it makes my Breach of Duty, in some measure, inexcusable and at the same time creates in me such a Tenderness towards him, that I love him above all things, and would die to be reconciled to him. I have thrown myself at his Feet, and besought him with Tears to pardon me but he always pushes me away, and spurns me from him. I have written several Letters to him, but he will neither open nor receive them. About two Years ago I sent my little Boy to him, dressed in a new Apparel, but the Child returned in me crying, because he said his Grandfather would not see him, and had ordered him to be put out of his House. My Mother is on over to my Side, but dares not mention me to my Father for fear of provoking him. About a Month ago he lay sick upon his Bed, and in great Danger of his Life. I was pierced to the Heart at the News, and could not forbear going to inquire after his Health. My Mother took this Opportunity of speaking in my Behalf she told him with abundance of Tears, that I was come to see him, that I could not speak to her for weeping, and that I should certainly break my Heart if he refus'd at that time to give me his Blessing, and he recon'ciled to me. He was so far from relenting to wards me, that he bid her speak no more of me, unless she had a mind to disturb him in his last Moments. For, Sir, you must know that he has the Reputation of an honest and religious Man, which makes my Misfortune so much the greater. God be thanked he is since recovered. But his severe Usage has given me such a Blow, that I shall soon sink under it, unless I may be relieved by any Impressions which the reading of this in your Paper may strike upon him.

I am, &amp;c

Of all Hardnesses of Heart there is none so inexcusable as that of Parents towards their Children. An obstinate, inflexible, unforgiving Temper is odious upon all Occasions, but here it is unnatural. The Love, Tenderness, and Compassion, which are apt to arise in us towards those [who] depend upon us, is that by which the whole World of Life is upheld. The Supreme Being, by the transcendent Excellency and Goodness of his Nature, extends his Mercy towards all his Works, and because his Creatures have not such a spontaneous Benevolence and Compassion towards those who are under their Care and Protection, he has implanted in them an Instinct, that supplies the Place of this inherent Goodness. I have illustrated this kind of Instinct in former Papers, and have shewn how it runs thro' all the Species of brute Creatures, as indeed the whole Animal Creation subsists by it.

This Instinct in Man is more general and uncircumscribed than in Brutes, as being enlarged by the Dictates of Reason and Duty. For if we consider our selves attentively, we shall find that we are not only inclined to love those who descend from us, but that we bear a kind of στοργή, or natural Affection, to every thing which relies upon us for its Good and Preservation. Dependence is a perpetual Call upon Humanity, and a greater Incitement to Tenderness and Pity than any other Motive whatsoever.

The Man therefore who, notwithstanding any Passion or Resentment, can overcome this powerful Instinct, and extinguish natural Affection, debases his Mind even below Brutality, frustrates, as much as in him lies, the great Design of Providence, and strikes out of his Nature one of the most Divine Principles that is planted in it.

Among innumerable Arguments [which] might be brought against such an unreasonable Proceeding, I shall only insist on one. We make it the Condition of our Forgiveness that we forgive others. In our very Prayers, we desire no more than to be treated by this kind of Retaliation. The Case therefore before us seems to be what they call a Case in Point. The Relation between the Child and Father being what comes nearest to that between a Creature and its Creator. If the Father is inexorable to the Child who has offended, let the Offence be of never so high a Nature, how will he address himself to the Supreme Being under the tender Appellation of a Father and desire of him such a Forgiveness as he himself refuses to grant?

To this I might add many other religious, as well as many prudential Considerations but if the 1st mentioned Motive does not prevail, I despair of succeeding by any other, and shall therefore conclude my Paper with a very remarkable Story, which is recorded in an old Chronicle published by Freher, among the Writers of the German History.*

Eginhart, who was Secretary to Charles the Great, became exceeding popular by his Behaviour in that Post. His great Abilities gain'd him the Favour of his Master, and the Esteem of the whole Court. Imma, the Daughter of the Emperor, was so pleased with his Person and Conversation, that she fell in Love with him. As she was one of the greatest Beauties of the Age, Eginhart answer'd her with a more than equal Return of Passion. They stuf'd their Flames for some Time, under Apprehension of the fatal Consequences that might ensue. Eginhart at length resolving to hazard all, rather than be deprived of one whom his Heart was so much set upon, convey'd himself one Night into the Princess's Apartment, and knocking gently at the Door, was admitted by a Person [who?] had something to communicate to her from the Emperor. He was with her in private most Part of the Night, but upon his preparing to go away about Break of Day, he observ'd that there had fallen a great Snow during his Stay with the Princess. This very much perplexed him, lest the Prints of his Feet in the Snow might make Discoveries to the King, who often used to visit his Daughter in the Morning. He acquaint'd the Princess Imma with his Fears, who, after some Consultations upon the Matter, prevail'd upon him to let her carry him through the Snow upon her own Shoulders. It happen'd, that the Emperor not being able to sleep, was at that time up and walking in his Chamber, when upon looking through the Window he perceiv'd his Daughter tottering under her Burden, and carrying his first Minister across the Snow, which she had no sooner done, but she return'd again with the utmost Speed to her own Apartment. The Emperor was extremely troubled and as amaz'd at this Accident * Marquard Freher, who died at Heidelberg in 1614 aged 49, was Counsellor to the Lector Prince, and Professor of Jurisprudence at Heidelberg, until employ'd by the Lector (Frederic IV) as his Minister in Poland, and at other courts. The chief of many works of his were, on the Monetary System of the Ancient Romans and of the German Empire in his day, a History of France, a collection of Writers on Bohemian History, and another of Writers on German History, Scriptores Germanici, in three volumes. It is from a Chronicle of the monastery of Lorsch (or Lorschheim), in Hesse Darmstadt, under the year 805, in the first volume of the last-named collection, that the story about Eginhart was taken by Bayle, out of whose Dictionary Addison got it. Bayle, indeed, specially recommends it as good matter for a story. Imma, the chronicle says, had been betrothed to the Grecian Emperor [that] but resolved to speak nothing of it till a proper Opportunity. In the mean time, Eginhart knowing that what he had done could not be long a Secret, determin'd to retire from Court, and in order to it begg'd the Emperor that he would be pleas'd to dismiss him, pretending a kind of Discontent at his not having been rewarded for his long Services. The Emperor would not give a direct Answer to his Petition, but told him he would think of it, and [appointed] a certain Day when he would let him know his Pleasure. He then call'd together the most faithful of his Counsellors, and requiring them with his Secretary's Crime, ask'd them their Advice in so delicate an Affair. They most of them gave their Opinion, that the Person could not be too severely punished who had thus dishonour'd his Master. Upon the whole Debate, the Emperor declar'd it was his Opinion, that Eginhart's Punishment would rather encrease than diminish the Shame of his Family, and that therefore he thought it the most advisable to wear out the Memory of the Fact, by marrying him to his Daughter. Accordingly Eginhart was call'd in, and requir'd by the Emperor, that he should no longer have any Pretence of complaining his Services were not rewarded, for that the Princess Imma should be given [him] in Marriage, with a Dowry suitable to her Quality, which was soon after performed accordingly. AS all Parts of humane Life come under my Observation, my Reader must not make uneharitable Inferences from my speaking knowingly of that Sort of Crime which is at present treated of. He will, I hope, suppose I know it only from the Letters of Correspondents, two of which you shall have as follow

MR SPECTATOR,

'It is wonderful to me that among the many Enormities which you have treated of, you have not mentioned that of Wenching, and particularly the Insinuating Part I mean, that it is a Thing very fit for your Pen to expose the Villany of the Practice of deluding Women. You are to know, Sir, that I myself am a Woman who have been one of the Unhappy that have fallen into this Misfortune, and that by the Insinuation of a very worthless Fellow, who serv'd others in the same Manner both before my Ruin and since that Time. I had, as soon as the Rascal left me, so much Indignation and Resolution, as not to go upon the Down, as the Phrase is, but took to Work for my Living in an obscure Place, out of the Knowledge of all with whom I was before acquainted.

It is the ordinary Practice and Business of Life with a Set of idle Fellows about this Town, to write Letters, send Messages, and form Ap

'pointments with little raw unthinking Girls, and leave them after Possession of them, without any Mercy, to Shame, Infamy, Poverty, and Distress. Were you to read the nauseous Impertinences which are written on these Occasions, and to see the silly Creatures sighing over them, it could not but be Matter of Mirth as well as Pity. A little Prentice Girl of mine has been for some time applied to by an Irish Fellow, who dresses very fine, and struts in a laced Coat, and is the Admiration of Seamstresses who are under Age in Town. Ever since I have had some Knowledge of the Matter, I have debarred my Prentice from Pen, Ink and Paper. But the other Day he bespoke some Cravats of me. I went out of the Shop, and left his Mistress to put them up into a Band box in order to be sent to him when his Man called. When I came into the Shop again, I took occasion to send her away, and found in the Bottom of the Box written these Words, Why would you ruin a harmless Creature that loves you? then in the Lid, There is no resisting Strephon. I screeched a little louder, and found in the Rim of the Box, At Eleven of clock at Night come in an Hackney-Coach at the End of our Street. This was enough to alarm me. I sent away the things, and took my Measures accordingly. An Hour or two before the appointed Time I examined my young Lady, and found her Trunk stuffed with impertinent Letters, and an old Scroll of Parchment in Latin, which her Lover had sent her as a Settlement of Fifty Pounds a Year. Among other things, there was also the best Lace I had in my Shop to make him a Present for Cravats. I was very glad of this last Circumstance, because I could very conscientiously swear against him that he had enticed my Servant away, and was her Accomplish in robbing me. I procured a Warrant against him accordingly. Every thing was now prepared, and the tender Hour of Love approaching, I, who had acted for myself in my Youth the same senseless Part, knew how to manage accordingly. Therefore after having looked up my Mind, and not being so much unlike her in Height and Shape, as in a huddled way not to pass for her, I delivered the Bundle designed to be carried off to her Lover's Man, who came with the Signal to receive them. Thus I followed after to the Coach, where when I saw his Master take them in, I cried out, Thieves! Thieves! and the Constable with his Attendants seized my expecting Lover. I kept my self unobserved till I saw the Crowd sufficiently encreased, and then appeared to declare the Goods to be mine, and had the Satisfaction to see my Man of Mode put into the Round House, with the stolen Wares by him, to be produced in Evidence against him the next Morning. This Matter is notoriously known to be Fact, and I have been contented to save my Prentice, and take a Year's Rent of this mortified Lover, and to appear further in the Matter. This was some Penance but, Sir, is this enough for a Villany of much more pernicious Consequence than the Injuries for which he was to have been indicted? Should not you, and all Men of any Parts or Honour, put things upon so

'right a Foot, as that such a Rascal should not laugh at the Imputation of what he was really guilty, and dread being accused of that for which he was arrested?

'In a word, Sir, it is in the Power of you, and such as I hope you are, to make it as infamous to rob a poor Creature of her Honour as her Cloaths. I leave this to your Consideration, only take Leave (which I cannot do without sighing) to remark to you, that if this had been the Sense of Mankind thirty Years ago, I should have avoided a Life spent in Poverty and Shame.

Mr SPECTATOR, Round-House, Sept 9
'I am a Man of Pleasure about Town, but by the Stupidity of a dull Rogue of a Justice of Peace, and an insolent Constable, upon the Oath of an old Harbinger, am imprisoned here for Theft, when I designed only Ornament. The Midnight Magistrate, as he conveyed me along, had you in his Mouth, and said, this would make a pure Story for the SPECTATOR. I hope, Sir, you won't pretend to Wit, and take the Part of dull Rogues of Business. The World is so altered of late Years, that there was not a Man who would knock down a Watchman in my Behalf, but I was carried off with as much Triumph as if I had been a Pick-pocket. At this rate, there is an end of all the Wit and Humour in the World. The Time was when all the honest Whore masters in the Neighbourhood would have rose against the Cuckolds to my Rescue. If Fornication is to be scandalous, half the fine things that have been writ by most of the Wits of the last Age may be burnt by the common Hangman. Harkye, [Mr] SIRC, do not be queer after having done some things pretty well, don't begin to write at that rate that no Gentlemen can read thee. Be true to Love, and burn your Seneca. Hesiod.

FABLES were the first Pieces of Wit that made their Appearance in the World, and have been still highly valued, not only in Times of the greatest Simplicity, but among the most polite Ages of Mankind. Zotham's Fable of the Trees<sup>1</sup> is the oldest that is extant, and as beautiful as any which have been made since that Time. Nathan's Fable of the poor Man and his Lamb<sup>2</sup> is likewise more ancient than any that is extant, besides the above-mentioned, and had so good an Effect, as to convey Instruction to the Lar of a King without offending it, and to bring the Man after God's own Heart to a right Sense of his Guilt and his Duty. We find Aesop in the most distant Ages of Greece, and if we look into the very Beginnings of the Commonwealth of Rome, we see a Mutiny among the Common People appeased by a Fable of the Bully and the Lamb<sup>1</sup> which was indeed very proper to gain the Attention of an incensed Rabble at a Time when perhaps they would have torn to Pieces any Man who had preached the same Doctrine to them in an open and direct Manner. As Fables took their Birth in the very Infancy of Learning, they never flourished more than when Learning was at its greatest Height. To justify this Assertion, I shall put my Reader in mind of Homer, the greatest Wit and Critick in the Augustan Age, and of Boileau, the most correct Poet among the Moderns. Not to mention La Fontaine, who by this Way of Writing is come more into Vogue than any other Author of our Times.

The Fables I have here mentioned are raised altogether upon Brutes and Vegetables, with some of our own Species mixt among them, when the Moral hath so required. But besides this kind of Fable, there is another in which the Actors are Passions, Virtues, Vices, and other imaginary Persons of the like Nature. Some of the ancient Criticks will have it that the Iliad and Odyssey of Homer are Fables of this Nature, and that the several Names of Gods and Heroes are nothing else but the Affections of the Mind in a visible Shape and Character. Thus they tell us, that Achilles, in the first Iliad, represents Anger, or the Irascible Part of Human Nature. Thit upon drawing his Sword against his Superior in a full Assembly, Pallas is only another Name for Reason, which cheeks and advises him upon this Occasion, and at her first Appearance touches him upon the Head, that Part of the Man being looked upon as the Seat of Reason. And thus of the rest of the Poem. As for the Odyssey, I think it is plain that Heraeus considered it as one of these Allegorical Fables by the Moral which he has given us of several Parts of it. The greatest Italian Wits have applied themselves to the Writing of this latter kind of Fables. As Shakespeare's Fairy Queen is one continued Series of them from the Beginning to the End of this admirable Work. If we look into the finest Prose Authors of Antiquity, such as Cicero, Plato, Aeschylus, and many other, we shall find that this was likewise their Favourite Kind of Fable. I shall only further observe upon it, that the first of this Sort that made any considerable Figure in the World, was that of Heraeus meeting with Pleasure and Virtue, which was invented by Protagoras who lived before Socrates, and in the first Drawings of Philosophy. He used to travel through Greece by vertue of this Fable, which procured him a kind Reception in all the Market towns, where he never failed telling it as soon as he had gathered an Audience about him.<sup>2</sup>

After this short Preface, which I have made up of such Materials as my Memory does at present suggest to me, before I present my Reader with a Fable of this kind, which I design as the Entertainment of the present Paper, I must in a few Words open the Occasion of it.

In the Account which Plato gives us of the Conversation and Behaviour of Socrates, the Morning he was to die, he tells the following Circumstance.

When Socrates his Fetters were knocked off (as was usual to be done on the Day that the condemned Person was to be executed) being seated in the midst of his Disciples, and tying one of his Legs over the other, in a very unconcerned Posture he began to rub it where it had been galled by the Iron, and whether it was to shew the Indifference with which he entertained the Thoughts of his approaching Death, or (after his usual Manner) to take every Occasion of Philosophizing up in some useful Subject, he observed the Pleasure of that Sensation which now arose in those very Parts of his Leg, that just before had been so much pained by the Fetter. Upon this he reflected on the Nature of Pleasure and Pain in general, and how constantly they succeeded one another. To this he added, that if a Man of a good Genius for a Fable were to represent the Nature of Pleasure and Pain in that Way of Writing, he would probably join them together after such a manner, that it would be impossible for the one to come into any Place without being followed by the other.<sup>1</sup>

It is possible, that if Plato had thought it proper at such a Time to describe Socrates launching out into a Discourse [which] was not of a piece with the Business of the Day, he would have enlarged upon this Hint, and have drawn it out into some beautiful Allegory or Fable. But since he has not done it, I shall attempt to write one myself in the Spirit of that Divine Author.

There were two Families which from the Beginning of the World were as opposite to each other as Light and Darkness. The one of them lived in Heaven, and the other in Hell. The youngest Descendant of the first Family was Pleasure, who was the Daughter of Happiness, who was the Child of Virtue, who was the Offspring of the Gods. These, as I said before, had their Habitation in Heaven. The youngest of the opposite Family was Pain, who was the Son of Misery, who was the Child of Vice, who was the Offspring of the Furies. The Habitation of this Race of Beings was in Hell.

The middle Station of Nature between these two opposite Extremes was the Earth, which was inhabited by Creatures of a middle Kind, neither so Virtuous as the one, nor so Vicious as the other, but partaking of the good and bad Qualities of these two opposite Families. Jupiter considering that this Species commonly called Man, was too virtuous to be miserable, and too vicious to be happy, that he might make a Distinction between the Good and the Bad, ordered the two youngest of the above-mentioned Families,

Pleasure who was the Daughter of Happiness, and Pain who was the Son of Misery, to meet one another upon this Part of Nature's Field, by the half-Way between them, in a private way to settle it upon them both, provided they could agree upon the Division of it, so as to share Mankind let them.

Pleasure and Pain were recovered in their new Habitator, but they immediately agreed upon this Point that Pleasure should take Possession of the Virtuous, and Pain of the Vicious Part of that Species which is, or up to them, but upon examining to which of them any Individual they are entitled to, they found each of them had a Right to him, for that, contrary to what they had seen in their old Places of Residence, there was no Person so Virtuous who had not some Good in him, nor any Person so Vicious who had not some Fault in him. The Truth of it is, they generally find upon Search that in the virtuous is Man Pleasure, and in the Claim to an hundredth Part and ten in the most virtuous Man Pain might come in for at least two thirds. Thus it is a very old and endless Dispute between them, unless they could come to some Accommodation. Both said there was a Marriage proposed between them, and at length concluded by this, that it is the just Pleasure and Pain are suitors to a virtuous Fellow, and that they either make the virtuous together, or are never far asunder. If Pain comes into a Heart, he is quickly followed by Pleasure, and if Pleasure enters, you may be sure Pain is not far off.

But notwithstanding this Marriage was very convenient for the Vicious Parties, it did not seem to answer the Intention of Jupiter in sending them an old Mankind. To remedy therefore this Inconvenience, it was stipulated to be inserted by Article, and confirmed by the Consent of each Party, that notwithstanding they here possessed the Species differently, upon the Death of every single Person, if he was found to have in him a certain Proportion of Pleasure, he should be dispatched into the infernal Kingdom by a Passport from Pain, there to dwell in the Misery, Torment and the Furies. Or on the contrary, if he had in him a certain Proportion of Good, he should be dispatched into Heaven by a Passport from Pleasure, there to dwell with Happiness, Peace and the Gods.

WHEN a Man has discovered a new Vein of Humour, it often carries him much further than he expected from it. My Correspondents take the Hint I gave them, and pursue it into Speculations which I never thought of at my first starting it. This has been the Fate of my Paper on the Match of Grunning, which has already produced a second Paper on parallel Subjects, and here, hit me the following Letter by the last Post. I shall not premise any thing to it further than that it is built on Matter of Fact, and is as follows.

SIR,

You have already obliged the World with a Discourse upon Grunning, and have since proceeded to Whetting, from whence you (it has been called) have brought forth. I think you may make a very natural Transition to Sleep, I therefore recommend to you for the Subject of a Paper the following Advertisment, which about two Months ago was given into every Body's Hand, and is very seen with some Additions in the Daily Comment of August the Ninth.

Nicholas Hart who slept in a Year in St Bartholomew's Hospital, intends to sleep this Year at the Cock and Bottle in Little-Britain.

Having since inured it to the Master of Fate, I find that the above mentioned Nicholas Hart is every Year seized with a periodical Fit of Sleeping, which he usually sleeps the Fifth of August, and ends on the Twelfth of the same Month.

That
On the First of that Month he grew dull
On the Second appeared drowsy
On the Third fell a slumber
On the Fourth began to nod
On the Fifth dropped asleep
On the Sixth was heard to snore
On the Seventh turned himself in his Bed
On the Eighth recovered his former Posture
On the Ninth fell a stretching
On the Tenth about Midnight, awaked
On the Eleventh in the Morning called for a little Sleep

This Account I have extracted out of the Journal of this sleeping Worthy, as it has been faithfully kept by a Gentleman of Lincoln's Inn, who has undertaken to be his Chronographer. I have sent it to you not only as it represents the Actions of Nicholas Hart, but as it seems a very natural Picture of the Life of many honest English Gentlemen who whose whole History very often consists of Yawning, Nodding, Stretching, Fawning, Sleeping, Drunken, and the like extraordinary Particulars. I do not question Sir, that, if you please, you could put out an Advertisment not unlike the above men-

[I am at length come]

Nicholas Hart born at Leyden was at this time 22 years old, one of ten children of a learned mathematician who for two years had been a tutor to King William. Nicholas was a sailor from the age of twelve, and no scholar, although he spoke French, Dutch, and English. He was a patient at St Bartholomew's for some and I travel some weeks before, and on the 3rd of August 1711, set his mark to a record of himself which he expected to fall asleep on the fifth of August, two days later. This account was also signed by William Hill, Sen. No. 1 Lincoln's Inn, the Gentleman of Lincoln's Inn, presently alluded to.

‘tuned, of several Men of Figure, that Mr. Yo<sup>rs</sup> in such a one, Gentleman, or Thou as such a one, Esquire, who slept in the Country last Summer, intends to sleep in Town this Winter. The worst of it is, that the drowsy Part of our Species is chiefly made up of very honest Gentlemen, who live quietly among their Neighbours, without ever disturbing the publick Peace. They are Drones without Stings. I could heartily wish, that several turbulent, restless ambitious Spirits, would for a while change Places with these good Men, and enter themselves into Nicholas Hart’s Fraternity. Could I one but lay asleep a few busy Heads which I could name, from the First of November next to the First of May ensuing, I question not but it would very much redound to the Quiet of particular Persons, as well as to the Benefit of the Publick.

‘But to return to Nicholas Hart. I believe, Sir, you will think it a very extraordinary Circumstance for a Man to gain his Livelihood by Sleeping, and that Resolute procure a Man Subsistence as well as Industry, yet so it is that Nicholas got last Year enough to support himself for a Twelvemonth. I am likewise informed that he has this Year had a very comfortable Nap. The Poets value themselves very much for sleeping on Parnassus, but I never heard they got a Groat by it. On the contrary, our Friend Nicholas gets more by Sleeping than he could by Working, and may be more properly said, than ever Homer was, to have had Golden Dreams. Juvenal indeed mentions a drowsy Husband who raised an Estate by Snoring, but then he is represented to have slept what the common People call a Dog’s Sleep, or if his Sleep was real, his Wife was awake, and about her Business. Your Pen, [which] loves to mortelize upon all Subjects may use something, methinks, on this Circumstance also, and point out to us those Sets of Men, who instead of growing rich by an honest Industry recommend themselves to the Favour of the Great, by making themselves agreeable Companions in the Participations of Luxury and Pleasure.

I must further acquaint you, Sir, that one of the most eminent Pens in Grub-street is now employed in Writing the Dream of this miraculous Sleeper, which I hear will be of a more than ordinary Length, as it must contain all the Particulars that are supposed to have passed in his Imagination during so long a Sleep. He is said to have gone already through three Days and [three] Nights of it, and to have comprised in them the most remarkable Passages of the four first Empires of the World. If he can keep free from Puri-Strokes, his Work may be of Use, but this I much doubt, having been informed by one of his Friends and Confidants that he has spoken some things of Nimrod with too great Freedom.

THERE is nothing in which Men more deceive themselves than in what the World calls Zeal. There are so many Passions which hide themselves under it, and so many Mischiefs arising from it, that some have gone so far as to say it would have been for the Benefit of Mankind if it had never been reckoned in the Catalogue of Virtues. It is certain, where it is once Laudable and Prudential, it is an hundred times Criminal and Erroneous: nor can it be otherwise, if we consider that it operates with equal Violence in all Religions, however opposite they may be to one another, and in all the Subdivisions of each Religion in particular.

We are told by some of the Jeish Rabbins that the first Murder was occasioned by a religious Controversy: and if we had the whole History of Zeal from the Days of Cain to our own Times, we should see it filled with so many Scenes of Slaughter and Bloodshed, as would make a wise Man very careful how he suffers himself to be actuated by such a Principle, when it only regards Matters of Opinion and Speculation.

I would have every Zealous Man examine his Heart thoroughly, and, I believe, he will often find, that what he calls a Zeal for his Religion, is either Pride, Interest, or Ill nature. [A Man who] differs from another in Opinion sets himself above him in his own Judgment, and in several Particulars pretends to be the wiser Person. This is a great Provocation to the proud Man, and gives a very keen Edge to what he calls his Zeal. And that this is the Case very often, we may observe from the Behaviour of some of the most zealous for Orthodoxy, who have often great Friendships and Intimacies with vicious immoral Men, provided they do but agree with them in the same Scheme of belief. The Reason is, because the vicious believer gives the Precedence to the virtuous Man and allows the good Christian to be the worthier Person, at the same time that he cannot come up to his Perfections. This we find exemplified in that true Passage which we see quoted in almost every System of Ethics, tho’ upon another Occasion

—*Viduo meliora proboque,
De’tiora sequor*— Ov

On the contrary, it is certain, if our Zeal were true and genuine, we should be much more angry with a Sinner than a Heretic: since there are several Cases [which] may excuse the latter before his great Judge, but none [which] can excuse the former.

Interest is likewise a great Inflamer, and sets a Man on Persecution under the colour of Zeal. For this Reason we find none are so forward to promote the true Worship by Fire and Sword, as those who find their present Account in it. But I shall extend the Word Interest to a larger Mean than what is generally given it, as it relates to our Spiritual Safety and Welfare, as well as to our Temporal. A Man is glad to gain Numbers on his Side, as they serve to strengthen him in his private Opinions. Every Proselyte is like a new Argument for the Establishment of his Faith. It makes him believe that his Principles carry Conviction with them, and are the more likely to be true, when he finds they are conformable to the Reason of others, as well as to his own. And that this Temper of Mind deludes a Man very often into an Opinion of his Zeal, may appear from the common Behaviour of the Atheist, who maintains and spreads his Opinions with as much Heat as those who believe they do it only out of Passion for God's Glory.

All nature is another dreadful Imitator of Zeal. Many a good Man may have a natural Rancour and Malice in his Heart, [which<sup>1</sup>] has been in some measure quelled and subdued by Religion; but if it finds any Pretence of breaking out, which does not seem to him inconsistent with the Duties of a Christian, it throws off all Restraint, and rages in its full Fury. Zeal is therefore a great Ease to a malicious Man, by making him believe he does God Service, whilst he is gratifying the Bent of a perverse revengeful Temper. For this Reason we find, that most of the Massacres and Devastations, [which<sup>2</sup>] have been in the World, have taken their Rise from a furious pretended Zeal.

I love to see a Man zealous in a good Matter, and especially when his Zeal shows it self for advancing Morality, and promoting the Happiness of Mankind. But when I find the Instruments he works with are Racks and Gibbets, Gallies and Dungeons, when he imprisons Mens Persons, confiscates their Estates, ruins their Families, and burns the Body to save the Soul, I cannot stick to pronounce of such a one, that (whatever he may think of his Faith and Religion) his Faith is vain, and his Religion unprofitable.

After having treated of these false Zealots in Religion, I cannot forbear mentioning a monstrous Species of Men, who one would not think had any Existence in Nature, were they not to be met with in ordinary Conversation, I mean the Zealots in Atheism. One would fancy that these Men, tho' they fall short, in every other Respect of those who make a Profession of Religion, would at least outshine them in this Particular, and be exempt from that single Fault which seems to grow out of the imprudent Fervours of Religion. But so it is, that Infidelity is propagated with as much Ferocity and Contention, Wrath and Indignation as if the Safety of Mankind depended upon it. There is something so ridiculous and perverse in this kind of Zealots, that one does not know how to set them out in their proper Colours. They are a Sort of Gamesters [who<sup>3</sup>] are eternally upon the Edge, though they play for nothing. They are perpetually teasing their Friends to come over to them, though at the same time they allow that neither of them shall get any thing by the Bargain. In short, the Zeal of spreading Atheism is, if possible, more absurd than Atheism it self.

Since I have mentioned this unaccountable Zeal which appears in Atheists and Infidels, I must further observe that they are likewise in a most particular manner possessed with the Spirit of Bigotry. They are wedded to Opinions full of Contradiction and Impossibility, and at the same time look upon the smallest Difficulty in an Article of Faith as a sufficient Reason for rejecting it. Notions that fall in with the common Reason of Mankind, that are conformable to the Sense of all Ages and all Nations, not to mention their Tendency for promoting the Happiness of Societies, or of particular Persons, are exploded as Errors and Prejudices, and Schemes erected in their stead that are altogether monstrous and irrational, and require the most extravagant Credulity to embrace them. I would not ask one of these bigotted Infidels, supposing all the great Points of Atheism, as the casual or eternal Formation of the World, the Materiality of a thinking Substance, the Mortality of the Soul, the fortuitous Organization of the Body, the Motions and Gravitation of Matter, with the like Particulars, were laid together and formed [into] a kind of Creed, according to the Opinions of the most celebrated Atheists, I say, supposing such a Creed as this were formed, and imposed upon any one People in the World, whether it would not require an infinitely greater Measure of Faith, than any Set of Articles which they so violently oppose. Let me therefore advise this Generation of Wranglers, for their own and for the publick Good, to act at least so consistently with themselves, as not to burn with Zeal for Irreligion, and with Bigotry for Nonsense. Colum æsum pectus stultitiæ — Hor

UPON my Return to my Lodgings last Night I found a Letter from my worthy Friend the Clergyman, whom I have given some Account of in my former Papers. He tells me in it that he was particularly pleased with the latter Part of my Yesterday's Speculation, and at the same time enclosed the following Essay, which he desires me to publish as the Sequel of that Discourse. It consists partly of uncommon Reflections, and partly of such as have been already used, but now set in a stronger Light.

'A Believer may be excused by the most hardened Atheist for endeavouring to make him a Convert, because he does it with an Eye to both their Interests. The Atheist is inexcusable who tries to gain over a Believer, because he does not propose the doing himself or the Believer any Good by such a Conversion.

'The Prospect of a future State is the secret Comfort and Refreshment of my Soul: it is that which makes Nature look grey about me: it

'doubles all my Pleasures, and supports me under all my Afflictions. I can look on Disappointments and Misfortunes, Pain and Sickness, Death itself, and what is worse than Death, the Loss of those who are dearest to me, with Indifference so long as I keep in view the Pleasures of Eternity, and the State of Being in which there will be no Pains nor Apprehensions, Pains nor Sorrows, Sickness nor Separation. Why will my Man be so impertinently Oficious to tell me all this is only Fruity and Delusion? Is there a Man Merit in being the Messenger of all New? If it is a Dream, let me enjoy it, since it makes me both the happier and better Man.

I must confess I do not know how to trust a Man [who] believes neither Heaven nor Hell, or in other Words, a future State of Rewards and Punishments. Not only natural Self-love, but Reason directs us to promote our own Interest above all Things. It can never be for the Interest of a Believer to do me a Mischief, because he is sure upon the Balance of Account to find himself a Loser by it. On the contrary, if he considers his own Welfare in his Behaviour towards me, it will lead him to do me all the Good he can, and at the same Time restrain him from doing me any Injury. An Unbeliever does not act like a reasonable Creature, if he favours me contrary to his present Interest, or does not distress me when it turns to his present Advantage. Honour and Good will may indeed lead him to do me all the Good he can, but it is these would be very much strengthened by Reason and Principle, so without them they are only Instincts, or wavering unsettled Notions, which rest on no Foundation.

Infidelity has been attacked with so good Success of late Years, that it is driven out of all its Outworks. The Atheist has not so much to boast of as is therefore retired into Denial and a Disbelief of revealed Religion only. But the Truth of it is, the greatest Number of these sort of Men are those who for want of a virtuous Education or examination the Grounds of Religion, know so very little of the Matter in Question, that their Infidelity is but another Term for their Ignorance.

As Iolly and Lucan's derativeness are the Foundations of Infidelity, the great Pillars and Supports of it are either a Vanity of opinion, wiser than the rest of Mankind, or an Contention of Courage in despising the Terrors of another World, which have so great an Influence on what they call weaker Minds, or an Aversion to a Belief that must cut them off from many of the Pleasures they propose to themselves, and fill them with Remorse for many of those they have already tasted.

The great received Articles of the Christian Religion have been so clearly proved, from the Authority of that Divine Revelation in which they are delivered, that it is impossible for those who have Eyes to hear, and Ears to see, not to be convinced of them. But were it possible for anything in the Christian Faith to be erroneous, I can find no ill Consequences in adhering to it.

The great Points of the Incarnation and Sufferings of our Saviour produce naturally such Habits of Virtue in the Mind of Man, that I say, supposing it were possible for us to be mistaken to them, the Infidel himself must at least allow that no other System of Religion could so effectually contribute to the heightening of Morality. They give us, great Ideas of the Dignity of human Nature, and of the Love which the Supreme Being bears to his Creatures, and consequently engage us in the highest Acts of Duty towards our Creator, our Neighbour and ourselves. How many noble Arguments has this Foundation of the Church of Art, for our Religion, for the edification of Mankind in its three great Branches? To give a single Example in each kind. What can be a stronger Motive to a firm Trust and Reliance on the Mercy of our Maker, than the giving us his Son to suffer for us? What can excite a Love and Reverence even the most considerable of our Kind more than the Thought that Christ died for him? Or what disposition to a stricter Guard upon the Points of our own Honour, than our being Members of a Church, and a Part of the Society of which that immortal Person is the Head? But these are only a Specimen of the admirable Reinforcement of Morality, which the Apostle has drawn from the History of our blessed Saviour.

If a modern Infidel considered the Matters with that Candour and Seriousness which they deserve, he should not see them act with such a Spirit of Incessant, Arrogance, and Ill-humour. They would not be raising such insignificant Cavils, Doubts, and Senples, as may be started against every thing, that is not capable of mathematical Demonstration in order to mislead the Minds of the Ignorant, disturb the publick Peace, subvert Morality, and throw all things into Confusion and Disorder. It were of these Reflections can have any Influence on them, there is one that perhaps may, because it is adapted to their Vanity, by which they seem to be guided much more than their Reason. I would therefore have a Man consider, that he wise and best of Men, in all Ages of the World, have been those who have lived up to the Religion of their Country, where they saw nothing but opposite to Morality, and that the last of these they had of the Divine Nature. The first kind directs us to worship the Gods as it is commanded by Law, for that is the most natural Expression of the Precept. The second shows the most renowned among the Heathens both for Wisdom and Virtue, in his last Moments desires his Friends to offer a Cock in sacrifice, and double out of a submissive Deference to the established Worship of his Country. Xenophon tells us, that his Prince (whom he sets forth as a Pattern of Perfection), when he found his Death approaching, offered Sacrifices on the Mountains to the Persian Jupiter, and the Sun according to the Custom of the Persians, for those are the Words of the Historian. Nay, the Epicureans and Atomical Philosophers shewed a very remarkable

Miseri quibus
Intentata mites— Hor

THE Intelligence given by this Correspondent is so important and useful, in order to avoid the Persons he speaks of, that I shall insert his Letter at length

MR SPECTATOR,

'I do not know that you have ever touched upon a certain species of Women, whom we ordinarily call Jilts. You cannot possibly go upon a more useful Work, than the Consideration of these dangerous Animals. The Coquet is indeed one Degree towards the Jilt but the Heart of the former is bent upon admiring her self, and giving false Hopes to her Lovers but the latter is not contented to be extremely unfaithful, but she must add to that Advantage a certain Delight in being a Torment to others. Thus when her Lover is in the full Expectation of Success, the Jilt shall meet him with a sudden Indifference, and Admiration in her Face at his being surprised that he is received like a Stranger, and a Cast of her Head another Way with a pleasant Scorn of the fellow's Insolence. It is very probable the Lover goes home utterly astonished and dejected, sits down to his Scrutator, sends her word in the most object Terms, That he knows not what he has done, that all which was desirable in this Jilt is so suddenly vanished from him, that the Charmer of his Soul should withdraw the vital Heat from the Heart which pants for her. He continues a mournful Absence for some time, pining in Secret, and out of Humour with all things which he meets with. At length he takes a Resolution to try his Fate, and explain with her resolutely upon her unaccountable Carriage. He walks up to her Apartment, with a thousand Inquietudes and Doubts in what Manner he shall meet the first Cast of her Eye, when upon his first Appearance she flies towards him, wonders where he has been, accuses him of his Absence, and treats him with a Familiarity as surprising as her former Coldness. His good Correspondence continues till the Lady observes the Lover grows happy in it, and then she interrupts it with some new Inconsistency of Behaviour. For (as I just now said) the Happiness of a Jilt consists only in the Power of making others uneasy. But such is the Folly of this Sect of Women that they carry on this pretty skittish Behaviour, till they have no charms left to render it supportable. Corinna, that used to torment all who conversed with her with false Glances, and little heedless ungurded Motions, that were to betray some Inclination towards the Man she would ensnare, finds at present all she attempts that way unregarded, and is obliged to indulge the Jilt in her Constitution, by laying Artificial Plots, writing perplexing Letters from unknown Hands, and making all the young Fellows in Love with her, till they find out who she is. Thus as before she gave Torment by disguising her Inclination, she is now obliged to do it by lulling her Person.

'As for my own Part, Mr SPECTATOR, it has been my unhappy Fate to be jilted from my Youth upward and as my Taste has been very much towards Intreague, and living Intelligence with Women of Wit, my whole Life has passed away in a Series of Impositions. I shall for the Benefit of the present Race of young Men, give some Account of my Loves. I know not whether you have ever heard of the famous Girl about Town called Kitty. This Creature (for I must take Shame upon my self) was my Mistress in the Days when keeping was in Fashion. Kitty, under the Appearance of being Wild, Thoughtless, and Irregular in all her Words and Actions, concealed the most accomplished Jilt of her Time. Her Negligence had to me a Charm in it like that of Christianity, and Want of Desires seemed to great a Merit as the Conquest of them. The Air she gave herself was that of a Romping Girl, and whenever I talked to her with any Turn of Fondness, she would immediately snivel off my Periwig, try it upon herself in the Glass, clap her Arms a Round, draw a Sword, and make Passes on the Wall take off my Cravat, and seize it to make some other Use of the Laces, or run into some other unaccountable Rompsiness, till the Time I had appointed to pass away with her was over. I went from her full of Pleasure at the Reflection that I had the keeping of so much Beauty in a Woman, who, as she was too heedless to please me, was also too unattentive to form a Design to wrong me. Long did I divert every Hour that hung heavy upon me in the Company of this Creature, whom I looked upon as neither Guilty or Innocent, but could laugh at my self for my unaccountable Pleasure in an Expende upon her, till in the End it appeared my pretty Insensible was with Child by my Footman.

'This Accident roused me into a Disdain against all Libertine Women, under what Appearance soever they hid their Insincerity, and I resolved after that Time to converse with none but those who lived within the Rules of Decency and Honour. To this End I formed my self into a more regular Turn of Behaviour, and began to make Visits, frequent Assemblies, and laid out I rides from the Theatre, with all the other insignificant Duties which the professed Servants of the Fair place themselves in constant Readiness to perform. In a very little time, (having a plentiful Fortune) Fathers and Mothers began to regard me as a good Match, and I found easy Admittance into the best Families in Town to observe their Daughters but I, who was born to 'follow the Fair to no Purpose, have by the Force of my ill Stars made my Application to three Jilts successively

'Hyæna is one of those who form themselves into a melancholy and indolent Air, and endeavour to gain Admirers from their Inattention to all round them. Hyæna can loll in her Couch, with something so fixed in her Countenance, that it is impossible to conceive her Meditation is employed only on her Dress and her Charms in that Posture. If it were not too coarse a Simile, I should say, Hyæna, in the Figure she affects, to appear in, is a Spider in the midst of a Cobweb, that is sure to destroy every Fly that approaches it. The Net Hyæna throws is so fine, that you are taken in it before you can observe any Part of her Work. I attempted her for a long and weary Season, but I found her Piss on went no further than to be admired, and she is of that unreasonable Temper, is not to value the Inconstancy of her Lovers, provided she can boast she once had their Addresses.

'Biblis was the second I aimed at, and her Vanity lay in purchasing the Adorers of others, and not in rejoicing in their Love it self. Biblis is no Man's Mistress, but every Woman's Rival. As soon as I found this, I fell in Love with Chloe, who is my present Pleasure and Torment. I have writ to her, dined with her, and fought for her, and have been her Man in the Sight and Expectation of the whole Town [these] three Years, and thought myself near the End of my Wishes, when the other Day she called me into her Closet, and told me, with a very grave Face, that she was a Woman of Honour, and scorned to deceive a Man who loved her with so much Sincerity as she saw I did, and therefore she must inform me that she was by Nature the most inconstant Creature breathing, and begged of me not to marry her. If I insisted upon it, I should, but that she was lately fallen in Love with another. What to do or say I know not, but desire you to inform me, and you will infinitely oblige,

HE is a very unhappy Man who sets his Heart upon being admired by the Multitude, or affects a general and undistinguishing Applause among Men. What pious Men call the Testimony of a good Conscience, should be the Measure of our Ambition in this Kind, that is to say, a Man of Spirit should condemn the Praise of the Ignorant, and like being applauded for nothing but what he knows in his own Heart he deserves. Besides, which the Character of the Person who commends you is to be considered, before you set a Value upon his Esteem. The Praise of an ignorant Man is only Good will, and you should receive his Kindness as he is a good Neighbour in Society, and not as a good Judge of your Actions in Point of Fame and Reputation. The Satisfactions and very well of popular Praise and Acclamations, Give the Fuellers and Cohlers their Presents again, and learn to live of your self. It is an Argument of a loose and ungoverned Mind to be affected with the promiscuous Approbation of the Generality of Mankind, and a Man of Virtue should be too delicate for so coarse an Appetite of Fame. Men of Honour should endeavour only to please the Worthy, and the Man of Merit should desire to be tried only by his Peers. I thought it a noble Sentiment which I heard Yesterday uttered in Conversation, I know, said a Gentleman, a Way to be greater than any Man. If he has Worth in him, I can rejoice in his Superiority to me, and that Satisfaction is a greater Act of the Soul in me, than any in him which can possibly appear to me. I thus thought could not proceed but from a candid and generous Spirit, and the Approbation of such Minds is what may be esteemed true Praise. For with the common Rate of Men there is nothing commendable but what they themselves may hope to be Partakers of, or arrive at, but the Motive truly glorious is, when the Mind is set rather to do Things laudable, than to purchase Reputation. Where there is that Sincerity is the Foundation of a good Name, the kind Opinion of virtuous Men will be an unsought but a necessary Consequence. The Lacedæmonians, tho' a plain People, and no Pretenders to Politeness, had a certain Delicacy in their Sense of Glory, and sacrificed to the Muses when they entered upon any great Enterprise. They would have the Commemoration of their Actions be transmitted by the purest and most untainted Memorialists. The Din which attends Victories and publick Triumphs is by far less eligible, than the Recital of the Actions of great Men by honest and wise Historians. It is a frivolous Pleasure to be the Admiration of gaping Crowds, but to have the Approbation of a good Man in the cool Reflections of his Closet, is a Gratification worthy an heroic Spirit. The Applause of the Crowd makes the Head giddy, but the Attestation of a reasonable Man makes the Heart glad.

THE Intelligence given by this Correspondent is so important and useful, in order to avoid the Persons he speaks of, that I shall insert his Letter at length

Mr SPECTATOR,

'I do not know that you have ever touched upon a certain species of Women, whom we ordinarily call Jilts. You cannot possibly go upon a more useful Work, than the Consideration of these dangerous Animals. The Coquet is indeed one Degree towards the Jilt but the Heart of the former is bent upon admiring her self, and giving false Hopes to her Lovers but the latter is not contented to be extremely amiable, but she must add to that Advantage a certain Delight in being a Torment to others. Thus when her Lover is in the full Expectation of Success, the Jilt shall meet him with a sudden Indifference, and Admiration in her Face at his being surprised that he is received like a Stranger, and a Cast of her Head another Way with a pleasant Scorn of the Fellow's Insolence. It is very probable the Lover goes home utterly astonished and dejected, sits down to his Scrutator, sends her word in the most oblique Terms, That he knows not what he has done that all which was desirable in this Life is so suddenly withdrawn from him, that the Churner of his Soul should withdraw the vital Heat from the Heart which prints for her. He continues a mournful Absence for some time pining in Secret, and out of Humour with all things which he meets with. At length he takes a Resolution to try his Fate, and explain with her resolutely upon her unaccountable Carriage. He walks up to her Apartment, with a thousand Inquietudes and Doubts in what Manner he shall meet the first Cast of her Eye when upon his first appearance she flies towards him, wonders where he has been, accuses him of his Absence, and treats him with a Familiarity as surprising as her former Coldness. This good Correspondence continues till the Lady observes the Lover grows happy in it, and then she interrupts it with some new Inconsistency of Behaviour. For (as I just now said) the Happiness of a Jilt consists only in the Power of making others uneasy. But such is the Folly of this Sect of Women, that they carry on this pretty skittish Behaviour, till they have no charms left to render it supportable. Corinna, that used to torment all who conversed with her with false Glances, and little heedless unguarded Motions, that were to betray some Inclination towards the Man she would ensnare, finds at present all she attempts that way unregarded, and is obliged to indulge the Jilt in her Constitution, by laying Artificial Plots, writing perplexing Letters from unknown Hands, and making all the young Fellows in Love with her, till they find out who she is. Thus as before she gave Torment by disguising her Inclination, she is now obliged to do it by hiding her Person.

As for my own Part, Mr SPECTATOR, it has been my unhappy Fate to be jilted from my Youth upward and as my Last has been very much towards Intreague, and having Intelligence with Women of Wit, my whole Life has passed away in a Series of Impositions. I went from her full of Pleasure at the Reflection that I had the keeping of so much Beauty in a Woman, who, as she was too heedless to please me, was also too inattentive to form a Design to wrong me. <sup>2</sup> Plutarch in Life of Lycurgus

What makes the Love of popular or general Praise still more ridiculous, is, that it is usually given for Circumstances which are foreign to the Persons admired. Thus they are the ordinary Attendants on Power and Riches, which may be taken out of one Man's Hands, and put into another's. The Application only, and not the Possession, makes those outward things honourable. The Vulgar and Men of Sense agree in admiring Men for having what they themselves would rather be possessed of, the wise Man applauds him whom he thinks most virtuous, the rest of the World, him who is most wealthy.

When a Man is in this way of Thinking, I do not know what can occur to one more monstrous, than to see Persons of Ingenuity address their Services and Performances to Men no way addicted to Liberal Arts. In these Cases, the Praise on one hand, and the Patronage on the other, are equally the Objects of Ridicule. Dedications to ignorant Men are as absurd as any of the Speeches of Bulfinch in the Drill. Such an Address one is apt to translate into other Words, and when the Different Parties are thoroughly considered, the Panegyrick generally implies no more than if the Author should say to the Patron: My very good Lord, You and I can never understand one another, therefore I humbly desire we may be intimate Friends for the future.

The Rich may as well ask to borrow of the Poor, as the Man of Virtue or Merit hope for Addition to his Character from any but such as himself. He that commends another engages so much of his own Reputation as he gives to that Person commended, and he that has nothing laudable in himself is not of Ability to be such a Surety. The wise Phocion was so sensible how dangerous it was to be touched with what the Multitude approved, that upon a general Acclamation made when he was making an Oration, he turned to an intelligent Friend who stood near him, and asked, in a surprized Manner, What Slip have I made?<sup>2</sup>

I shall conclude this Paper with a Pillet which has fallen into my Hands, and was written to a Lady from a Gentleman whom she had highly commended. The Author of it had formerly been her Lover. When all Possibility of Commerce between them on the Subject of Love was cut off, she spoke so handsomely of him, as to give Occasion for this Letter.

Madam,

'I should be insensible to a Stupidity, if I could forbear making you my Acknowledgments for your late mention of me with so much Applause. It is, I think, your Fate to give me new Sentiments as you formerly inspired me with the true Sense of Love, so do you now with the true Sense of Glory. As Desire had the least Part in the Passion I heretofore professed towards you, so has Vanity no Share in the Glory to which you have now roused me. Innocence, Knowledge, Beauty, Virtue, Sincerity, and Discretion, are the constant Ornaments of her who has said this of me. Fame is a Babbler, but I have arrived at the highest Glory

THE following Letter being written to my Bookseller, upon a Subject of which I treated some time since, I shall publish it in this Paper, together with the Letter that was inclosed in it.

Mr Buckley,

'Mr SPECTATOR having of late descanted upon the Cruelty of Parents to their Children, I have been induced (at the Request of several of Mr SPECTATOR's Admirers) to inclose this Letter, which I assure you is the Original from a Father to his own Son, notwithstanding the latter gave but little or no Provocation. It would be wonderfully obliging to the World, if Mr SPECTATOR would give his Opinion of it, in some of his Speculations, and particularly to

(Mr Buckley)

Your Humble Servant

SIRRAH,

'You are a sawcy audacious Rascal, and both Fool and Mad, and I care not a Farthing whether you comply or no: that does not run out my Impressions of your Insolence, going about railing at me, and the next Day to solicit my Favour. These are Inconsistencies, such as discover thy Reason deprived. To be brief, I never desire to see your Face, and, Sirrah, if you go to the Work house, it is no Disgrace to me for you to be supported there: and if you starve in the Streets, I'll never give anything under-hand in your Behalf. If I have any more of your scribbling Nonsense I'll break your Head the first Time I set Sight on you. You are a stubborn Beast: is this your Gratitude for me, giving you Money? You Rogue, I'll better your Judgment, and give you a greater Sense of your Duty to (I regret to say) your Father, &c.

'P S It's Prudence for you to keep out of my Sight, for to reproach me, that might overcome Right, on the Outside of your Letter, I shall give you a great knock on the Skull for it.

Was there ever such an Image of Paternal Indulgence? It was usual among some of the Greeks to make their Slaves drunk to Excess, and then expose them to their Children, who by that means conceived an early Aversion to a Vice which makes Men appear so monstrous and irrational. I have exposed this Picture of an unnatural Father with the same Intention, that its Deformity may deter others from its Resemblance. If the Reader has a mind to see a Father of the same Stamp represented in the most exquisite Strokes of Humour, he may meet with it in one of the finest Comedies that ever appeared upon

'Care till they expire This manner of treating poor Sinners has, methinks, great Humanity in it, and as you are a Person who pretend to carry your Reflections upon all Subjects, whatever occur to you, with Candour, and act above the Sense of what Misinterpretation you may meet with, I beg the Favour of you to try before all the World the unhappy Condition of us poor Vagrants, who are really in a Way of Labour instead of Idleness. There are Crowds of us whose Manner of Livelihood has long ceased to be pleasing to us, and who would willingly lead a new Life, if the Rigour of the Virtuous did not for ever expel us from coming into the World again. As it now happens, to the eternal Infamy of the Male Sex, Filthiness among you is not reproachful, but Credulity in Women is infamous.

'Give me Leave, Sir, to give you my History. You are to know that I am a Daughter of a Man of a good Reputation, Tenant to a Man of Quality. The Heir of this great House took it in his Head to cast a favourable Eye upon me, and succeeded. I do not pretend to say he promised me Marriage. I was not a Creature silly enough to be taken by so foolish a Story. But he ran away with me up to this Town, and introduced me to a grave Matron, with whom I lived for a Day, or two with great Gravity, and was not a little pleased with the Change of my Condition, from that of a Country Life to the finest Company. As I believed, in the whole World. My humble Servant made me to understand that I should be always kept in the plentiful Condition I then enjoyed when after a very great Fondness towards me, he one Day took his Leave of me for four or five Days. In the Evening of the same Day my good Landlady came to me, and observing me very pensive began to comfort me, and with a Smile told me I must see the World. When I was deaf to all she could say to divert me, she began to tell me with a very frank Air that I must be treated as I ought, and not take these squeamish Humours upon me, for my Friend had left me to the Town, and, as their Phrase is, she expected I would see Company, or I must be treated like what I had brought my self to. This put me into a Fit of Crying. And I immediately, in a true Sense of my Condition, threw myself on the Floor, deploring my Fate, calling upon all that was good and sacred to succour me. While I was in all my Agony, I observed a decrepit old Fellow come into the Room, and looking with a Sense of Pleasure in his Face at all my Vehemence and Transport. In a Pause of my Distress I heard him say to the shameless old Woman who stood by me, She is certainly a new Face, or else she acts it rarely. With that the Gentlewoman, who was making her Market of me, in all the Turn of my Person, the Heaves of my Passion, and the suitable Changes of my Posture, took Occasion to commend my Neck, my Shape, my Eyes my Limbs. All this was accompanied with such Speeches as you may have heard Horse-courers make in the Sale of Nags, when they are warranted for their Soundness. You understand by this Time that I was left in a Brothel, and exposed to the next Bidder that could purchase me of my Patroness.

'This is so much the Work of Hell, the Pleasure in the Possession of us Wenches, is in proportion to the Degrees we go beyond the Bounds of Innocence, and no Man is gratified, if there is nothing left for him to debase. Well, Sir, my first Man, when I came upon the Town, was Sir Jeffery Toible, who was extremely lavish to me of his Money, and took such a Fancy to me that he would have carried me off, if my Patroness would have taken any reasonable Terms for me. But as he was old, his Covetousness was his strongest Passion, and poor I was soon left exposed to be the common Refuse of all the Rakes and Debauchees in Town. I cannot tell whether you will do me Justice or no, till I see whether you print this or not otherwise, as I now live with Sal, I could give you a very just Account of who and who is together in this Town. You perhaps won't believe it, but I know of one who pretends to be a very good Protestant who lies with a Roman-Catholic. But more of this hereafter, as you please me. There do come to our House the greatest Politicians of the Age, and Sal is more shrewd than any Body thinks. No Body can believe that such wise Men could go to Brothel houses out of idle Purposes. I have heard them often talk of Augustus Caesar, who had Intrigues with the Wives of Senators, not out of Wantonness but Stratagem.

'It is a thousand Pities you should be so secretly virtuous as I fear you are, otherwise, if I a Visit or two, you would soon understand that we Women of the Town are not such useless Correspondents as you may imagine. You have undoubtedly heard that it was a Courtisan who discovered Cataline's Conspiracy. If you print this I'll tell you more and am in the meantime,

SIR,

Your most humble Servant,
REBECCA NUTTLETON

MR SPECTATOR,

'I am an idle young Woman that would work for my Livelihood, but that I am kept in such a Manner as I cannot stir out. My Fyrant is an old jealous Fellow, who allows me nothing to appear in. I have but one Shoe and one Slipper, no Head-dress, and no upper Petticoat. As you set up for a Reformer, I desire you would take me out of this wicked Way, and keep me your self

EVE AFTERDAY

MR SPECTATOR,

'I am to complain to you of a Set of impertinent Coxcombs, who visit the Apartments of us Women of the Town, only, as they call it, to see the World. I must confess to you, this to Men of Delicacy might have an Effect to cure them, but as they are stupid, noisy and drunken Fellows it tends only to make Vice in themselves, as they think, pleasant and humorous, and at the same Time nauseous in us. I shall Sir, hereafter from Time to Time give you the Names of these Wretches who pretend to enter our Houses merely as Spectators. These Men think it Wit to use us ill. Pray tell them, however

'worthy we are of such Treatment' it is unworthy them to be giddy of it towards us. Pray, Sir, take Notice of this, and pay the Oppressed. I wish we could add to it, the Innocent.

— or — or — or —

SOME Indifferent Schoolmen have put the Case, that if an Ass were placed between two Bundles of Hay, which affected his Senses equally on each Side, and tempted him in the very same Degree, whether it would be possible for him to Part of either. They generally determine this Question to the Disadvantage of the Ass, who they say would starve in the midst of Plenty, as not having a single Grain of Reason to determine him more to the one than to the other. The Bundle of Hay on either Side striking his Sight and Smell in the same Proportion, would keep him in a perpetual Suspence like the two Vagabonds which Travellers have told us, are placed one of them in the Road, and the other in the Floor of Mahomet's Purim place at Alesia, and by that means say they pull the Impostor's Iron Coffin with such an equal Attraction, that it hangs in the Air between both of them. As for the Ass's Behaviour in such nice Circumstances, whether he would starve sooner than violate his Neutrality to the two Bundles of Hay, I shall not presume to determine, but only take Notice of the Conduct of our own Species in the same Perplexity. When a Man has a mind to venture his Money in a Lottery, every Figure of it appears equally alluring, and is likely to succeed as any of its fellows. They all of them have the same Pretension to good Luck, and upon the same sort of Conjecture, and no manner of Reason can be given why a Man should prefer one to the other before the Lottery is drawn. In this Case therefore Caprice very often acts in the Place of Reason, and forms to it self some Groundless Imaginary Motive, where real and substantial ones are wanting. I know a well meaning Man that is very well pleased to risque his good Fortune upon the Number 1711, because it is the Year of our Lord. I am acquainted with a Jester that would give a good deal for the Number 1734. On the contrary I have been told of a certain Zealous Dissenter, who being a great Enemy to Popery, and believing that bad Men are the most fortunate in this World, will lay two to one on the Number 666<sup>1</sup> against any other Number, because, says he, it is the Number of the Beast. Several would prefer the Number 12000 before any other, as it is the Number of the Pounds in the great Prize. In short, some are pleased to find their own Age in their Number, some that they have got a number which makes a pretty Appearance in the Cyphers, and others because it is the same Number that succeeded in the last Lottery. Each of these, upon no other Grounds, thinks he stands surest for the great Lot, and that he is possessed of what may not be improperly called the Golden Number.

These Principles of Election are the Pastimes and Extravagancies of Humankind, which is of a human Nature, that it will be exerting itself in the most trifling and unimportant when it wants Materials. The wisest of Men are sometimes acted by such unreasonable Motives, as the Fate of the Fool and the Superstitious is guided by nothing else.

I am surprised that none of the Fortune tellers, or as the French call them the Maîtres de bonnet d'avenir, who Publish their Bills in every Quarter of the Town have not turned our Lotteries to their Advantage. And any of them set up for a Caster of fortunate Figures what might he not get by his pretended Discoveries and Predictions?

I remember among the Advertisements in the Post of September the 29th, I was surprised to see the following one.

This is to give notice, That Ten Shillings more and more the Market's for the Lottery, No 132, by Nath. Cliff at the Pill and Three Crowns in Change to

This Advertisement has given great Matter of Speculation to Coffee-house Theorists. Mr. Cliff's Principles and Conversation have been canvassed upon this Occasion, and various Conjectures made why he should thus set his Heart upon Number 132. I have examined all the Powers in those Numbers, broken them into Frictions, extracted the Square and Cube Root, divided and multiplied them all Ways, but could not arrive at the secret till about three Days ago, when I received the following Letter from an unknown Hand, by which I find that Mr. Nathaniel Cliff is only the Agent, and not the Principal, in this Advertisement.

MR. SPECTATOR,

'I am the Person that lately advertised I would give ten Shillings more than the current Price for the Ticket No 132 in the Lottery now drawing, which is a Secret I have communicated to some Friends who rally me incessantly upon that Account. You must know I have but one Ticket, for which Reason, and a certain Dream I have lately had more than once, I was resolved it should be the Number I most approved. I am so positive I have pitched upon the great Lot, that I could almost lay all I am worth of it. My Visions are so frequent and strong upon this Occasion, that I have not only purchased the Lot, but disposed of the Money which in all probability it will sell for. This Morning, in particular, I set up an Lampage which I look upon to be the greatest in the Town. The Jokers are very Rich, but not Grady. I should be very glad to see a Speculation or two upon Lottery Subjects, in which you would oblige all People concerned, and in particular be miss to give an Account of that Market for Preferment, a great Man's Levée.

For ought I know, this Commerce between the Mighty and their Slaves, very justly represented, might do so much good as to incline the Great to regard Business rather than Ostentation and make the Little know the Use of their Time too well, to spend it in vain Applications and Addresses.

The famous Doctor in Noorfields, who gained so much Reputation for his Horry Predictions is said to have had in his Parlour different Ropes to little Bells which hung in the Room above stairs, where the Doctor thought fit to be consultations. If a Girl had been deceived by her Lover, one Bell was pulled, and if a Peasant had lost a Cow, the [Servant] rung another. This Method was kept in respect to all other Passions and Concerns, and [the skillful Water below<sup>2</sup>] sifted the Inquirer, and gave the Doctor Notice accordingly. The Levée of a great Man is had after the same manner, and twenty Whispers, false Alarms, and private Intimations, pass backward and forward from the Porter, the Valet, and the Patron himself, before the gaping Crew who are to pay their Court are gathered together. When the Scene is ready, the Doors fly open and discover his Lordship.

There are several Ways of making this first Appearance. You may be either half dressed, and washing your self which is indeed the most strictly, but this Way of Opening is peculiar to Military Men, in whom there is something graceful in exposing themselves naked. But the Politicians, or Civil Officers, have usually affected to be more reserved, and preserve a secret in Civility of Deportment. Whether it be Hieroglyphical or not, this Difference in the Military and Civil Levée, [I will not say] but [have<sup>3</sup>] ever understood the Fact to be, that the slow Minister is buttoned up, and the brave Officer open breasted on these Occasions.

However that is, I humbly conceive the Business of a Levée is to receive the Acknowledgments of a Multitude that a Man is Wise, [Bounteous,<sup>4</sup>] Valiant and Powerful. When the first Shot of Lyes [is<sup>5</sup>] made, it is wonderful to observe how much Submission the Patron's Modesty can bear, and how much Servitude the Client's Spirit can descend to. In the vast Multiplicity of Business, and the Crowd about him, my Lord's Parts are usually so great, that, to the Astonishment of the whole Assembly, he has something to say to every Man there, and that so suitable to his Capacity, as any Man may judge that it is not without Talents that Men can arrive at great Employments. I have known a great Man ask a Lay Officer, which way was the Wind, a Commander of Horse the present Price of Oats, and a Stock-Jobber at what Discount such a Fund was, with as much Ease as if he had been bred to each of those several Ways of Life. Now this is extremely obliging for at the same time that the Patron informs himself of Matters, he gives the Person of whom he enquires an Opportunity to exert himself. What adds to the Pomp of those Interviews is, that it is performed with the greatest Silence and Order imaginable. The Patron is usually in the midst of the Room, and some humble Person give him a Whisper, which his Lordship answers aloud It is well. Yes I am of your Opinion. Pray inform yourself further, you may be sure of my Part in it. This happy Man is dismissed, and my Lord can turn himself to a Business of a quite different Nature, and oftentimes give as good an Answer as any great Man is obliged to. For the chief Point is to keep in General, and if there be any thing offered that is Particular, to be in haste.

But we are now in the Height of the Affair, and my Lord's Creatures have all had their Whispers round to keep up the Force of the thing, and the Dumb Show is become more general. He is his Eye to that Corner, and there to Mr. such a one, to the other, and when did you come to Town? And perhaps just before he goes to another, and enters with him, But Sir, I am glad to see you, now I think of it. Lack of time are happy for the next four and twenty Hours, and those who bow in Ruffs and tinguished, and by Dozens at a Time, think they have very good Prospects if they hope to arrive at such Notices half a Year hence.

The Satyrst says,<sup>1</sup> there is seldom common Sense in high Fortune, and one would think, to behold a Levée, that the Great were not only instructed with their Station but also that they believed all below were eyed too else how is it possible that they could think of imposing upon themselves and others in such a degree, as to set up a Levée for any thing but a direct Lie? But such is the Weakness of our Nature, that when Men are a little exalted in their Condition, they immediately conceive they have additional Senses, and their Capricious enlarged not only above other Men, but above human Comprehension itself. Thus it is ordinary to see a great Man attend one his ring, bow to one at a distance, and call to a third at the same instant. A Girl in new Ribbands is not more taken with her self, nor does she betray more apparent Coquetries, than even a wise Man in such a Circumstance of Courtship. I do not know any thing that I ever thought so very distrustful as the Affectation which is recorded of Cæsar, to wit, that he would dictate to three several Writers at the same time. This was an Ambition below the Greatness and Candour of his Mind. He indeed if any Man had Pretensions to greater Faculties than any other Mortal was the Person, but such a Way of acting is childish, and inconsistent with the Manner of our Being. And it appears from the very Nature of Things, that there cannot be any thing effectually dispatched in the Distraction of a Public Levée, but the whole seems to be a Conspiracy of a Set of Servile Slaves, to give up their own Liberty to take away their Patron's Understanding.

Difficult Bile Tumet Jecur—Hor

THE present Paper shall consist of two Letters, which observe upon Faults that are easily cured both in Love and Friendship. In the latter, as far as it meer's regards Conversation, the Person who neglects visiting an agreeable Friend is punished in the very Transgression, for a good Companion is not found in every Room we go into. But the Case of Love is of a more delicate Nature, and the Anxiety is insupportable if every little Instance of Kindness is not reciprocal. There are Things in this Sort of Commerce which there are not Words to express, and a Man may not possibly know how to represent, what yet may tear his Heart into ten thousand Tortures. To be grave to a Man's Mirth, unattentive to his Discourse, or to interrupt either with something that argues a Disinclination to be entertained by him, is in it something so disagreeable, that the utmost Steps which may be made in further Enmity cannot give greater Torment. The gay Corinna, who sets up for an Indifference and becoming Headlessness, gives her Husband all the Torment ungrateful out of meer Insolence, with this peculiar Vanity, that she is to look as gay as a Maid in the Character of a Wife. It is no Matter what is the Reason of a Man's Grief, if it be heavy as it is. Her unhappy Man is convinced that she means him no Dishonour, but pines to Death because she will not have so much Deference to him as to avoid the Appearances of it. The Author of the following Letter is perplexed with an Injury that is in a Degree yet less criminal, and yet the Source of the utmost Unhappiness.

MR SPECTATOR,

I have read your Papers which relate to Jealousy, and desire your Advice in my Case, which you will say is not common. I have a Wife, of whose Virtue I am not in the least doubtful, yet I cannot be satisfied she loves me, which gives me as great Uneasiness as being faulty the other Way would do. I know not whether I am not yet more miserable than in that Case, for she keeps Possession of my Heart, without the Return of hers. I would desire your Observations upon that Temper in some Women, who will not condescend to convince their Husbands of their Innocence or their Love, but are wholly negligent of what Reflections the poor Men make upon their Conduct (so they cannot call it Criminal,) when at the same time a little Indifference of Behaviour, or Regard to shew an Inclination to please them, would make them Entirely at Ease. Do not such Women deserve all the Misinterpretation which they neglect to avoid? Or are they not in the actual Possession of Guilt, who care not whether they are thought guilty or not? If my Wife does the most ordinary thing, as visiting her Sister, or taking the Air with her Mother, it is always carried with the Air of a Secret. Then she will sometimes tell a thing of no Consequence, as if it was only Want of Memory made her conceal it before, and thus only to 'dally with my Anxiety. I have complained to her of this Behaviour in the gentlest Terms imaginable, and beseeched her not to use him, who desired only to live with her like an indulgent Friend, as the most morose and unsoberble Husband in the World. It is no easy Matter to describe our Circumstance, but it is insupportable with this Aggravation, that it might be easily mended, and yet no Remedy endeavoured. She reads you, and there is a Phrase or two in this Letter which she will know came from me. If we enter into an Explanation which may tend to our future Quiet by your Means, you shall have our joint Thanks. In the mean time I am (as much as I can in this ambiguous Condition be any thing)

SIR,
Your humble Servant

MR SPECTATOR,

Give me Leave to make you a Present of a Character not yet described in your Papers, which is that of a Man who treats his Friend with the same odd Variety which a Fantastical Female Tyrant practises towards her Lover. I have for some time had a Friendship with one of these Mercenary Persons. The Rogue I know loves me, yet takes Advantage of my Fondness for him to use me as he pleases. We are by Turns the best Friends and the greatest Strangers imaginable. Sometimes you would think us inseparable at other times he avoids me for a long time, yet neither he nor I know why. When we meet next by Chance, he is amazed he has not seen me, is unpunctual for an Appointment the same Evening and when I expect he should have kept it, I have known him slip away to another Place where he has sat reading the News, when there is no Post smoking his Pipe, which he seldom cares for, and staring about him in Company with whom he has had nothing to do, as if he wondered how he came there.

That I may state my Case to you the more fully, I shall transcribe some short Minutes I have taken of him in my Almanack since last Spring, for you must know there are certain Seasons of the Year, according to which, I will not say our Friendship, but the Enjoyment of it rises or falls. In March and April he was as various as the Weather. In May and part of June I found him the sprightliest best-humoured Fellow in the World. In the Dog-Days he was much upon the Indolent. In September very agreeable but very busy and since the Glass fell last to chugable he has made three Appointments with me, and broke them every one. However I have good Hopes of him this Winter, especially if you will lend me your Assistance to reform him, which will be a great Ease and Pleasure to,

Νήπιοι, οὐδ' ἴσασιν ὅσω τ' ἰόνῃ μισυπαντός, Οὐδ' ὅσον ἐν μαλαχίῃ τε δε ἀσφοδελῶ μεγ'
ὄνειρα — Hes

THERE is a Story in the Arabian Nights Tales of a King who had long languish'd under an ill Habit of Body, and had taken abundance of Remedies to no purpose. At length, says the Fable, a Physician cured him by the following Method. He took an hollow Ball of Wood, and fill'd it with several Drugs after which he clos'd it up so artfully that nothing appear'd. He likewise took a Mall, and after having hollowed the Handle, and thro' that which strikes the Ball, he enclud'd in them several Drugs after the same Manner as in the Ball it self. He then order'd the Sultan, who was his Patient, to exercise himself early in the Morning with these rightly prepar'd Instruments, till such time as he should sweat. When, as the Story goes, the Virtue of the Medicaments perspiring through the Wood, had so good an Influence on the Sultan's Constitution, that they cured him of an Indisposition which all the Compositions he had taken inwardly had not been able to remove. This Eastern Allegory is finely contriv'd to shew us how beneficial bodily Labour is to Health, and that Exercise is the most effectual Physick. I have described in my Hundred and Fifteenth Paper, from the general Structure and Mechanism of an Human Body, how absolutely necessary Exercise is for its Preservation. I shall in this Place recommend another great Preservative of Health, which in many Cases produces the same Effects as Exercise, and may, in some measure, supply its Place, where Opportunities of Exercise are wanting. The Preservative I am speaking of is Temperance, which has those particular Advantages above all other Means of Health, that it may be practis'd by all Ranks and Conditions, at any Season or in any Place. It is a kind of Regimen into which every Man may put himself, without Interruption to Business, Expence of Money, or Loss of Time. If Exercise throws off all Superfluities, Temperance prevents them: If Exercise clears the Vessels, Temperance neither satiates nor overstrains them: It Exercise raises proper Ferments in the Humours, and promotes the Circulation of the Blood, Temperance gives Nature her full Play, and enables her to exert her self in all her Force and Vigour: If Exercise dissipates a growing Distemper, Temperance starves it.

Physick, for the most part, is nothing else but the Substitute of Exercise or Temperance. Medicines are indeed absolutely necessary in acute Distempers, that cannot wait the slow Operations of these two great Instruments of Health: but did Men live in an habitual Course of Exercise and Temperance, there would be but little Occasion for them. Accordingly we find that those Parts of the World are the most healthy, where they subsist by the Chace, and that Men lived longest when their Lives were employ'd in hunting, and when they had little Food besides what they caught. Blistering, Cupping, Bleeding, are seldom of use but to the idle and Intemperate: as all those inward Applications which are so much in practice among us, are for the most part nothing else but Expedients to make Luxury consistent with Health. The Apothecary is perpetually employ'd in counterminding the Cook and the Vintner. It is said of Diogenes,<sup>1</sup> that meeting a young Man who was going to a Feast, he took him up in the Street and carried him home to his Friends, as one who was running into imminent Danger, had not he prevented him. What would that Philosopher have said, had he been present at the Gluttony of a modern Meal? Would not he have thought the Master of a Family, mad, and have begged his Servants to tie down his Hands, had he seen him devour Fowl, Fish, and Flesh, swallow Oyl and Vinegar, Wines and Spices, throw down Salads of twenty different Herbs, Sauces of an hundred Ingredients, Confections and Fruits of numberless Sweetness and Flavours? What unnatural Motions and Counterferments must such a Medley of Intemperance produce in the Body? For my Part, when I behold a fashionable Table set out in all its Magnificence, I fancy that I see Gouts and Dropsies, Feavers and Lethargies, with other innumerable Distempers lying in Ambuscade among the Dishes.

Nature delights in the most plain and simple Diet. Every Animal, but Man, keeps to one Dish. Herbs are the Food of this Species, Fish of that, and Flesh of a third. Man falls upon every thing that comes in his Way, not the smallest Fruit or Excrescence of the Earth, scarce a Berry or a Mushroom can escape him.

It is impossible to lay down any determinate Rule for Temperance, because what is Luxury in one may be Temperance in another: but there are few that have lived any time in the World, who are not Judges of their own Constitutions, so far as to know what kinds and what Proportions of Food do best agree with them. Were I to consider my Readers as my Patients, and to prescribe such a kind of Temperance as is accommodated to all Persons, and such as is particularly suitable to our Climate and Way of Living, I would copy the following Rules of a very eminent Physician. Make your whole Repast out of one Dish. If you indulge in a second, avoid drinking any thing Strong, till you have finish'd your Meal [at<sup>2</sup>] the same time abstain from all Sauces, or at least such as are not the most plain and simple. A Man could not be well guilty of Gluttony, if he stuck to these few obvious and easy Rules. In the first Case there could be no Variety of Tastes to solicit his Palate, and occasional Excess nor in the second any artificial Provocatives to relieve Satety, and create a false Appetite. Were I to prescribe a Rule for Drinking, it should be form'd upon a Saying quoted by Sir William Temple,<sup>3</sup> The first Glass for my self, the second for my Friends, the third for good Humour, and the fourth for mine Enemies. But because it is impossible for one who lives in the World to diet himself always in so Philosophical a manner, I think every Man should have his Days of Abstinence, according to his Constitution will permit. These are great Reliefs to Nature, as they qualify her for struggling with Hunger and Thirst, whenever any Distemper or Duty of Life may put her upon such Difficulties, and at the same time give her an Opportunity of extricating herself from her Oppressions, and recovering the several Tones and Springs of her distended Vessels. Besides that Abstinence well timed often kills a Sickness in Embryo, and destroys the first Seeds of an Indisposition. It is observed by two or three Ancient Authors,<sup>1</sup> that Socrates, notwithstanding he lived in Athens during that great Plague, which has made so much Noise through all Ages and has been celebrated at different Times by so eminent Hands, I say, notwithstanding that he lived in the time of this devouring Pestilence, he never caught the least Infection, which those Writers unanimously ascribe to that uninterrupted Temperance which he always observed.

And here I cannot but mention an Observation which I have often made, upon reading the Lives of the Philosophers, and comparing them with any Series of Kings or great Men of the same number. If we consider these Ancient Sages, a great Part of whose Philosophy consisted in a temperate and abstemious Course of Life, one would think the Life of a Philosopher and the Life of a Man were of two different Dates. For we find that the Generality of these wise Men were nearer in hundred than sixty Years of Age at the Time of their respective Deaths. But the most remarkable Instance of the Efficacy of Temperance towards the procuring of long Life, is what we meet with in a little Book published by Levis Cornaro the Venetian which I rather mention, because it is of undoubted Credit, as the late Venetian Ambassador, who was of the same Family, attested more than once in Conversation, when he resided in England. Cornaro, who was the Author of the little Treatise I am mentioning, was of an infirm Constitution, till about forty, when by obstinately persisting in an exact Course of Temperance, he recovered a perfect State of Health inasmuch that at fourscore he published his Book, which has been translated into English upon the Title of [Sure and certain Methods of attaining a long and healthy Life]. He lived to give a 3rd or 4th Edition of it, and after having passed his hundredth Year, died without Pain or Agony, and like one who falls asleep. The Treatise I mention has ing, but says himself, near the end of his Essay upon Health and Long Life of Government of Diet and Exercise, 'In both which, all excess is to be avoided, especially in the common use of wine.' Whereof the first Glass may pass for Health, the second for good Humour, the third for our Friends but the fourth is for our Enemies.

been taken notice of by several Eminent Authors, and is written with such a Spirit of Cheerfulness, Religion, and good Sense, as are the natural Concomitants of Temperance and Sobriety. The Mixture of the old Man in it is rather a Recommendation than a Discredit to it.

Having designed this Paper as the Sequel to that upon Exercise, I have not here considered Temperance as it is a Moral Virtue, which I shall make the Subject of a future Speculation, but only as it is the Means of Health.

Est Ulubris, armus si te uo i defuit agnus
Hor

MR SPECTATOR,

THERE is a particular Fault which I have observed in most of the Moralists in all Ages, and that is, that they are always professing themselves, and teaching others to be happy. This State is not to be arrived at in this Life, therefore I would recommend to you to talk in a humbler Strain than your Predecessors have done, and instead of presuming to be happy, instruct us only to be easy. The Thoughts of him who would be direct, and aim at practicable things, should turn upon allaying our Pain rather than promoting our Joy. Great Inquietude is to be avoided, but great Felicity is not to be attained. The great Lesson is Aequanimity, a Regularity of Spirit, which is a little above Cheerfulness and below Mirth. Cheerfulness is always to be supported if a Man is out of Pain, but Mirth to a prudent Man should always be accidental. It should naturally arise out of the Occasion, and the Occasion seldom be laid for it, for those Tempers who want Mirth to be pleased, are like the Constitutions which sing without the use of Brandy. Therefore, I say, let your Precept be, Be easy. That Mind is disolute and ungoverned, which must be hurried out of itself by loud Laughter or sensual Pleasure, or else [be] wholly unactive.

There are a Couple of old Fellows of my Acquaintance who meet every Day and smok a Pipe, and by their mutual Love to each other, tho' they have been Men of Business and Bustle in the World, enjoy a greater Tranquillity than either could have worked himself into by any Chapter of Seneca. Indolence of Body and Mind, when we run at no more, is very frequently enjoyed, but the very Enquiry after Happiness is something restless in it, which a Man who lives in a Series of temperate Meals, friendly Conversations, and easy Slumbers, gives himself no Trouble about. While Men of Refinement are talking of Tranquillity, he possesses it.

What I would by these broken Expressions recommend to you, MR SPECTATOR, is, that you would speak of the Way of Life, which pleases

'Men may pursue, to fill up the Spaces of Time with Satisfaction. It is a lamentable Circumstance, that Wisdom, nor, as you call it, Philosophy, should furnish Ideas only for the Learned, and that a Man must be a Philosopher to know how to pass away his Time agreeably. It would therefore be worth your Pains to place in an handsome Light the Relations and Affinities among Men, which render their Conversation with each other so grateful, that the highest Talents give but an impotent Pleasure in Comparison with them. You may find Descriptions and Discourses which will render the Fire side of an honest Artificer as entertaining as your own Club is to you. Good nature has an endless Source of Pleasure in it, and the Representation of domestick Life, filled with its natural Grati- fications, (instead of the necessary Vexations which are generally insisted upon in the Writings of the Witty) will be a very good Office to Society.

The Vicissitudes of Labour and Rest in the lower Part of Mankind, and their Being press- ed away with that Sort of Relish which we express by the Word Comfort and should be treated of by you, who are a SPECTATOR, as well as such Subjects which appear indeed more speculative, but are less instructive. In a word, Sir, I would have you turn your Thoughts to the Advantage of such as want you most and shew that Simplicity, Innocence, Industry and Temperance, are Arts which lead to Tranquillity, as much as Learning, Wisdom, Knowledge, and Contem- plation.

I am, Sir,

Your most Humble Servant,

MR SPECTATOR, Hackney, [October 12th]
'I am the young Woman whom you did so much Justice in some time ago, in acknowledging that I am perfect Mistress of the Fan, and use it with the utmost Knowledge and Dexterity. Indeed the World, as malicious as it is, will allow, that from an Hurry of Laughter I recollect myself the most suddenly, make a Curtesie, and let fall my Hands before me, closing my Fan at the same instant, the best of any Woman in England. I am not a little delighted that I have had your Notice and Approbation and however other young Women may rilly me out of Envy, I triumph in it, and demand a Praise in your Friendship. You must therefore permit me to say before you the present State of my Mind. I was reading your Spectator of the 9th Instant, and thought the Circumstance of the Ass divided between two Bundles of Hay which equally affected his Senses, was a lively Representation of my present Condition. For you are to know that I am extremely enamoured with two young Gentlemen who at this Time pretend to me. One must lude nothing when one is asking Advice, therefore I will own to you, that I am very amorous and very covetous. My Lover Will is very rich, and my Lover Tom very handsome. I can have either of them when I please, but

2 [the 12th of October]

'when I debate the Question in my own Mind I cannot take Tom far from losing Will's Estate, nor enter upon Will's Estate, and bid adieu to Tom's Person. I am very young, and yet am one in the World, dear Sir, has the main Chance more in her Hand than my self. Tom is the gayest, the blindest Creature. He dances well, is very civil, and diverting at all Hours and Seasons. Oh! he is the Joy of my Eyes! But then again Will is so very rich and careful of the Man. How many pretty Dresses does Tom appear in to charm me? But then it immediately occurs to me that a Man of his Circumstances is so much the poorer Upon the whole I have at last examined both these Desires of Love and Ambition, and upon strictly weighing the Matter I begin to think I shall be covetous longer than fond; therefore if you have nothing to say to the contrary, I shall take Will Alas, poor Tom!

EVERY Age a Man passes through, and Way of Life he engages in, has some particular Vice or Imperfection naturally cleaving to it, which it will require his nicest Care to avoid. The several Weaknesses, to which Youth, Old Age and Manhood are exposed, have long since been set down by many both of the Poets and Philosophers. But I do not remember to have met with any Author who has treated of those ill Habits Men are subject to, not so much by reason of their different Ages and Tempers, as the particular Profess on or Business in which they were educated and brought up.

I am the more surprised to find this Subject so little touched on, since what I am here speaking of is so apparent as not to escape the most vulgar Observation. The Business Men are chiefly conversant in, does not only give a certain Cast or Turn to their Minds, but is very often apparent in their outward Behaviour, and some of the most indifferent Actions of their Lives. It is this Air diffusing itself over the whole Man, which helps us to find out a Person at his first Appearance so that the most careless Observer scarcely can scarce be mistaken in the Carriage of a Seaman or the Gait of a Taylor.

The liberal Arts, though they may possibly have less Effect on our external Mien and Behaviour, make so deep an Impression on the Mind, as is very apt to bend it wholly one Way.

The Mathematician will take little less than Demonstration in the most common Discourse, and the Schoolman is as great a Friend to Definitions and Syllogisms. The Physician and Divine are often heard to dictate in private Companies with the same Authority which they exercise over their Patients and Disciples, while the Lawyer is putting Cases and raising Matter for Disputation out of every thing that occurs.

I may possibly some time or other inadvertent more at large on the particular Faults of this Profession is most infected with, but shall it present wholly apply myself to the Cure of what I just mentioned, namely, that Spirit of Strife and Contention in the Conversations of Gentlemen of the Long Robe.

This is the more ordinary, because these Gentlemen regarding Argument as their own proper Province, and very often making ready Money of it, think it unsafe to yield before Company. They are shewing in common Talk how zealously they could defend a Cause in Court, and therefore frequently forget to keep that Temper which is absolutely requisite to render Conversation pleasant and instructive.

CAPTAIN SENTRY pushes this Matter so far, that I have heard him say, He has known but few Pleaders that were tolerable Company.

The Captain, who is a Man of good Sense, but dry Conversation, was last Night giving me an Account of a Discourse, in which he had lately been engaged with a young Wrangler in the Law. I was giving my Opinion, says the Captain, without apprehending any Debité that might arise from it, of a General's Behaviour in a Battle that was fought some Years before either the Temple or my self were born. The young Lawyer immediately took me up, and by reasoning above a Quarter of an Hour upon a Subject which I saw he understood nothing of, endeavoured to shew me that my Opinions were ill grounded. Upon which, says the Captain, to avoid any further Contests, I told him, That truly I had not considered those several Arguments which he had brought against me, and that there might be a great deal in them. Ay, but says my Antagonist, who would not let me escape so, there are several Things to be urged in favour of your Opinion which you have omitted, and thereupon begun to shine on the other Side of the Question. Upon this, says the Captain, I came over to my first Sentiments, and entirely acquiesced in his Reasons for my so doing. Upon which the Temple again recovered his former Posture, and confuted both himself and me a third time. In short, says my Friend, I found he was resolved to keep me at Sword's Length, and never let me close with him, so that I had nothing left but to hold my tongue, and give my Antagonist free leave to smile at his Victory, who I found, like Hudibras, could still change Sides, and still confute.<sup>1</sup>

For my own part, I have ever regarded our Inns of Courts as Nurseries of Statesmen and Law-givers, which makes me often frequent that Part of the Town with great Pleasure.

Upon my calling in lately at one of the most noted Temp's Coffee houses, I found the whole Room, which was full of young Students, divided into several Parties, each of which was deeply engaged in some Controversie. The Management of the late Ministry was attacked and defended with great Vigour, and several Preliminaries to the Peace were proposed by some, and rejected by others, the demolishing of Dunkirk was so eagerly insisted on, and so warmly controverted, as had like to have produced a Challenge. In short, I observed that the Desire of Victory, whetted with the little Prejudices of Party and Interest, generally carried the Argument to such an Height, as made the Disputants insensibly conceive an Aversion towards each other, and part with the highest Dissatisfaction on both Sides.

The managing an Argument handsomely being so nice a Point, and what I have seen so very few excel in, I shall here set down a few Rules on that Head, which, among other things, I gave in writing to a young Kinsman of mine who had made so great a Proficiency in the Law, that he began to plead in Company upon every Subject that was started.

Having the entire Manuscript by me, I may, perhaps, from time to time, publish such Parts of it as I shall think requisite for the Instruction of the British Youth. What regards my present Purpose is as follows.

Avoid Disputes as much as possible. In order to appear erudite and well-bred in Conversation, you may assure your self that it requires more Wit, as well as more good Humour, to improve than to contradict the Notions of another. But if you are at any time obliged to enter on an Argument, give your Reasons with the utmost Coolness and Modesty, two Things which scarce ever fail of making an Impression on the Hearers. Besides, if you are neither Dogmatical, nor slow either by your Actions or Words, that you are full of your self, all will the more heartily rejoice at your Victory. Nay, should you be pinched in your Argument, you may make your Retreat with a very good Grace. You were never positive, and are now glad to be better informed. This has made some approve the Socratical Way of Reasoning, where while you scarce affirm any thing, you can hardly be caught in an Absurdity, and tho' possibly you are endeavouring to bring over another to your Opinion, which is firmly fix'd, you seem only to desire Information from him.

In order to keep that Temper, which is so difficult, and yet so necessary to preserve, you may please to consider, that nothing can be more unjust or ridiculous, than to be angry with another because he is not of your Opinion. The Interests, Education, and Means by which Men attain their Knowledge, are so very different, that it is impossible they should all think alike, and he has at least as much Reason to be angry with you, as you with him. Sometimes to keep your self cool, it may be of Service to ask your self fairly, What might have been your Opinion, had you all the Biasses of Education and Interest your Adversary may possibly have? but if you contend for the Honour of Victory alone, you may lay down this as an infallible Maxim. That you cannot make a more false Step, or give your Antagonists a greater Advantage over you, than by filling into a Passion.

When an Argument is over, how many weighty Reasons, does a Man recollect, which his Heat and Violence made him utterly forget?

It is yet more absurd to be angry with a Man because he does not apprehend the Force of your Reasons, or gives weak ones of his own. If you argue for Reputation this makes your Victory the easier: he is certainly in all respects an Object of your Pity, rather than Anger, and if he cannot comprehend what you do, you ought to thank Nature for her Favours, who has given you so much the clearer Understanding.

You may please to add this Consideration, That among your Equals no one values your Anger, which only preys upon its Master and perhaps you may find it not very consistent either with Prudence or your Ease, to punish your self whenever you meet with a Fool or a Knave.

Lastly, If you propose to your self the true End of Argument, which is Information, it may be a seasonable Check to your Passion for if you search purely after Truth 'twill be almost indifferent to you where you find it. I cannot in this Place omit an Observation which I have often made, namely, That nothing procures a Man more Esteem and less Envy from the whole Company, than if he chooses the Part of Moderator, without engaging directly on either Side in a Dispute. This gives him the Character of Impartial, furnishes him with an Opportunity of sifting Things to the Bottom, shewing his Judgment, and of sometimes making handsome Compliments to each of the contending Parties.

I shall close this Subject with giving you one Caution. When you have gained a Victory, do not push it too far 'tis sufficient to let the Company and your Admirers see 'us in your Power, but that you are too generous to make use of it.

*Certe infortuna præda rapacium
Sectatur ultro, quos opinus
Fallere et effugere est triumphus* — Hor

THERE is a Species of Women, whom I shall distinguish by the Name of Salamanders. Now a Salamander is a kind of Heroine in Christianity, that trends upon Fire, and lives in the Midst of Flames without being hurt. A Salamander knows no Distinction of Sex in those she converses with, grows familiar with a Stranger at first Sight, and is not so narrow spirited as to observe whether the Person she talks to be in Brooches or Petticoats. She admits a Male Visitant to her Bed side, plays with him a whole Afternoon at piquette, walks with him two or three Hours by Moon-light and is extremely scandalized at the unreasonableness of an Husband, or the severity of a Parent that would debar her Sex from such innocent Liberties. Your Salamander is therefore a perpetual Declaimer against Jealousie, and Admirer of the French Gond breeding, and a great Stickler for Freedom in Conversation. In short, the Salamander lives in an invincible State of Simplicity and Innocence. Her Constitution is preserved in a kind of natural Frost, she wonders what People mean by Temptation, and defies Mankind to do their worst. Her Christianity is engaged in a constant Ordeal, or fiery Tryal. Like good Queen Emma, the pretty Innocent walks blindfold among burning Plough shares, without being scorched or singed by them.

It is not therefore for the Use of the Salamander, whether in a married or single State of Life, that I design the following Paper but for such Females only as are made of Fleh and Blood, and find themselves subject to Human Frailties.

As for this Part of the fair Sex who are not of the Salamander Kind, I would most earnestly advise them to observe a quite different Conduct in their Behaviour and to avoid as much as possible what Religion calls Temptations, and the World Opportunities. Did they but know how many Thousands of their Sex have been gradually betrayed from innocent Freedoms to Ruin and Infamy and how many Millions of ours have begun with Flatteries, Protestations and Endearments, but ended with Reproaches, Perjury, and Perfidiousness they would shun like Death the very first Approaches of one that might lead them into inextinguishable Labyrinths of Guilt and Misery. I must so far give up the Cause of the Male World, as to exhort the Female Sex in the Language of Chamout in the Orphan,<sup>2</sup>

*Trust not a Man, 'ere are by Nature False, Dissembling, Subtle, Cruel, and Unconstant
When a Man talks of Love, with Caution trust him*

But if he Swears, he'll certainly deceive thee

I might very much enlarge upon this Subject, but shall conclude it with a Story which I lately heard from one of our Spanish Officers,<sup>3</sup> and which may shew the Danger a Woman incurs by too great Familiarities with a Male Companion.

An Inhabitant of the Kingdom of Castile, being a Man of more than ordinary Prudence, and of a grave composed Behaviour, determined about the fiftieth Year of his Age to enter upon Wedlock. In order to make himself easy in it, he cast his Eye upon a young Woman who had nothing to recommend her but her Beauty and her Education, her Parents having been reduced to great Poverty by the Wars, [which] for some

Years have laid that whole Country waste. The Castilian having made his Addresses to her and married her, they lived together in perfect Happiness for some time. When at length the Husband's Affairs made it necessary for him to take a Voyage to the Kingdom of Naples where a great Part of his Estate lay. The Wife loved him too tenderly to be left behind him. They had not been a Shipboard above a Day, when they unluckily fell into the Hands of an Algerine Pirate, who carried the whole Company on Shore, and made them Slaves. The Castilian and his Wife had the Comfort to be under the same Master, who seeing how dearly they loved one another, and gasped after their Liberty, demanded a most exorbitant Price for their Ransom. The Castilian, though he would rather have died in Slavery himself, than have paid such a Sum as he found would go near to ruin him, was so moved with Compassion towards his Wife, that he sent repeated Orders to his Friend in Spain, (who happened to be his next Relation) to sell his Estate, and transmit the Money to him. His Friend hoping that the Terms of his Ransom might be made more reasonable, and unwilling to sell an Estate which he himself had some Prospect of inheriting, formed so many delays, that three whole Years passed away without any thing being done for the setting of them at Liberty.

There happened to live a French Renegado in the same Place where the Castilian and his Wife were kept Prisoners. As this Fellow had in him all the Vivacity of his Nation, he often entertained the Captives with Accounts of his own Adventures to which he sometimes added a Song or a Dance, or some other Piece of Mirth, to divert them [during] their Confinement. His Acquaintance with the Manners of the Algerines, enabled him likewise to do them several good Offices. The Castilian as he was one Day in Conversation with this Renegado, discovered to him the Negligence and Irregularity of his Correspondent in Castile, and at the same time asked his Advice how he should behave himself in that Emergency. He further told the Renegado, that he found it would be impossible for him to raise the Money, unless he himself might go over to dispose of his Estate. The Renegado, after having represented to him that his Algerine Master would never consent to his Release upon such a Pretence, at length contrived a Method for the Castilian to make his Escape in the Habit of a Seaman. The Castilian succeeded in his Attempt and having sold his Estate, being afraid lest the Money should miscarry by the Way, and determining to perish with it rather than lose one who was much dearer to him than his Life, he returned himself in a little Vessel that was going to Algiers. It is impossible to describe the Joy he felt on this Occasion, when he considered that he should soon see the Wife whom he so much loved, and endeavour himself more to her by this uncommon Piece of Generosity.

The Renegado, during the Husband's Absence, so insinuated himself into the good Graces of his young Wife, and so turned her Head with Stories of Gallantry, that she quickly thought him the finest Gentleman she had ever conversed with. To be brief, her Mind was quite alienated from the honest Castilian, whom she was taught to look upon as a formal old Fellow unworthy the Possession of so charming a Creature. She had been instructed by the Renegado how to manage herself upon his Arrival, so that she received him with an Appearance of the utmost Love and Gratitude, and at length persuaded him to trust their common Friend the Renegado with the Money he had brought over for their Ransom, as not questioning but he would bestow the Terms of it, and negotiate the Affair more to their Advantage than they themselves could do. The good Man admired her Prudence, and followed her Advice. I wish I could conceal the Sequel of this Story, but since I cannot I shall dispatch it in as few Words as possible. The Castilian having slept longer than ordinary the next Morning, upon his waking found his Wife had left him. He immediately arose and enquired after her, but was told that she was seen with the Renegado about Break of Day. In a Word, her Lover having got all things ready for her Departure, they soon made their Escape out of the Territories of Algiers, carried away the Money, and left the Castilian in Captivity, who partly through the cruel Treatment of the incensed Algerine his Master, and partly through the unkind Usage of his unfaithful Wife, died some few Months after.

— Scribere jussit amor — Ovid

THE following Letters are written with such an Air of Sincerity, that I cannot deny the insuring of them.

My SPECTATOR,

'Tho' you are every where in your Writings a Friend to Women, I do not remember that you have directly considered the mercenary Practice of Men in the Choice of Wives. If you would please to employ your Thoughts upon that Subject, you would easily conceive the miserable Condition many of us are in, who not only from the Law of Custom and Modesty are restrained from making any Advances towards our Wishes, but are also, from the Circumstance of Fortune, out of all Hope of being addressed to by those whom we love. Under all these Disadvantages I am obliged to apply my self to you, and hope I shall prevail with you to Print in your very next Paper the following Letter, which is a Declaration of Passion to one who has made some faint Addresses to me for some time. I believe he ardently loves me, but the Inequality of my Fortune makes him think he cannot answer it to the World, if he pursues his Designs by way of Marriage, and I believe, as he does not want Discerning, he discovered me looking at him the other Day unawares in such a Manner as his

'raised his Hopes of gaining me on Terms the Men call easier But my Heart was very full on this Occasion, and if you know what Love and Honour are, you will pardon me that I use no further Arguments with you, but hasten to my Letter to him, whom I call Oroondates,<sup>1</sup> because if I do not succeed it shall look like Romance, and if I am regarded, you shall receive a Pair of Gloves at my Wedding, sent you under the Name of Statira

TO OROONDATES

SIR,
'After very much Perplexity in my self, and revolving how to requirunt you with my own Sentiments, and expostulate with you concerning yours, I have chosen this Way, by which methinks I can be at once revealed to you, or, if you please lie concealed. If I do not within few Days find the Effect which I hope from this, the whole Affair shall be buried in Oblivion. But, alas! what am I going to do, when I am about to tell you that I love you? But after I have done so, I am to assure you, that with all the Passion which ever entered a tender Heart, I know I can banish you from my Sight for ever, when I am convinced that you have no Inclinations towards me but to my Dishonour. But, alas! Sir, why should you sacrifice the real and essential Happiness of Life, to the Opinion of a World, that moves upon no other Foundation but profane Error and Prejudice? You all can observe that Riches alone do not make you happy, and yet give up every Thing else when it strids in Competition with Riches. Since the World is so bad, that Religion is left to us silly Women, and you Men act generally upon Principles of Profit and Pleasure, I will talk to you without arguing from any Thing but what may be most to your Advantage, as a Man of the World. And I will lay before you the State of the Case, supposing that you had it in your Power to make me your Mistress, or your Wife, and hope to convince you that the latter is more for your Interest, and will contribute more to your Pleasure.

'We will suppose then the Scene was laid, and you were now in Expectation of the approaching Evening wherein I was to meet you, and be carried to what convenient Corner of the Town you thought fit, to consummate all which your wretched Imagination has promised you in the Possession of one who is in the Bloom of Youth, and in the Reputation of Innocence you would soon have enough of me, as I am Sprightly, Young, Gay, and Airy. When Fancy is sated, and finds all the Promises it [made] it self false, where is now the Innocence which charmed you? The first Hour you are alone you will find that the Pleasure of a Debauchee is only that of a Destroyer. He blasts all the Fruit he tastes, and where the Brute has been devouring, there is nothing left worthy the Relish of the Man. Reason resumes her Place after Imagination is employed, and I am, with the utmost Distress and Confusion, to behold my self the Cause of un-ease Reflections to you, to be visited by Sterility, and dwell for the future with the two Companions (the most unfit for each other in the World) Solitude and Guilt. I will not insist upon the shameful Obscurity we should pass our Time in, nor run over the little short Snatches of fresh Air and free Commerce which all People must be satisfied with, whose Actions will not bear Examination, but leave them to your Reflections, who have seen of that Life of which I have but a meer Idea.

'On the other hand, if you can be so good and generous as to make me your Wife, you may promise your self all the Obedience and Tenderness with which Gratitude can inspire a virtuous Woman. Whatever Gratifications you may promise your self from an agreeable Person, whatever Compliances from an easy Temper, whatever Consolations from a sincere Friendship, you may expect as the Due of your Generosity. What at present in your ill View you promise your self from me, will be followed by Distaste and Satiety. But the Transports of a virtuous Love are the least Part of its Happiness. The Raptures of innocent Passion are but like Lightning to the Day, they rather interrupt than advance the Pleasure of it. How happy then is that Life to be, where the highest Pleasures of Sense are but the lower Parts of its Felicity?

'Now am I to repeat to you the unartificial Request of taking me in direct Terms. I know there stands between me and that Happiness, the haughty Daughter of a Man who can give you suitably to your Fortune. But if you weigh the Attendance and Behaviour of her who comes to you in Partnership of your Fortune, and expects an Equivalent, with that of her who enters your House as honoured and obliged by that Permission, whom of the two will you chuse? You, perhaps, will think fit to spend a Day abroad in the common Diversions of Men of Sense and Fortune. She will think herself ill-used in that Absence, and contrive at Home an Expence proportioned to the Appearance which you make in the World. She is in all things to have a Regard to the Fortune which she brought you, I to the Fortune to which you introduced me. The Commerce between you two will eternally have the Air of a Bargain, between us of a Friendship. Joy will ever enter into the Room with you, and kind Wishes attend my Benefactor when he leaves it. As for your self, how would you be pleased to enjoy for ever the Pleasure of having laid an immediate Obligation on a grateful Mind? such will be your Case with Me. In the other Marriage you will live in a constant Comparison of Benefits, and never know the Happiness of conferring or receiving any.

'It may be you will, after all, act rather in the prudent Way, according to the Sense of the ordinary World. I know not what I think or say, when that melancholy Reflection comes upon me but shall only add more, that it is in your Power to make me your Grateful Wife, but never your Abandoned Mistress.

No 300.] Friday, October 19, 1711 [Steele]

Pacat Anni Patrie ——— Vixit

THE Ambition of Princes is many times as hurtful to themselves as to their People. This cannot be doubted of such as have not fortune in their Wars, but it is a sadder true too of those who are celebrated for their Successes. If a severe View were to be taken of their Conduct, if the Profit and Loss by their Wars could be justly ballanced, it would be rarely found that the Conquest is sufficient to repay the Cost.

As I was the other Day looking over the Letters of my Correspondents, I met this illustrious that of Philanthropus<sup>1</sup>, which has turned my present Thought upon Political Arithmetic, an Art of greater Use than I entertain'd. My Friend has offer'd an Essay towards proving that Leviathan with all his Acquisitions is no Master of more People than at the Beginning of his Wars, nay that for every Subject he has acquired, he had lost Three that were his Inheritance. If Philanthropus is not mistaken in his Calculations, Leviathan must have been impoverished by his Ambition.

The Prince for the Publick Good has a Sovereign Property in every Private Person's Estate, and consequently his Riches must encrease or decrease in proportion to the Number and Riches of his Subjects. For Example, If Sword or Pestilence should destroy all the People of this Metropolis, God forbid there should be Room for such a Supposition! but if this could be the Case, the Queen must needs receive a great Part of her Revenue, or at least what is charged upon the City must be the Burden upon the rest of her Subjects. Perseus the Italian wants here no more than a Tenth Part of the War, yet as they are better fed, and clothed, and shod, than her other Subjects, the Customs and Land Tax upon their Consumption the Impertinence of House and other Taxes do very probably make a fifth Part of the whole Revenue of the Crown. But this is not all. The Consumption of the City takes off a great Part of the Fruits of the whole Island, and as it pays such a Proportion of the Rent or yearly Value of the Lands in the Country, so it is the Cause of paying such a Proportion of Taxes upon those Lands. The Loss then of such a People must needs be sensible to the Prince, and visible to the whole Kingdom.

On the other hand, if it should please God to drop from Heaven a new People equal in Number and Riches to the City, I should be ready to think their Taxes, Customs, and House Rent would raise as great a Revenue to the Crown as would be lost in the former Case. And as the Consumption of this New Body would be a new Market for the Fruits of the Country, all the Lands, especially those most adjacent, would rise in their yearly Value, and pay greater yearly Taxes to the Publick. The Gain in this Case would be as sensible as the former Loss.

Whatsoever is assess'd upon the General, is levied upon Individuals. It were worth the while then to consider what is paid by, or by means of the meanest Subjects, in order to compute the Value of every Subject to the Prince.

For my own part, I should believe that Seven Tenth's of the People are still out Property in themselves, or the Heads of their Families, and forced to work for their daily Bread, and that of this Sort there are Seven Millions in the whole Island of Great Britain. And yet one would imagine that Seven Tenth's of the whole People should consume at least three fourths of the whole Revenue of the Country. If this is the Case, the Subjects without Property pay Three fourths of the Rent, and consequently enable the Landed Men to pay Three fourths of their Taxes. Now if so great a Part of the Land Tax were to be divided by Seven Millions, it would amount to more than three Shillings to every Head. And this is the Poor are the Cause without which the Rich could not pay this Tax, even the poorest Subject upon this Account worth three Shillings yearly to the Prince.

Again. One would imagine the Consumption of seven Tenth's of the whole People, should pay two Thirds of all the Customs and Taxes. And if this Sum too should be divided by seven Millions, it is the Number of poor People, it would amount to more than seven Shillings to every Head. And therefore with this and the former Sum every poor Subject, without Property, except of his Limbs or Labour, is worth at least ten Shillings yearly to the Sovereign. So much then the Queen loves with every one of her old, and gruns with every one of her new Subjects.

When I was got into the Way of thinking, I presently grew conceited of the Argument, and was so prepar'd to write a Letter of Advice to a Member of Parliament, for opening the Freedom of our Towns and Trades, for taking away all manner of Distinction between the Native and Foreigners for settling our Laws of Parish Settlements, and removing every other Obstacle to the Increase of the People. But as soon as I had reflected with what an idle Sequence my Fellow Labourers had experienced the Mischiefs of telling the Path of British for a Shilling, of spouting the pure British Plod with foreign Mixture of interbreeding a Confusion of Languages and Religions, and of letting in Strangers to eat the Bread out of the Mouths of our own People, I became so humble as to let my Project fall to the Ground, and leave my Country to encrease by the ordinary Way of Generation.

As I have always in Heart the Publick Good, so I am ever contriv'd Schemes to promote it, and I think I may without Vanity pretend to have contriv'd some as wise as any of the Castle-builders. I had no sooner given up my former Project, but my Head was presently full of draining, Leas, and Marshes, banking out the Sea, and joining new Lands to my Country, for since it is thought impracticable to encrease the People to the Land, I fell immediately to consider how much would be gained to the Prince by encreasing the Lands to the People.

If the same omnipotent Power, which made the World, should at this time raise out of the Ocean and join to Great Britain an equal Extent of Land, with equal Buildings, Corn, Cattle and other Conveniences and Necessaries of Life, but no Men, Women, nor Children, I should hardly believe this would add either to the Riches of the People, or Revenue of the Prince for since the present Buildings are sufficient for all the Inhabitants, if any of them should forsake the old to inhabit the new Part of the Island, the Increase of House Rent in this would be attended with at least an equal Decrease of it in the other. Besides, we have such a Sufficiency of Corn and Cattle, that we give Bounties to our Neighbours to take what exceeds of the former off our Hands, and we will not suffer any of the latter to be imported upon us by our Fellow-Subjects and for the remaining Product of the Country 'tis already equal to all our Markets. But if all these Things should be doubled to the same Buyers, the Owners must be glad with half their present Prices, the Landlords with half their present Rents and thus by so great an Enlargement of the Country, the Rents in the whole would not increase, nor the Taxes to the Publick.

On the contrary, I should believe they would be very much diminished, for as the Land is only valuable for its Fruits, and these are all perishable, and for the most part must either be used within the Year, or perish without Use, the Owners will get rid of them at any rate, rather than they should waste in their Possession. So that 'tis probable the annual Production of those perishable things, even of one Tenth Part of them, beyond all Possibility of Use, will reduce one Half of their Value. It seems to be for this Reason that our Neighbour Merchants who ingross all the Spices, and know how great a Quantity is equal to the Demand, destroy all that exceeds it. It were natural then to think that the Annual Production of twice as much as can be used, must reduce all to an Eighth Part of their present Prices, and thus this extended Island would not exceed one Fourth Part of its present Value, or pay more than one Fourth Part of the present Tax.

It is generally observed, That in Countries of the greatest Plenty there is the poorest Living like the Schoolmen's Ass, in one of my Speculations, the People do not starve between two Mills. The Truth is, the Poor, which are the Bulk of the Nation, work only that they may live and if with two Days Labour they can get a wretched Subsistence for a Week, they will hardly be brought to work the other four. But then with the Wages of two Days they can neither pay such Prices for their Provisions, nor such Taxes to the Government.

This paradox therefore in old Hesiod [πλεον ἡμισυ παντός,<sup>1</sup>] or Half is more than the Whole, is very applicable to the present Case since nothing is more true in political Arithmetick, than that the same People with half a Country is more valuable than with the Whole. I begin to think there was nothing absurd in Sir W Petty, when he fancied if all the Highlands of Scotland and the whole Kingdom of Ireland were sunk in the Ocean, so that the People were all saved and brought into the Lowlands of Great Britain;

any, though they were to be reimbursed the Value of their Estates by the Body of the People, yet both the Sovereign and the Subjects in general would be enriched by the very Loss.<sup>2</sup>

If the People only make the Riches, the Father of ten Children is a greater Benefactor to his Country, than he who has added to it 10000 Acres of Land and no People. It is certain Levi has join'd vast Tracts of Land to his Dominions. But if Philurthimus says true, that he is not now Master of so many Subjects as before we may then account for his not being able to bring such mighty Armies into the Field, and for their being neither so well fed, nor clothed, nor paid as formerly. The Reason is plain, Levi must needs have been impoverished not only by his Loss of Subjects, but by his Acquisition of Lands.

Religientem esse oportet, Religiosum nefas
Incerti Auctoris apud Aul. Geil.

IT is of the last Importance to season the Passions of a Child with Devotion, which seldom dies in a Mind that has received an early Impulse of it. Though it may seem extinguished for a while by the Cares of the World, the Heats of Youth, or the Allurements of Vice, it generally breaks out and discovers it self again as soon as Discretion, Consideration, Age, or Misfortunes have brought the Man to himself. The Fire may be covered and overlaid, but cannot be entirely quenched and smothered.

A State of Temperance, Sobriety, and Justice, without Devotion, is a cold, lifeless, insipid Concoction of Virtue and is rather to be styled Philosophy than Religion. Devotion opens the Mind to great Conceptions, and fills it with more sublime Ideas than any that are to be met with in the most exalted Science and at the same time warms and agitates the Soul more than sensual Pleasure.

It has been observed by some Writers, that Man is more distinguished from the Animal World by Devotion than by Reason, as several Brute Creatures discover in their Actions something like a faint Glimmering of Reason, though they betray in no single Circumstance of their Behaviour any Thing that bears the least Affinity to Devotion. It is certain, the Propensity of the Mind to Religious Worship, the natural Tendency of the Soul to fly to some Superior Being for Succour in Dangers and Distresses, the Gratitude to an invisible Superintendant [which<sup>2</sup>] rises in us upon receiving any extraordinary and unexpected good Fortune, the Acts of Love and Admiration with which the Thoughts of Men are so wonderfully transported in meditating upon the Divine Perfections, and the universal Concurrence of all the Nations under Heaven in the great Article of Adoration, plainly shew that Devotion or Religious Worship must be the Effect of Tradition from some first Founder of Mankind, or that it is conformable to the Natural Light of Reason, or that it proceeds from an Instinct implanted in the Soul itself. For my part, I look upon all these to be the concurrent Causes, but which ever of them shall be assigned as the Principle of Divine Worship, it manifestly points to a Supreme Being as the first Author of it.

I may take some other Opportunity of considering those particular Forms and Methods of Devotion which are taught us by Christianity, but shall here observe into what Errors even this Divine Principle may sometimes lead us, when it is not moderated by that right Reason which was given us as the Guide of all our Actions.

The two great Errors into which a mistaken Devotion may betray us, are Enthusiasm and Superstition.

There is not a more melancholly Object than a Man who has his Head turned with Religious Enthusiasm. A Person that is crazed, tho' with Pride or Malice, is a Sight very mortifying to Human Nature: but when the Distemper arises from any indiscreet Fervours of Devotion, or too intense an Application of the Mind to its mystical Duties, it deserves our Compassion in a more particular Manner. We may however learn this Lesson from it, that since Devotion itself (which one would be apt to think could not be too warm) may disorder the Mind, unless its Heats are tempered with Caution and Prudence, we should be particularly careful to keep our Reason as cool as possible, and to guard our selves in all Parts of Life against the Influence of Passion, Imagination, and Constitution.

Devotion, when it does not lie under the Check of Reason, is very apt to degenerate into Enthusiasm. When the Mind finds herself very much inflamed with her Devotions, she is too much inclined to think they are not of her own kindling, but blown up by something Divine within her. If she indulges this Thought too far, and humours the growing Passion, she at last flings herself into imaginary Raptures and Ecstasies: and when once she fancies her self under the Influence of a Divine Impulse, it is no Wonder if she slights Human Ordinance, and refuses to comply with any established Form of Religion, is thinking her self directed by a much superior Guide.

As Enthusiasm is a kind of Excess in Devotion, Superstition is the Excess not only of Devotion, but of Religion in general, according to an old Heathen Saying, quoted by Aulus Gellius, Religio est opinio, Religion is a way of thinking. A Man should be Religious, no Superstitious. For as the Author tells us, Nigidius observed upon this Passage, that the Latin Words which terminate in osus generally imply vicious Characters, and the having of any Quality to an Excess.<sup>1</sup>

An Enthusiast in Religion is like an obstinate Clown, a Superstitious Man like an insipid Courtier. Enthusiasm has something in it of Madness, Superstition of Folly. Most of the Sects that fall short of the Church of England have in them strong Tinctures of Enthusiasm, as the Roman Catholic Religion is one huge overgrown Body of childish and idle Superstitions.

The Roman Catholic Church seems indeed irrecoverably lost in this Particular. If an absurd Dress or Behaviour be introduced in the World, it will soon be found out and discarded. On the contrary, a Habit or Ceremony, tho' never so ridiculous (which<sup>2</sup>) has taken Sanctuary in the Church, sticks in it for ever. A Gothic Bishop perhaps, thought it proper to repeat such a Form in such particular Snobs or Shippers another fancied it would be very decent if such a Part of publick Devotions were performed with a Mitre on his Head, and a Crozier in his Hand. To this a Brother Par del, as wise as the others, adds an antick Dress, which he conceived would allude very aptly to such and such Mysteries, till by Degrees the whole Office [has] degenerated into an empty Show.

Their Successors see the Vanity and Inconvenience of these Ceremonies: but instead of reforming, perhaps add others, which they think more significant, and which take Possession in the same manner, and are never to be driven out: for they have been once admitted. I have seen the Pope officiate at St. Peter's where, for six Hours together, he was busied in putting on or off his different Accoutrements, according to the different Parts he was to act in them.

Nothing is so glorious in the Eyes of Mankind, and ornamental to Human Nature, setting aside the infinite Advantages (which<sup>3</sup>) arise from it, as a strong, staid, masculine Piety; but Enthusiasm and Superstition are the Weaknesses of human Reason, that expose us to the Scorn and Derision of Infidels, and send us even below the best of that perish.

Idoltry may be looked upon as another Error arising from mistaken Devotion: but because Reflections on that Subject would lead us too far to an English Reader, I shall not enlarge upon it.

THE other Day as I passed along the Street, I saw a sturdy Prudence-Boy Disputing with an Hackney-Cochman and in an Instant, upon some Word of Provocation throw off his Hat and (Cur-Perwig<sup>3</sup>) clench his Fist, and strike the Fellow a Slap on the Face: at the same time calling him Rascal, and telling him he was a Gentleman's Son. The young Gentleman was, it seems, bound to a blacksmith and the Debate arose about Payment for some Work done about a Coach, near which they fought. His Master, during the Combat, was full of his Boy's Praises, and as he called to him to play with his Hand and Foot, and throw in his Head, he made all us who stood round him of his Party, by declaring the Boy had very good Friends, and he could trust him with untold Gold. As I am generally in the Theory of Mankind, I could not but make my Reflections

tions upon the sudden Popularity which was raised about the Lad and perhaps, with my Friend Tacitus, fell into Observations upon it, which were too great for the Occasion or ascribed this general Favour to Causes which had nothing to do towards it. But the young Blacksmith's being a Gentleman was, methought, what created him good Will from his present Equality with the Mob about him. Add to this, that he was not so much a Gentleman, as not, at the same time that he called himself such, to use as rough Methods for his Defence as his Antagonist. The Advantage of his having good Friends, as his Master expressed it, was not loudly urged but he shewed himself superior to the Coachman in the personal Qualities of Courage and Activity, to confirm that of his being well allied, before his Birth was of any Service to him.

If one might Moralize from this silly Story, a Man would say, that whatever Advantages of Fortune, Birth, or any other Good, People possess above the rest of the World, they should shew collateral Eminences besides those Distinctions, or those Distinctions will avail only to keep up common Decencies and Ceremonies, and not to preserve a real Place of Favour or Esteem in the Opinion and common Sense of their Fellow Creatures.

The Folly of People's Procedure, in imagining that nothing more is necessary than Property and superior Circumstances to support them in Distinction, appears in no way so much as in the Domestic part of Life. It is ordinary to feed their Humours into unnatural Excesses, as if I may so speak, and make their whole Being a wayward and uneasy Condition, for want of the obvious Reflection that all Parts of Human Life is a Commerce. It is not only paying Wages, and giving Commands, that constitutes a Master of a Family, but Prudence, equal Behaviour, with Readiness to protect and cherish them, is what entitles a Man to that Character in their very Hearts and Sentiments. It is pleasant enough to Observe, that Men expect from their Dependents, from their sole Motive of Fear, all the good Effects which a liberal Education, and affluent Fortune, and every other Advantage, cannot produce in themselves. A Man will have his Servant just, diligent, sober and chaste, for no other Reasons but the Terror of losing his Master's Favour when all the Laws Divine and Human cannot keep him whom he serves within Bounds, with relation to any one of those Virtues. But both in great and ordinary Affairs, all Superiority, which is not founded on Merit and Virtue, is supported only by Artifice and Stratagem. Thus you see Flatterers are the Agents in Families of Humourists, and those who govern themselves by any thing but Reason. Make-Bates, distant Relations, poor Kinsmen, and indigent Followers, are the Fry which support the Oeconomy of an humoursome rich Man. He is eternally whispered with Intelligence of who are true or false to him in Matters of no Consequence, and he maintains twenty Friends to defend him against the Insinuations of one who would perhaps cheat him of an old Coat.

I shall not enter into farther Speculation upon this Subject at present, but think the following Letters and Petition are made up of proper Sentiments on this Occasion.

Mr SPECTATOR,

'I am a Servant to an old Lady who is governed by one she calls her Friend who is so familiar in one, that she takes upon her to advise her without being called to it, and makes her uneasy with all about her. Pray, Sir, be pleased to give us some Remarks upon voluntary Counsellors, and let these People know that to give any Body Advice, is to say to that Person, 'I am your Betters. Pray, Sir, as near as you can, describe that eternal Flirt and Disturber of Families, Mrs Importunity who is always visiting, and putting People in a Way, is they call it. Mr SPECTATOR,

'I am a Footman, and live with one of those Men, each of whom is said to be one of the best humoured Men in the World, but that he is passionate. Pray be pleased to inform them, that he who is passionate, and takes no Care to command his Hastiness, does more Injury to his Friends and Servants in one half Hour, than whole Years can atone for. This Master of mine, who is the best Man alive in common Fame, disoblges Some body every Day he lives and strikes me for the next thing I do, because he is out of Humour at it. If these Gentlemen [knew] that they do all the Mischief that is ever done in Conversation, they would reform and I who have been a Spectator of Gentlemen at Dinner for many Years, have seen that Indiscretion does ten times more Mischief than ill-nature. 'That in all Families where there are Spies, there is a general Jealousy and Misunderstanding

'That the Masters and Mistresses of such Houses live in continual Suspicion of their ingenuous and true Servants, and are given up to the Management of those who are false and perfidious.

'That such Masters and Mistresses who entertain Spies, are no longer more than Cyphers in their own Families and that we your Petitioners are with great Dissdain obliged to pay all our Respect, and expect all our Maintenance from such Spies.

*Phæto pater, si das hujus nostri nominis usum,
Nec falsâ Clymæ culpam sub in agne celat,
Pignora da, Genitor.* O, Met

THERE is a loose Tribe of Men whom I have not yet taken Notice of, that riddle into all the Corners of this great City, in order to seduce such unfortunate Females as fall into their Wiles. These abandoned Profligates rise up Issue in every Quarter of the Town, and very often, for a valuable Consideration, father it upon the Church warden. By this means there are several Married Men who have a little Family in most of the Parishes of London and Westminster, and several Bachelors who are undone by a Charge of Children.

When a Man once gives himself this Liberty of preying so large, and living upon the Common, he finds so much Game in a populous City, that it is surprising to consider the Numbers which he sometimes propagates. We see many a young Fellow who is scarce of Age, that could lay his Claim to the Jus trium Librorum, or the Privileges which were granted by the Roman Laws to all such as were Fathers of three Children. Nay, I have heard a Rake [who] was not quite five and twenty, declare himself the Father of a seventh Son, and very prudently determine to breed him up a Physician. In short, the Town is full of these young Patriarchs, not to mention several bawdy Deans, who, like heedless Spendthrifts that squander away their Estates before they are Masters of them, have rused up their whole Stock of Children before Marriage.

I must not here omit the particular Whim of an Impudent Libertine, that had a little Smattering of Heraldry, and observing how the Genealogies of great Families were often drawn up in the Shape of Trees, had taken a Fancy to dispose of his own illegitimate Issue in a Figure of the same kind

Nec longum tempus et ingens Exiit ad cælum: namus felicitibus arbor, Miraturque non aspro des et non sua pueri
Virg.

The Trunk of the Tree was mark'd with his own Name, Will Aph. Out of the Side of it grew a large barren Branch, inscrib'd Mary Aph. the Name of his unhappy Wife. The Head was adorned with five huge Boughs. On the Bottom of the first was written in Capital Characters Kate Cole, who branched out into three Sprigs, viz. William, Richard, and Helena. Sal Truiford gave Birth to another Bough, that shot up into Sarah, Tom, Will, and Ircub. The third Arm of the Tree had only a single Infant in it, with a Sprig left for a second, the Parent from whom it sprung being near her Time when the Author took this Ingenious Device into his Head. The two other great Boughs were very plentifully loaden with Fruit of the same kind besides which there were many Orman cutl Branches that did not bear. In short, a more flourishing Tree never came out of the Herald's Office.

What makes this Generation of Vermin so very profligate, is the indefatigable Diligence with which they apply themselves to their Business. A Man does not undergo more Watchings and Fatigues in a Campaign, than in the Course of a vicious Amour. As it is said of some Men, that they make their Business their Pleasure, these Sons of Darkness may be said to make their Pleasure their Business. They might conquer their corrupt Inclinations with half the Pains they are at in gratifying them.

Nor is the Invention of these Men less to be admired than their Industry or Vigilance. There is a Fragment of Apollonius the Comic Poet [who was Contemporary with Mecander] which is full of Humour as follows. Thou mayest shut up thy Doors, says he, with Bars and bolts. It will be impossible for the Blacksmith to make them so fast, but a Cat and a Whoremaster will find a Way through them. In a word, there is no Head so full of Stratagems as that of a Libidinous Man.

Were I to propose a Punishment for this infamous Race of Propagators, it should be to send them, after the second or third Offence, into our American Colonies, in order to people those Parts of her Majesty's Dominions where there is a want of Inhabitants, and in the Phrase of Dwogenes, to Plant Men. Some Countries punish this Crime with Death but I think such a Banishment would be sufficient, and might turn this generative Faculty to the Advantage of the Publick.

In the mean time, till these Gentlemen may be thus disposed of, I would earnestly exhort them to take Care of those unfortunate Creatures whom they have brought into the World by these indirect Methods, and to give their spurious Children such an Education is may render them more virtuous than their Parents. This is the best Atonement they can make for their own Crimes, and indeed the only Method that is left them to repair their past Mis carriages.

I would likewise desire them to consider, whether they are not bound in common Humanity, as well as by all the Obligations of Religion and Nature, to make some Provision for those whom they have not only given Life to, but entail'd upon them, [tho' very unreasonably, a Degree of] Shame and [Disgrace.] And here I cannot but take notice of those depraved Notions which prevail among us, and which must have taken rise from our natural Inclination to favour a Vice to which we are so very prone, namely, that Bastardy and Cuckoldom should be look'd upon as Reproaches, and that the [Ignominy<sup>2</sup>] which is only due to Lewdness and Falsehood, should fall in so unreasonable a manner upon the Persons who [are<sup>3</sup>] innocent.

I have been insensibly drawn into this Discourse by the following Letter, which is drawn up with such a Spirit of Sincerity, that I question not but the Writer of it has represented his Case in a true and genuine Light.

SIR,

I am one of those People who by the general Opinion of the World are counted both Infamous and Unhappy.

My Father is a very eminent Man in this Kingdom, and one who bears considerable Offices in it. I am his Son but my Misfortune is, that I dare not call him Father, nor he without Shame own me as his Issue, I being illegitimate, and therefore deprived of that endearing Tenderness and impartial'd Satisfaction which a good Man finds in the Love and Conversation of a Parent. Neither have I the Opportunities to render him the Duties of a Son, he having always carried himself at so vast a Distance, and with such Superiority towards me, that by long Use I have contracted a Timorousness when before him, which hinders me from declaring my own Necessities and giving him to understand the Inconveniences I undergo.

It is my Misfortune to have been neither bred a Scholar, [a Soldier,] nor to [any kind of] Business, which renders me Entirely incapable of making Provision for my self without his Assistance and this creates a continual Uneasiness in my Mind, fearing I shall in Time want Bread.

My Father, if I may so call him, giving me but very faint Assurances of doing any thing for me. I have hitherto lived somewhat like a Gentleman, and it would be very hard for me to labour for my Living. I am in continual Anxiety for my future Fortune, and under a great Unhappiness in losing the sweet Conversation and friendly Advice of my Parents, so that I cannot look upon my self otherwise than as a Monster, strangely sprung up in Nature, which every one is ashamed to own.

I am thought to be a Man of some natural Parts, and by the continual Reading what you have offered the World, become an Admirer thereof, which has drawn me to make this Confession, at the same time hoping, if any thing herein shall touch you with a Sense of Pity, you would then allow me the Favour of your Opinion thereupon as also what Part I, being unlawfully born, may claim of the Man's Affection who begot me, and how far in your Opinion I am to be thought his Son, or he acknowledged as my Father. Your Sentiments and Advice herein will be a great Consolation and Satisfaction to,

SIR,

Your Admirer and Humble Servant,

I AM not at all displeased that I am become the Courser of Love, and that the Distressed in that Passion convey their Complaints to each other by my Means. The following Letters have lately come to my hands, and shall have their Place with great Willingness. As to the Reader's Entertainment, he will, I hope, forgive the inserting such Particulars as to him may perhaps seem frivolous, but are to the Persons who wrote them of the highest Consequence. I shall not trouble you with the Prefaces, Compliments, and Apologies made to me before each Epistle when it was desired to be inserted, but in general they tell me, that the Persons to whom they are addressed have Intimations, by Phrases and Allusions in them, from whence they came.

As I am at nothing more than being yours, I am willing to be a Stranger to your Name, your Fortune, or any Figure which your Wife might expect to make in the World, provided my Commerce with you is not to be a guilty one. I can see you ogle all the young Fellows who look at you, and observe your Eye wander after new Conquests every Moment you are in a publick Place. And yet there is such a Beauty in all your Looks and Gestures, that I cannot but admire you in the very Act of endeavouring to gain the Hearts of others. My Condition is the same with that of the Lover in the Way of the World.<sup>1</sup> I have studied your Faults so long, that they are become as familiar to me, and I like them as well as I do my own. The Indisposition in which you, to obey the Dictates of your Honour and Duty, left me, has increased upon me, and I am acquainted by my Physicians I cannot live a Week longer. At this time my Spirits fail me, and it is the ardent Love I have for you that carries me beyond my Strength, and enables me to tell you, the most painful Thing in the Prospect of Death, is, that I must part with you. But let it be a Comfort to you, that I have no Guilt hang upon me, no unrepented Folly that retards me, but I pass away my last Hours in Reflection upon the Happiness we have lived in together, and in Sorrow that it is so soon to have an End. Thus is a Fruity which I hope is so far from criminal, that methinks there is a kind of Piety in being so unwilling to be separated from a State which is the Institution of Heaven, and in which we have lived according to its Laws. As we know no more of the next Life, but that it will be a happy one to the Good, and miserable to the Wicked, why may we not please ourselves at least, to alleviate the Difficulty of resigning this Being, in imagining that we shall live a Sense of what passes below, and may possibly be employed in guiding the Steps of those with whom we walked with Innocence when mortal? WHEN I meet with any vicious Character that is not generally known, in order to prevent its doing Mischief, I draw it to length, and set it up as a Scarecrow, by which means I do not only make an Example of the Person to whom it belongs, but give Warning to all Her Majesty's Subjects, that they may not suffer by it Thus, to change the [Allusion,<sup>1</sup>] I have marked out several of the Shoals and Quicksands of Life, and am continually employed in discovering those [which<sup>2</sup>] are still concealed, in order to keep the Ignorant and Unwary from running upon them It is with this Intention that I publish the following Letter, which brings to light some Secrets of this Nature

MR SPECTATOR,

'There are none of your Speculations which I read over with greater Delight, than those which are designed for the Improvement of our Sex. You have endeavoured to correct our unreasonable Fears and Superstitions, in your Seventh and Twelfth Papers our Fancy for Equipage, in your Fifteenth, our Love of Puppet-Shows, in your Thirty-First our Notions of Beauty in your Thirty-Third our Inclination for Romances, in your Thirty-Seventh, our Passion for French Oppenies, in your Forty-Fifth our Manhood and Party zeal, in your Fifty-Seventh our Abuse of Dancing, in your Sixty-Sixth and Sixty-Seventh our Levity, in your Hundred and Twenty-Eighth our Love of Coxcombs in your Hundred and Fifty-Fourth, and Hundred and Fifty-Seventh our Tyranny over the Henpeck, in your Hundred and Seventy-Sixth You have described the Pict in your Forty first the Idol, in your Seventy-Third the Demurrer, in your Eighty-Ninth, the Salmander, in your Hundred and Ninety-Eighth You have likewise taken to pieces our Dress, and represented to us the Extravagancies we are often guilty of in that Particular You have fallen upon our Patches, in your Fiftieth and Eighty-First our Commodes, in your Ninety-Eighth our Fans in your Hundred and Second, our Riding Habits in your Hundred and Fourth, our Hoop petticoats, in your Hundred and Twenty-Seventh besides a great many little Blemishes which you have touched upon in your several other Papers,

'and in those many Letters that are scattered up and down your Works At the same Time we must own, that the Compliments you pay our Sex are innumerable, and that those very Faults which you represent in us, are neither black in themselves nor, as you own, universal among us But, Sir, it is plain that these your Discourses are calculated for none but the fishmonger Part of Mankind, and for the Use of those who are rather indiscreet than vicious But, Sir, there is a Sort of Prostitutes in the lower Part of our Sex, who are a Scandal to us, and very well deserve to fall under your Censure I know it would debase your Paper too much to enter into the Behaviour of these Female Libertines but as your Remarks on some Part of it would be a doing of Justice to several Women of Virtue and Honour, whose Reputations suffer by it, I hope you will not think it improper to give the Publick some Account of this Nature You must know, Sir, I am provoked to write you this Letter by the Behaviour of an infamous Woman, who having passed her Youth in a most shameless State of Prostitution, is now one of those who gun their Livelihood by seducing others, that are younger than themselves, and by establishing a criminal Commerce between the two Sexes Among several of her Artifices to get Money, she frequently persuades a vain young Fellow, that such a Woman of Quality, or such a celebrated Toast, entertains a secret Passion for him, and wants nothing but an Opportunity of revealing it Nay, she has gone so far as to write Letters in the Name of a Woman of Figure, to borrow Money of one of these foolish Roderigos,<sup>3</sup> which she has afterwards appropriated to her own Use In the mean time, the Person who has lent the Money, has thought a Lady under Obligations to him, who scarce knew his Name, and wondered at her Ingratitude when he has been with her, that she has not owned the Favour, though at the same time he was too much a Man of Honour to put her in mind of it.

'When this abandoned Baggage meets with a Man who has Vanity enough to give Credit to Relations of this nature, she turns him to very good Account, by repeating Phrases that were never uttered, and delivering Messages that were never sent As the House of this shameless Creature is frequented by several Foreigners, I have heard of another Artifice, out of which she often ruses Money The Foreigner sighs after some British Beauty, whom he only knows by Name Upon which she promises, if he can be secret, to procure him a Meeting Th Stranger, ravished at his good Fortune, gives a Present, and in a little time is introduced to some imaginary Title for you must know that this cunning Purveyer has her Representa upon this Occasion, of some of the finest Estates in the Kingdom By this Means, as I am informed, it is usual enough to meet with a German Count in foreign Countries, that will make his Boy's of Favour, he has received from Women of the highest Ranks, and the most

MR SPECTATOR,

'I am a Country Clergyman, and hope you will lend me your Assistance in ridiculing some little Indecencies which cannot so properly be exposed from the Pulpit.

'A Widow Lady, who straggled this Summer from London into my Parish for the Benefit of the Air, as she says, appears every Sunday at Church with many fashionable Extravagancies, to the great Astonishment of my Congregation.

'But what gives us the most Offence is her theatrical Manner of Singing the Psalms. She introduces above fifty Italian Airs into the hundredth Psalm, and whilst we begin All People in the old solemn Tune of our Forefathers, she in a quite different Key runs Divisions on the Vowels, and adorns them with the Graces of Nicolini, if she meets with Eke or Aye, which are frequent in the Metre of Hopkins and Sternhold. We are certain to hear her quivering them half a Minut after us to some sprightly Airs of the Opera.

'I am very far from being an Enemy to Church Music, but fear this Abuse of it may make my Parish ridiculous, who already look on the Singing Psalms as an Entertainment and no Part of their Devotion. Besides, I am apprehensive that the Infection may spread, for Squire Squeekum, who by his Voice seems (if I may use the Expression) to be cut out for an Italian Singer, was last Sunday practicing the same Air.

'I know the Lady's Principles, and that she will plead the Toleration which (as she fancies) allows her Non-Conformity in this Particular. But I beg you to acquaint her, That Singing the Psalms in a different Tune from the rest of the Congregation, is a Sort of Schism not tolerated by that Act.

I am, SIR,
Your very humble Servant,
R. S.

MR SPECTATOR,

'In your Paper upon Temperance, you prescribe to us a Rule of drinking out of Sir Isidore's Temple, in the following Words The first

Quanto g usq ue sibi plura regaverit,
A Di s plura feret— Hor

THERE is a Call upon Mankind to value and esteem those who set a moderate Price upon their own Merit and Self-denial is frequently attended with unexpected Blessings, which in the End abundantly recompense such Losses as the Modest seem to suffer in the ordinary Occurrences of Life. The Curious tell us, a Determination in our Favour or to our Disadvantage is made upon our first Appearance, even before they know any thing of our Characters, but from the Intimations Men gather from our Aspect. A Man, they say, wears the Picture of his Mind in his Countenance, and one Man's Eyes are Spectacles to his who looks at him to read his Heart. But tho' that Way of raising an Opinion of those we behold in Publick is very fallacious, certain it is, that those, who by their Words and Actions take as much upon themselves, as they can but barely demand in the strict Scrutiny of their Deserts, will find their Account lessen every Day. A modest Man preserves his Character, as a frugal Man does his Fortune, if either of them live to the Height of either, one will find Losses, the other Errors, which he has not Stock by him to make up. It were therefore a just Rule, to keep your Desires, your Words and Actions, within the Regard you observe your Friends have for you, and never, if it were in a Man's Power, to take as much as he possibly might either in Preferment or Reputation. My Walks have lately been among the mercantile Part of the World and one gets Phrases naturally from those with whom one converses. I say then, he that in his Air, his Treatment of others, or an habitual Arrogance to himself, gives himself Credit for the least Article of more Wit, Wisdom, Goodness, or Valour than he can possibly produce if he is called upon, will find the World break in upon him, and consider him as one who has cheated them of all the Esteem they had before allowed him. This brings a Commission of Bankruptcy upon him and he that might have gone on to his Life's End in a prosperous Way, by aiming at more than he should, is no longer Proprietor of what he really had before, but his Pretensions are all Things do which are torn instead of being divided.

There is no one living would deny Cinna the Applause of an agreeable and facetious Wit, or could possibly pretend that there is not something imitatively unforced and diverting in his Manner of delivering all his Sentiments in Conversation, if he were able to conceal the strong Desire of Applause which he betrays in every Syllable he utters. But they who converse with him, see that all the Civilities they could do to him, or the kind Things they could say to him, would fall short of what he expects, and therefore instead of shewing him the Esteem they have for his Merit, their Reflections turn only upon that they observe he has of it himself.

If you go among the Women, and behold Gloriana trip into a Room with that theatrical Ostentation of her Charms, Mertilla with that soft Regularity in her Motion, Chloe with such an indifferent Familiarity, Corinna with such a fond Approach, and Roxana with such a Demand of Respect in the great Gravity of her Entrance, you find all the Sex, who understand themselves, and act naturally, wait only for their Absence, to tell you that all these Ladies would impose themselves upon you and ereb of them carry in their Behaviour a Consciousness of so much more than they should pretend to, that they lose what would otherwise be given them.

I remember the last time I saw Macbeth, I was wonderfully taken with the Skill of the Poet, in making the Murderer form I earn to himself from the Moderation of the Prince whose Life he was going to take away. He says of the King, He bore his Injuries so meekly, and justly inferred from thence, that all divine and human Power would join to revenge his Death, who had made such an obstinate Use of Dominion. All that is in a Man's Power to do to advance his own Pomp and Glory, and forbear, is so much laid up against the Day of Distress and Pity will always be his Portion in Adversity, who acted with Gentleness in Prosperity.

The great Officer who foregoes the Advantages he might take to himself, and renounces all prudential Regards to his own Person in Danger, has so far the Merit of a Volunteer and all his Honours and Glories are unenvied, for sharing the common Fate with the same Frankness as they do who have no such endearing Circumstances to part with. But if there were no such Considerations as the good Effect which Self denial has upon the Sense of other Men towards us, it is of all Qualities the most desirable for the agreeable Disposition in which it places our own Minds. I cannot tell what better to say of it, than that it is the very Contrary of Ambition and that Modesty allays all those Passions and Inquietudes to which that Vice exposes us. He that is moderate in his Wishes from Reason and Choice, and not resigned from Sourness, Distaste, or Disappointment, doubles all the Pleasures of his Life. The Air, the Season, a [Sun shiny] Day, or a fair Prospect, are Instances of Happiness, and that which he enjoys in common with all the World, (by his Exemption from the Enchantments by which all the World are bewitched) are to him uncommon Benefits and new Acquisitions. Health is not eaten up with Care, nor Pleasure interrupted by

Envy. It is not to him of any Consequence what this Man is famed for, or for what the other is preferred. He knows there is in such a Place an uninterrupted Walk, he can meet in such a Company an agreeable Conversation. He has no Emulation, he is no Man's Rival, but every Man's Well wisher can look at a prosperous Man, with a Pleasure in reflecting that he hopes he is as happy as himself and has his Mind and his Fortune (as far as Prudence will allow) open to the Unhappy and to the Stranger.

Lucius has Learning, Wit, Humour, Eloquence, but no ambitious Prospects to pursue with these Advantages, therefore to the ordinary World he is perhaps thought to want Spirit, but known among his Friends to have a Mind of the most consummate Greatness. He wants no Man's Admiration, is in no Need of Praise. His Cloaths please him if they are fashionable and his Companions are agreeable if they are civil and well-natured. There is with him no Occasion for Superfluity at Meals, for Jollity in Company, in a word, for any thing extraordinary to administer Delight to him. Want of Prejudice and Command of Appetite are the Companions which make his Journey of Life so easy, that he in all Places meets with more Wit, more good Cheer and more goodness. His hour, there is necessary to make him enjoy himself with Pleasure and Satisfaction.

*Omnibus in terris, quæ si nō a Gadibus usque
Aurorum at Gangem, pauci dignoscere possunt
Vera bona, atque illis multum diversa, remotæ
Erroris nebula.* Juv

IN my last Saturday's Paper I laid down some Thoughts upon Devotion in general, and shall here shew what were the Notions of the most refined Heathens on this Subject, as they are represented in Plato's Dialogue upon Prayer, entitled, Alcibiades the Second, which doubtless gave Occasion to Juvenal's tenth Satire, and to the second Satire of Persius, as the last of these Authors has almost transcribed the preceding Dialogue, entitled Alcibiades the First, in his Fourth Satire.

The Speakers in this Dialogue upon Prayer, are Socrates and Alcibiades, and the Substance of it (when drawn together out of the Intricacies and Digressions) as follows.

Socrates meeting his Pupil Alcibiades, as he was going to his Devotions, and observing his Eyes to be fixed upon the Earth with great Seriousness and Attention, tells him, that he had reason to be thoughtful on that Occasion, since it was possible for a Man to bring down Evils upon himself by his own Prayers, and that those things, which the Gods send him in Answer to his Petitions, might turn to his Destruction. This, says he, may not only happen when a Man prays for what he knows is mischievous in its own Nature, as Oedipus implored the Gods to sow Dissension between his Sons but when he prays for what he believe would be for his Good, and against what he believes would be to his Detriment. This the Philosopher shews must necessarily happen among us, since most Men are blinded with Ignorance, Prejudice or Passion, which hinder them from seeing such things as are really beneficial to them. For an Instance he asks Alexander, Whether he would not be thoroughly pleased and satisfied if that God, to whom he was going to address himself, should promise to make him the Sovereign of the whole Earth? Alexander answers, That he should doubtless look upon such a Promise as the greatest Favour that he could bestow upon him. Socrates then asks him, If after [receiving] this great Favour he would be contented to lose his Life? or if he would receive it though he was sure he should make an ill Use of it? To his which Questions Alexander answers, in the Negative. Socrates then shews him, from the Examples of others, how these might very probably be the Effects of such a Blessing. He then adds, That other reputed Pieces of Good fortune as that of having a Son, or procuring the highest Post in a Government are subject to the like fatal Consequences. which nevertheless, says he, Men ardently desire, and would not fail to pray for, if they thought their Prayers might be effectual for the obtaining of them.

Having established this great Point That all the most apparent Blessings in this Life are obnoxious to such dreadful Consequences, and that no Man knows what in its Events would prove to him a Blessing or a Curse, he teaches Alexander after what manner he ought to pray.

In the first Place he recommends to him, as the Model of his Devotions, a short Prayer, which a Greek Poet composed for the Use of his Friends, in the following Words. O Jupiter, give us those Things which are good for us, whether they are such Things as we pray for, or such Things as we do not pray for, and I will receive from us those Things which are harmful, though they are such Things as we pray for.

In the second Place, that his Disciple may ask such Things as are expedient for him, he shews him, that it is absolutely necessary to apply himself to the Study of true Wisdom, and to the Knowledge of that which is his chief Good, and the most suitable to the Excellency of his Nature.

In the third and last Place he informs him, that the best Method he could make use of to draw down Blessings upon himself, and to render his Prayers acceptable, would be, in his constant Practice of his Duty towards the Gods, and towards Men. Under this Head he very much recommends a Form of Prayer the Lacedaemonians made use of, in which they petition the Gods, to give them all good Things so long as they were virtuous. Under this Head likewise he gives a very remarkable Account of an Oracle to the following Purpose.

When the Athenians in the War with the Lacedaemonians received many Defeats both by Sea and Land, they sent a Message to the Oracle of Jupiter Ammon, to ask the Reason why they who erected so many Temples to the Gods, and adorned them with such costly Offerings, why they who had instituted so many Festivals, and accompanied them with such Pomp and Ceremonies in short, why they who had slain so many Hecatombs at their Altars, should be less successful than the Lacedaemonians, who fell so short of them in all these Particulars. To this, says he, the Oracle made the following Reply. I am better pleased with the Prayer of the Lacedaemonians, than with all the Oblations of the Greeks. As this Prayer implied and encouraged Virtue in those who made it, the Philosopher proceeds to shew how the most virtuous Man might be devout, so far as Victims could make him, but that his Offerings were regarded by the Gods as Bribes, and his Petitions as Blasphemies. He likewise quotes on this Occasion two Verses out of Homer, in which the Poet says, That the Scent of the Trojan Sacrifices was carried up to Heaven by the Winds but that it was not acceptable to the Gods, who were displeased with Praxis and all his People.

The Conclusion of this Dialogue is very remarkable. Socrates having deterred Alexander from the Prayers and Sacrifice which he was going to offer, by setting forth the above-mentioned Difficulties of performing that Duty as he ought, adds these Words, We must therefore wait till such Time as we may learn how we ought to behave ourselves towards the Gods, and towards Men. But when will that Time come, says Alexander, and who is it that will instruct us? For I would fain see this Man, whoever he is. It is one, says Socrates who takes care of you, but as Homer tells us<sup>2</sup> that Minerva removed the Mist from Dionides his Eyes, that he might plainly discover both Gods and Men so the Darkness that hangs upon your Mind must be removed before you are able to discern what is Good and what is Evil. Let him remove from my Mind, says Alexander, the Darkness and what else he pleases, I am determined to refuse nothing he shall order me, whoever he is, so that I may become the better Man by it. The remaining Part of this Dialogue is very obscure. There is something in it that would make us think Socrates hinted at himself, when he spoke of this Divine Teacher who was to come into the World, did not he own that he himself was in this respect as much at a Loss, and in as great Distress as the rest of Mankind.

Some learned Men look upon this Conclusion as a Prediction of our Saviour, or at least that Socrates, like the High-Priest, prophesied unknowingly, and pointed at that Divine Teacher who was to come into the World some Ages after him. However that may be, we find that this great Philosopher saw, by the Light of Reason that it was suitable to the Goodness of the Divine Nature, to send a Person into the World who should instruct Mankind in the Duties of Religion, and, in particular, teach them how to Pray.

Whoever reads this Abstract of Plato's Discourse on Prayer, will, I believe, naturally make this Reflection, That the great Founder of our

Religion, as well by his own Example, as in the Form of Prayer which he taught his Disciples, did not only keep up to those Rules which the Light of Nature had suggested to this great Philosopher, but instructed his Disciples in the whole Extent of this Duty, as well as of all others. He directed them to the proper Object of Adoration, and taught them, according to the third Rule above-mentioned, to apply themselves to him in their Closets, without Show or Ostentation, and to worship him in Spirit and in Truth. As the Lacedaemonians in their Form of Prayer implored the Gods in general to give them all good things so long as they were virtuous, we ask in particular that our Offences may be forgiven, as we forgive those of others. If we look into the second Rule which Socrates has prescribed, namely, that we should apply ourselves to the Knowledge of such Things as are best for us, this too is explain'd at large in the Doctrines of the Gospel, where we are taught in several Instances to regard those things as Curses, which appear as Blessings in the Eye of the World, and on the contrary, to esteem those things as Blessings, which to the Generality of Mankind appear as Curses. Thus in the Form which is prescribed to us we only pray for that Happiness which is our chief Good, and the great End of our Existence, when we petition the Supreme Being for the coming of his Kingdom, being solicitous for no other temporal Blessings but our daily Subsistence. On the other side, We pray against nothing but Sin, and against Evil in general, leaving it with Omniscience to determine what is really such. If we look into the first of Socrates's Rules of Prayer, in which he recommends the above-mentioned Form of the ancient Poet, we find that Form not only comprehended, but very much improved in the Petition, wherein we pray to the Supreme Being that his Will may be done, which is of the same Force with that Form which our Saviour used, when he prayed against the most painful and most ignominious of Deaths, Nevertheless not my Will, but thine be done. This comprehensive Petition is the most humble, as well as the most prudent, that can be offered up from the Creature to his Creator, as it supposes the Supreme Being wills nothing but what is for our Good, and that he knows better than ourselves what is so. [—Veniunt spectantur ut ipsa—Ov 2]

I HAVE several Letters of People of good Sense, who lament the Depravity or Poverty of Taste the Town is fallen into with relation to Play and publick Spectacles. A Lady in particular observes, that there is such a Levity in the Minds of her own Sex, that they seldom attend any thing but Impertinences. It is indeed prodigious to observe how little Notice is taken of the most exalted Parts of the best Tragedies in Shakespear, nay, it is not only visible that Sen-surity has devoured all Greatness of Soul, but the Under-Passion (as I may so call it) of a noble Spirit, Pity, seems to be a Stranger to the Generality of an Audience. The Minds of Men are indeed very differently disposed, and the Reliefs from Care and Attention are of one Sort in a great Spirit, and of another in an ordinary one. The Man of a great Heart and a serious Complexion, is more pleased with Instances of Generosity and Pity, than the light and ludicrous Spirit can possibly be with the lughest Strains of Mirth and Laughter. It is therefore a melancholick Prospect when we see a numerous Assembly lost to all serious Entertainments, and such Incidents, as should move one sort of Concern, excite in them a quite contrary one. In the Tragedy of Macbeth, the other Night, when the Lady who is conscious of the Crime of murdering the King, seems utterly astonished at the News, and makes an Exclamation at it, instead of the Indignation which is natural to the Occasion, that Expression is received with a loud Laugh. They were as merry when a Criminal was strangled. It is certainly an Occasion of rejoicing when the Wicked are seized in their Designs, but I think it is not such a Triumph as is exerted by Laughter.

You may generally observe, that the Appetites are sooner moved than the Passions. A sly Expression which alludes to Lawdy, puts a whole Row into a pleasing Smirk, when a good Sentence that describes an inward Sentiment of the Soul, is received with the greatest Coldness and Indifference. A Correspondent of mine, upon this Subject, has divided the former Part of the Audience, and accounts for their Prepossession against this reasonable Delight in the following Manner. The Prude, says he, as she acts always in Contradiction, so she is grievously sullen at a Comedy, and extravagantly gay at a Tragedy. The Coquette is so much taken up with throwing her Eyes round the Audience, and considering the Effect of them, that she cannot be expected to observe the Actors but as they are her Rivals, and take off the Observation of the Men from her self. Besides these Species of Women, there are the Examples, or the first of the Mode. These are to be supposed too well acquainted with what the Actor was going to say to be moved at it. After these one might mention a certain suppliant Set of Females who are Mimicks, and are wonderfully diverted with the Conduct of all the People around them, and are Spectators only of the Audience. But what is of all the most to be lamented, is the Loss of a Party whom it would be worth preserving in their right Senses upon all Occasions, and these are those whom we may indifferently call the Innocent or the Unaffected. You may sometimes see one of these sensibly touched with a well wrought Incident but then she is immediately so impertinently observed by the Men, and frowned at by some insensible Superior of her own Sex, that she is ashamed, and loses the Enjoyment of the most judicious Concern, Pity. Thus the whole Audience is afraid of letting fall a Tear, and shun as a Weakness the best and worthiest Part of our Sense.

Simonides

THERE are no Authors I am more pleased with than those who shew human Nature in a Variety of Views, and describe the several Ages of the World in their different Manners A Reader cannot be more rationally entertained, than by comparing the Virtues and Vices of his own Times with those which prevailed in the Times of his Forefathers and drawing a Parallel in his Mind between his own private Character, and that of other Persons, whether of his own Age, or of the Ages that went before him The Contemplation of Mankind under these changeable Colours, is apt to shume us out of any particular Vice, or animate us to any particular Virtue, to make us pleased or displeased with our selves in the most proper Points, to clear our Minds of Prejudice and Prepossession, and rectify that Narrowness of Temper which inclines us to think amiss of those who differ from our selves

If we look into the Manners of the most remote Ages of the World, we discover human Nature in her Simplicity, and the more we come downwards towards our own Times, may observe her hiding herself in Artifices and Refinements, Polished insensibly out of her Original Plunness, and at length entirely lost under Form and Ceremony, and (what we call) good Breeding Read the Accounts of Men and Women as they are given us by the most ancient Writers, both Sacred and Profane, and you would think you were reading the History of another Species

Among the Writers of Antiquity, there are none who instruct us more openly in the Manners of their respective Times in which they lived, than those who have employed themselves in Satyr, under what Dress soever it may appear, as there are no other Authors whose Province it is to enter so directly into the Ways of Men, and set their Miscarriages in so strong a Light.

Simonides, a Poet famous in his Generation, is, I think, Author of the oldest Satyr that is now extant and, as some say, of the first that was ever written This Poet flourished about four hundred Years after the Siege of Troy, and shews, by his way of Writing, the Simplicity, or rather Coarseness, of the Age in which he lived I have taken notice, in my Hundred and sixty first Speculation, that the Rule of observing what the French call the bienstance, in an Allusion, has been found out of later Years, and that the Ancients, provided there was a Likeness in their Similitudes, did not much trouble themselves about the Decency of the Comparison. The Satyr or Iambicks of Symonides, with which I shall entertain my Readers in the present Paper, are a remarkable Instance of what I formerly advanced. The Subject of this Satyr is Woman. He describes the Sex in their several Characters, which he derives to them from a fanciful Supposition rused upon the Doctrine of Præexistence. He tells us, That the Gods formed the Souls of Women out of those Seeds and Principles which compose several Kinds of Animals and Elements, and that their Good or Bad Dispositions arise in them according as such and such Seeds and Principles predominate in their Constitutions. I have translated the Author very faithfully, and if not Word for Word (which our Language would not bear) at least so as to comprehend every one of his Sentiments, without adding any thing of my own. I have already apologized for this Author's Wint of Delicacy, and must further premise, That the following Satyr affects only some of the lower part of the Sex, and not those who have been refined by a Polite Education, which was not so common in the Age of this Poet.

In the Beginning God made the Souls of Woman-kind out of different Materials, and in a separate State from their Bodies.

The Souls of one Kind of Women were formed out of those Ingredients which compose a Sow. A Woman of this Make is a Slut in her House and a Glutton at her Table. She is uncleanly in her Person, a Slattern in her Dress, and her Family is no better than a Dung-hill.

A Second Sort of Female Soul was formed out of the same Materials that enter into the Composition of a Fox. Such an one is what we call a notable discerning Woman, who has an Insight into every thing, whether it be good or bad. In this Species of Females there are some Virtuous and some Vicious.

A Third Kind of Women were made up of Canine Particles. These are what we commonly call Scolds, who irritate the Animals of which they were taken, that are always busy and barking, that snarl at every one who comes in their Way, and live in perpetual Clamour.

The Fourth Kind of Women were made out of the Earth. These are our Sluggards, who pass away their Time in Indolence and Ignorance, nor care over the Fire a whole Winter, and apply themselves with Alacrity to no kind of Business but Lazing.

The Fifth Species of Females were made out of the Sea. These are Women of variable mien, Tempests, sometimes all Storm and Tempest, sometimes all Calm and Sunshine. The Stranger who sees one of these in her Smiles and Smoothness would cry her up for a Miracle of good Humour, but on a sudden her Looks and her Words are changed, she is nothing but Fury and Outrage, Noise and Hurricane.

The Sixth Species were made up of the Ingredients which compose an Ass, or a Beast of Bur- den. These are naturally exceeding slothful, but, upon the Husband's exerting his Authority, will live upon hard Fare, and do every thing to please him. They are however far from beingaverse to Venernal Pleasure, and seldom refuse a Male Companion.

The Cat furnished Materials for a Seventh Species of Women, who are of a melancholy, forward, unamiable Nature, and so repugnant to the Offers of Love, that they fly in the Face of their Husband when he approaches them with conjugal Endearments. This Species of Women are likewise subject to little Liests, Cheats and Passerings.

The Mare with a flowing Mane, which was never broke to any servile Toil and Labour, composed an Eighth Species of Women. These are they who have little Regard for their Husbands, who pass away their Time in Dressing, Bathing, and Perfuming, who throw their Hair into the sweetest Curls, and tuck it up with the fairest Flowers and Garlands. A Woman of this Species is a very pretty Thing for a Stranger to look upon, but very detrimental to the Owner, unless it be a King or Prince who takes a Fancy to such a Toy.

The Ninth Species of Females were taken out of the Ape. These are such as are both ugly and ill-natured, who have nothing beautiful in themselves, and endeavour to detract from or ridicule every thing which appears so in others.

The Tenth and last Species of Women were made out of the Bee, and happy is the Man who gets such an one for his Wife. She is altogether faultless and unblameable, her Family flourishes and improves by her good Management. She loves her Husband, and is beloved by him. She brings him a Race of beautiful and virtuous Children. She distinguishes her self among her Sex. She is surrounded with Graces. She never sits among the loose Tribe of Women, nor passes away her Time with them in wanton Discourses. She is full of Virtue and Prudence, and is the best Wife that Jupiter can bestow on Man.

I shall conclude these Iambicks with the Motto of this Paper, which is a Fragment of the same Author. A Man cannot possess any thing that is better than a good Woman, nor any thing that is worse than a bad one.

As the Poet has shewn a great Penetration in this Diversity of Female Characters, he has avoided the Fault which Juvenal and Monsieur Boileau are guilty of, the former in his sixth, and the other in his last Satyr, where they have endeavour to expose the Sex in general, without doing Justice to the valuable Part of it. Such levelling Satyrs are of no Use to the World, and for this Reason I have often wondered how the French Author above mentioned, who was a Man of exquisite Judgment, and a Lover of Virtue, could think human Nature a proper Subject for Satyr in another of his celebrated Pieces, which is called The Satyr upon Man. What Vice or Frailty can a Discourse correct, which censures the whole Species alike, and endeavours to shew by some Superficial Strokes of Wit, that Brutes are the more excellent Creatures of the two? A Satyr should expose nothing but what is corrigible, and make a due Discrimination between those who are, and those who are not the proper Objects of it.

Nescio quomodo inhaeret in mentibus quasi secularum quoddam augurium futurorum idque in maximis ingenis altissimisque animis et existit maxime et apparet facillime

Cic. Iusc. Quæst.

To the SPECTATOR.

SIR,

I AM fully persuaded that one of the best Springs of generous and worthy Actions, is the having generous and worthy Thoughts of our selves. Whosoever has a mean Opinion of the Dignity of his Nature, will yet in no higher Rank than he has allotted himself in his own Estimation. If he considers his Being as circumscrib'd by the uncertain Term of a few Years, his Designs will be contracted into the same narrow Span he imagines is to bound his Existence. How can he exalt his Thoughts to any thing great and noble, who only believes that, after a short Turn on the Stage of this World, he is to sink into Oblivion, and to lose his Consciousness for ever? For this Reason I am of Opinion, that so useful and elevated a Contemplation is that of the Soul's Immortality cannot be resumed too often. There is not a more improving Exercise to the human Mind, than to be frequently reviewing its own great Privileges and Endowments nor a more effectual Means to awaken in us an Ambition raised above low Objects and little Pursuits, than to value our selves as Heirs of Eternity.

It is a very great Satisfaction to consider the best and wisest of Mankind in all Nations and Ages, asserting, as with one Voice, this their Birthright, and to find it ratify'd by an express Revelation. At the same time if we turn our Thoughts inward upon our selves we may meet with a kind of secret Sense concurring with the Proofs of our own Immortality.

You have, in my Opinion, rais'd a good presumptive Argument from the increasing Appetite the Mind has to Knowledge, and to the extending its own Faculties, which cannot be accomplished, as the more restrain'd Perfection of lower Lectures may, in the Limits of a short Life. I think another probable Conjecture may be rais'd from our Appetite to Duration it self, and from a Reflection on our Progress through the several Stages of it. We are complaining, as you observe in a former Speculation, of the Shortness of Life, and yet are perpetually hurrying over the Parts of it, to arrive at certain little Settlements, or imaginary Points of Rest, which are dispersed up and down in it.

Now let us consider what happens to us when we arrive at these imaginary Points of Rest. Do we stop our Motion, and sit down satisfied in the Settlement we have gain'd? or are we not removing the Boundary, and marking out new Points of Rest, to which we press forward with the like Eagerness, and which cease to be such as fast as we attain them? Our Case is like that of a Traveller upon the Alps, who should fancy that the Top of the next Hill must end his Journey, because it terminates his Prospect, but he no sooner arrives at it, than he sees new Ground and other Hills beyond it, and continues to travel on as before.

This is so plainly every Man's Condition in Life, that there is no one who has observed any thing, but may observe, that as fast as his Time wears away, his Appetite to something future remains. The Use therefore I would make of it is this, That since Nature is some love to express it does nothing in vain, or, to speak properly, since the Author of our Being has planted no wandering Passion in it, no Desire which has not its Object, Futurity is the proper Object of the Passion so constantly exercis'd about it, and this Restlessness in the present, this assigning our selves over to further Stages of Duration, this successive grasping at something still to come, appears to me (whatever it may to others) as a kind of Instinct or natural Symptom which the Mind of Man has of its own Immortality.

I take it at the same time for granted, that the Immortality of the Soul is sufficiently established by other Arguments. And if so, this Appetite, which otherwise would be very unaccountable and absurd, seems very reasonable, and adds Strength to the Conclusion. But I am amazed when I consider there are Creatures capable of Thought, who, in spite of every Argument, can form to themselves a sullen Satisfaction in thinking otherwise. There is something so pitifully mean in the inverted Ambition of that Man who can hope for Annihilation, and please himself to think that his whole Fabrick shall one Day crumble into Dust, and mix with the Mass of innumerate Beings, that it equally deserves our Admiration and Pity. The Mystery of such Men's Unbelief is not hard to be penetrated, and indeed amounts to nothing more than a sordid Hope that they shall not be immortal, because they dare not be so.

This brings me back to my first Observation, and gives me Occasion to say further, That as worthy Actions spring from worthy Thoughts, so worthy Thoughts are likewise the Consequence of worthy Actions. But the Wretch who has degraded himself below the Character of Immortality, is very willing to resign his Pretensions to it, and to substitute in its Room a dark negative Happiness in the Extinction of his Being.

The admirable Shakespear has given us a strong Image of the unsupported Condition of such a Person in his last Minutes, in the second Part of King Henry the Sixth, where Cardinal Beaufort, who had been concerned in the Murder of the good Duke Humphrey, is represented on his Death-bed. After some short confused Speeches which shew an Imagination disturbed

z 'Hills deep o'er Hills, and Alps on Alps arise' Pope's Essay on Criticism, then newly published

'Step towards confining me, she declared to me, that I was 'll the World to her, and she thought she ought to be all the World to me. If, she said, my Dear loves me as much as I love him, he will never be tired of my Company. This Declaration was followed by my being denied to all my Acquaintance and it very soon came to that pass, that to give an Answer at the Door before my Face, the Servants would ask her whether I was within or not, and she would answer No with great Fondness, and tell me I was a good Dear. I will not enumerate more little Circumstances to give you a livelier Sense of my Condition but tell you in general, that from such Steps as these at first, I now live the Life of a Prisoner of State: my Letters are opened, and I have not the Use of Pen, Ink and Paper, but in her Presence. I never go abroad, except she sometimes takes me with her in her Coach to take the Air, if it may be called so, when we drive, as we generally do, with three Glasses up. I have overheard my Servants lament my Condition, but they dare not bring me Messages without her Knowledge, because they doubt my Resolution to stand by 'em. In the midst of this insipid Way of Life, an old Acquaintance of mine, Tom Meggot, who is a favourite with her, and allowed to visit me in her Company because he sings prettily, has roused me to rebel, and conveyed his Intelligence to me in the following Manner. My Wife is a great Pretender to Musick, and very ignorant of it but far gone in the Italian Taste. Tom goes to Armstrong, the famous fine Writer of Musick, and desires him to put this Sentence of Julius in the Scale of an Italian Air, and write it out for my Spouse from him. An ille nihil liber cui mulier imperat? Cui leges imponit, præscribit, jubet, velat quod videtur? Qui nihil imperanti negare, nihil recusare audeat? Poscit? dauidum est Vocat? veniendum Ejcit? abeundum Mutatur? extimiscendum. Does he live like a Gentleman who is commauded by a Woman? He to whom she gives Laws, gives is and denies what she pleases? who can neither deny her any thing she asks, or refuse to do any thing she commands?

'To be short, my Wife was extremely pleased with it. said the Italian was the only Language for Musick and admired how wonderfully tender the Sentiment was, and how pretty the Accent is of that Language, with the rest that is said by Rote on that Occasion. Mr Meggot is sent for to sing this Air, which he performs with mighty Applause and my Wife is in Ecstasy on the Occasion, and glad to find, by my being so much pleased, that I was at last come into the Notion of the Italian, for, said she, it grows upon one when one once comes to know a little of the Language and pray, Mr Meggot, sing those Notes, Nihil Imperanti negare, nihil recusare. You may believe I was not a little delighted with my Friend Tom's Expedient to alarm me, and in Obedience to his Summons I gave all this Story thus at large and I am resolved, when this appears in the Spectator, to declare for my self. The manner of the Insurrection I contrive by your Means, which shall be no other than that Tom Meggot, who is at our Ter-table every Morning, shall read it to us, and if my Dear can take the Hint, and say not one Word, but let this be the Beginning of a new Life without farther Explanation, it is very well, for as soon as the Spectator is read out, I shall, without more ado, call for the Coach, name the Hour when I shall be at home, if I come at all if I do not, they may go to Dinner. If my Spouse only swells and says nothing, I am and I go out together, and all is well, as I said before, but if she begins to command or expostulate, you shall in my next to you receive a full Account of her Resistance and Submission, for submit the dear thing must to,

—Mens sibi conscia recti—Vrg

It is the great Art and Secret of Christianity, if I may use that Phrase, to manage our Actions to the best Advantage, and direct them in such a manner, that every thing we do may turn to Account at that great Day, when every thing we have done will be set before us.

In order to give this Consideration its full Weight, we may cast all our Actions, under the Division of such as are in themselves either Good, Evil, or Indifferent. If we divide our Intentions after the same Manner, and consider them with regard to our Actions, we may discover that great Art and Secret of Religion which I have here mentioned.

A good Intention joined to a good Action, gives it its proper Force and Efficacy joined to an Evil Action, extenuates its Malignity, and in some Cases may take it wholly away, and joined to an indifferent Action turns it to a Virtue, and makes it meritorious as far as human Actions can be so.

In the next Place, to consider in the same manner the Influence of an Evil Intention upon our Actions. An Evil Intention perverts the best of Actions, and makes them in reality, what the Fathers with a witty kind of Zeal have termed the Virtues of the Heathen World, so many shining Sins. It destroys the Innocence of an indifferent Action, and gives an evil Action all possible Blackness and Horror, or in the emphatical Language of Sacred Writ, makes Sin exceeding sinful.

If, in the last Place, we consider the Nature of an indifferent Intention, we shall find that it de-* Paradox V on the Thesis that All who are wise are Free, and the fools Slaves.

troys the Merit of a good Action, whates, but never takes away, the Malignity of an evil Action, and leaves an indifferent Action in its natural State of Indifference.

It is, therefore of unspeakable Advantage to possess our Minds with an habitual good Intention, and to run all our Thoughts, Words, and Actions at some laudable End, whether it be the Glory of our Maker, the Good of Mankind, or the Benefit of our own Soul.

This is a sort of Thrift or Good-Husbandry in moral Life, which does not throw away any single Action, but makes every one go as far as it can. It multiplies the Means of Salvation increases the Number of our Virtues, and diminishes that of our Vices.

There is something, very devout, though not solid, in Acosta's Answer to Lamborch's who objects to him the Multiplicity of Ceremonies in the Jewish Religion, as Washing, Dresses, Menus, Fungitions, and the like. His Reply which the Jew makes upon this Occasion, is, to the best of my Remembrance, as follows. 'There are not Duties enough (says he) in the essential Parts of the Law for a zealous and active Obedience. Time, Place, and Person are requisite, before you have an Opportunity of putting a Moral Virtue into Practice. We have, therefore says he, enlarged the Sphere of our Duty, and made many Things, which are in themselves indifferent, a Part of our Religion, that we may have more Occasions of shewing our Love to God, and in all the Circumstances of Life be doing something to please him.'

Monseur St Evren and his endeavoured to palliate the Superstitions of the Roman Catholic Religion with the same kind of Apology, where <sup>1</sup> An ita Collatio de Veritate Religiæ Christianæ et Fruitus Juris, published in 1687, by Philippe de Lamborch, who was eminent as a professor of Theology at Amsterdam from 1667 until his death in 1712, at the age of 79. But the learned Jew was the Spanish Physician Isaac Orbio, who was tortured for three years in the prisons of the Inquisition on a charge of Judaism. He admitted nothing, was therefore set free, and left Spain for Toulouse, where he practised physic and passed as a Catholic until he settled at Amsterdam. There he made profession of the Jewish faith, and died in the year of the publication of Lamborch's friendly discussion with him.

The Uriel Acosta, with whom Addison confounds Orbio, was a gentile Jew of Oporto who had embraced Judaism and, leaving Portugal, had also gone to Amsterdam. There he was circumcised, but was persecuted by the Jews themselves, and eventually whipped in the synagogue for attempting reformation of the Jewish usages, in which, he said, tradition had departed from the law of Moses. He took his thirty-nine lashes, recanted, and lay across the threshold of the synagogue for all his brethren to walk over him. Afterwards he endeavoured to shoot his principal enemy, but his pistol misfired. He had another about him and with that he shot himself. This happened about the year 1640, when Lamborch was but a child of six or seven.

he pretends to consider the differing Spirit of the Papists and the Calvinists, as to the great Points wherein they disagree. He tells us, that the former are actuated by Love, and the other by Fear, and that in their Expressions of Duty and Devotion towards the Supreme Being, the former seem particularly careful to do every thing which may possibly please him, and the other to abstain from every thing which may possibly displease him.

But notwithstanding this plausible Reason with which both the Jew and the Roman Catholic would excuse their respective Superstitions, it is certain there is something in them very pernicious to Mankind, and destructive to Religion, because the Injunction of superfluous Ceremonies makes such Actions, Duties, as were before indifferent, and by this means renders Religion more burdensome and difficult than it is in its own Nature, betrays many into Sins of Omission which they could not otherwise be guilty of, and fixes the Minds of the Vulgar to the shadowy unessential Points, in stead of the more weighty and more important Matters of the Law.

This zealous and active Obedience however takes place in the great Point we are recommending, for, if, instead of prescribing to our selves indifferent Actions as Duties, we apply a good Intention to all our most indifferent Actions, we make our very Existence one continued Act of Obedience, we turn our Diversions and Amusements to our eternal Advantage, and are pleasing him (whom we are made to please) in all the Circumstances and Occurrences of Life.

It is this excellent Frame of Mind, this holy Offensiveness (if I may be allowed to call it such) which is recommended to us by the Apostle in that uncommon Precept, wherein he directs us to propose to ourselves the Glory of our Creator in all our most indifferent Actions, neither ye eat nor drink, or whatsoever ye do.

A Person therefore who is possessed with such an habitual good Intention, as that which I have been here speaking of, enters upon no single Circumstance of Life, without considering it as well-pleasing to the great Author of his Being, conformable to the Dictates of Reason, suitable to human Nature in general, or in that particular Station in which Providence has placed him. He lives in a perpetual Sense of the Divine Presence, regards himself as acting in the whole Course of his Existence, under the Observation and Inspection of that Being, who is privy to all his Motions and all his Thoughts, who knows all his Down sitting and his Up-rising, who is about his Path, and about his Bed, and speaketh out all his Ways.<sup>2</sup> In a word, he remembers that the Eye of his Judge is always upon him, and in every Action he reflects that he is doing what is commanded or allowed by Him who will hereafter either reward or punish it. This has the Character of those holy Men of old, who in that beautiful Phrase of Scripture are said to have walked with God.<sup>3</sup>

When I employ myself upon a Paper of Morality, I generally consider how I may recommend the particular Virtue which I treat of, by the Precepts or Examples of the ancient Heathens by that Means, if possible, to shame those who have greater Advantages of knowing their Duty, and therefore greater Obligations to perform it, into a better Course of Life. Besides that many among us are unreasonably disposed to give a fairer hearing to a Pagan Philosopher, than to a Christian Writer.

I shall therefore produce an Instance of this excellent Frame of Mind in a Speech of Socrates, which is quoted by Erasmus. This great Philosopher on the Day of his Execution, a little before the Draught of Poison was brought to him, entertaining his Friends with a Discourse on the Immortality of the Soul, has these Words: Whether or no God will approve of my Actions, I know not, but thus I am sure of, that I have at all Times made it my Endeavour to please him, and I have a good Hope that this my Endeavour will be accepted by him. We find in these Words of that great Man the habitual good Intention which I would here inculcate, and with which that divine Philosopher always acted. I shall only add, that Erasmus, who was an unbogged Roman Catholic, was so much transported with this Passage of Socrates, that he could scarce forbear looking upon him as a Saint, and desiring him to pray for him or as that ingenious and learned Writer has expressed himself in a much more lively manner. When I reflect on such a Speech pronounced by such a Person, I can scarce forbear crying out, Sancte Socrates, ora pro nobis. O holy Socrates, pray for us! L

[*Perierunt tempora longi
Servati*—Juv<sup>2</sup>]

I DID some time ago lay before the World the unhappy Condition of the trading Part of Mankind, who suffer by want of Punctuality in the Dealings of Persons above them: but there is a Set of Men who are much more the Objects of Compassion than even those, and these are the Dependents on great Men, whom they are pleased to take under their Protection as such as are to share in their Friendship and Favour. These indeed, as well from the Homage that is accepted from them, as the hopes which are given to them, are become a Sort of Creditors: and these Debts, being Debts of Honour, ought, according to the accustomed Maxim, to be first discharged.

When I speak of Dependents, I would not be understood to mean those who are worthless in themselves, or who, without any Call will press into the Company of their Betters. Nor, when I speak of Patrons, do I mean those who either have it not in their Power, or have no Obligation to assist their Friends: but I speak of such Leagues where there is Power and Obligation on the one Part, and Merit and Expectation on the other.

The Division of Patron and Client, may, I believe, include a Third of our Nation: the Want of Merit and real Worth in the Client, will strike out about Ninety nine in a Hundred of these, and the Want of Ability in Patrons as many of that Kind. But however, I must beg leave to say, that he who will take up another's Time and Fortune in his Service, though he has no Prospect of rewarding his Merit towards him, is as unjust in his Dealings as he who takes up Goods of a Tradesman without Intention or Ability to pay him. Of the few of the Class which I think fit to consider, there are not two in ten who succeed, inasmuch that I know a Man of good Sense who put his Son to a Blacksmith, tho' an Offer was made him of his being received as a Page to a Man of Quality.<sup>1</sup> There are not more Cripples come out of the Wars than there are from those great Services some through Discontent lose their Speech, some their Memories, others their Senses, or their Lives: and I seldom see a Man thoroughly discontented, but I conclude he has had the Favour of some great Man. I have known of such as have been for twenty Years together within a Mouth of a good Employment, but never arrived at the Happiness of being possessed of any thing.

There is nothing more ordinary, than that a Man who is got into a considerable Station, shall immediately alter his manner of treating all his Friends, and from that Moment he is to deal with you as if he were your Fate. You are no longer to be consulted, even in Matters which concern your self, but your Patron is of a Species above you, and a free Communication with you is not to be expected. This perhaps may be your Condition all the while he bears Office, and when that is at an End, you are as intimate as ever you were, and he will take it very ill if you keep the Distance he prescribed you towards him in his Grandeur. One would think this should be a Behaviour a Man could fall into with the worst Grace imaginable: but they who know the World have seen it more than once. I have often, with secret Pity, heard the same Man who has professed his Abhorrence against all Kind of private behaviour, lose Minutes, Hours, Days, and Years in a fruitless Attendance on one who had no Inclination to befriend him. It is very much to be regarded, that the Great have one particular Privilege above the rest of the World, of being slow in receiving Impressions of Kindness, and quick in taking Offence. The Elevation above the rest of Mankind, except in very great Minds, makes Men

Expertus inquit*—Hor.]

so giddy, that they do not see after the same Manner they did before. Thus they despise their old Friends, and strive to extend their Interests to new Pretenders. By this means it often happens, that when you come to know how you lost such an Employment, you will find the Man who got it never dreamed of it; but, forsooth, he was to be surprized into it, or perhaps solicited to receive it. Upon such Occasions as these a Man may perhaps grow out of Humour, and if you are so, all Alakind will fall in with the Patron, and you are an Humourist and untractable if you are capable of being sour at a Disappointment. But it is the same thing, whether you do or do not resent ill Usage, you will be used after the same Manner, as some good Mothers will be sure to whip their Children till they cry, and then whip them for crying.

There are but two Ways of doing any thing with great People, and those are by making your self either considerable or agreeable. The former is not to be attained but by finding a Way to live without them, or concealing 'till you want them the latter is only by filling into their Taste and Pleasures. This is of all the Employments in the World the most servile, except it happens to be of your own natural Humour. For to be agreeable to another, especially if he be above you, is not to be possessed of such Qualities and Accomplishments as should render you agreeable in your self, but such as make you agreeable in respect to him. An Imputation of his Faults, or a Complaisance, if not Subservience, to his Vices, must be the Measures of your Conduct.

When it comes to that, the unnatural State a Man lives in, when his Patron pleases, is ended, and his Guilt and Complaisance are objected to him, tho' the Man who rejects him for his Vices is not only his Partner but Seducer. Thus the Client (like a young Woman who has given up the Innocence which made her charming) has not only lost his Time but also the Virtue which could render him capable of resenting the Injury which is done him.

It would be endless to recount the [Tricks<sup>1</sup>] of turning you off from yourselves to Persons who have less Power to serve you, the Art of being sorry for such an unaccountable Accident in your Behaviour, that such a one (who, perhaps, has never heard of you) opposes your Advancement, and if you have any thing more than ordinary in you, you are flattered with a Whisper, that 'tis no Wonder People are so slow in doing for a Man of your Talents, and the like.

After all this Treatment, I must still add the pleasantest Insolence of all, which I have once or twice seen to wit, that when a silly Rogue has thrown away one Part in three of his Life in unprofitable Attendance, it is taken wonderfully ill that he withdraws, and is resolved to employ the rest for himself.

When we consider these things, and reflect upon so many honest Natures (which one who makes Observation of what passes, may have seen) that have miscarried by such sort of Applications, it is too melancholy a Scene to dwell upon, therefore

I shall take another Opportunity to discourse of good Patrons, and distinguish such as have done their Duty to those who have depended upon them, and were not able to get without their Favour. Worthy Patrons are like Plato's Guardian Angels, who are always doing good to their Wards, but negligent Patrons are like Epicurus's Gods, that lie looting on the Clouds, and instead of Blessings pour down Storms and Tempests on the Heads of those that are offering Incense to them.

I CONSIDER an Human Soul without Education like Marble in the Quarry, which shews none of its inherent Beauties, 'till the Skill of the Polisher fetches out the Colours, makes the Surface shine, and discovers every ornamental Cloud, Spot, and Vein that runs through the Body of it. Education, after the same manner, when it works upon a noble Mind, draws out to View every latent Virtue and Perfection, which without such Helps are never able to make their Appearance.

If my Reader will give me leave to churge the Allusion so soon upon him, I shall make use of the same Iustance to illustrate the Force of Education, which Aristotle has brought to explain his Doctrine of Substantial Forms, when he tells us that a Statue lies hid in a Block of Marble, and that the Art of the Statuary only clears away the superfluous Matter, and removes the Rubbish. The Figure is in the Stone, the Sculptor only finds it. What Sculpture is to a Block of Marble, Education is to a Human Soul. The Philosopher, the Saint, or the Hero, the Wise, the Good, or the Great Man very often lie hid and concealed in a Plebeian, which a proper Education might have disinterred, and have brought to Light. I am therefore much delighted with Reading the Accounts of Savage Nations, and with contemplating those Virtues which are wild and uncultivated, to see Courage exerting it self in Fierceness, Resolution in Obstinacy, Wisdom in Cunning, Patience in Sullenness and Despair.

Mens Passions operate variously, and appear in different kinds of Actions, according as they are more or less rectified and swayed by Reason. When one hears of Negroes, who upon the Death of their Masters, or upon changing their Service, hang themselves upon the next Tree, as it frequently happens in our American Plantations, who can forbear admiring their Fidelity, though it expresses it self in so dreadful a manner? What might not that Savage Greatness of Soul which appears in these poor Wretches on many Occasions, be raised to, were it rightly cultivated? And what Colour of Excuse can there be for the Contempt with which we treat this Part of our Species? That we should not put them upon the common foot of Humanity, that we should only set an insignificant Fine upon the Man who murders them nay, that we should, as much as in us lies, cut them off from the Prospects of Happiness in another World as well as in this, and deny them that which we look upon as the proper Means for attaining it?

<sup>2</sup> The Dæmon or Angel which, in the doctrine of Immortality according to Socrates or Plato, had the care of each man while alive, and after death conveyed him to the general place of judgment (Phædon, § 130), is more properly described as a Guardian Angel than the gods of Epicurus can be said to pour storms on the heads of their worshippers. Epicurus only represented them as inactive and unconcerned with human affairs.

Since I am engaged on this Subject, I cannot forbear mentioning a Story which I have lately heard, and which is so well attested that I live no manner of Reason to suspect the Truth of it. I may call it a kind of wild Tragedy that passed about twelve Years ago at St. Christophers, one of our British Leeward Islands. The Negroes who were the persons concerned in it, were all of them the Slaves of a Gentleman who is now in England.

This Gentleman among his Negroes had a young Woman, who was look'd upon as a most extraordinary Beauty by those of her own Complexion. He had at the same time two young Fellows who were likewise Negroes and Slaves, remarkable for the Comeliness of their Persons, and for the Friendship which they bore to one another. It unfortunately happened that both of them fell in love with the Female Negro above mentioned, who would have been very glad to have taken either of them for her Husband, provided they could agree between themselves which should be the Man. But they were both so passionately in Love with her, that neither of them could think of giving her up to his Rival: and at the same time were so true to one another, that neither of them would think of gaining her without his Friend's Consent. The Torments of these two Lovers were the Discourse of the Family to which they belonged, who could not forbear observing the strange Complication of Passions which perplexed the Hearts of the poor Negroes, that often dropped Expressions of the Uneasiness they underwent, and how impossible it was for either of them ever to be happy.

After a long Struggle between Love and Friendship, Truth and Jealousy, they one Day took a Walk together into a Wood, carrying their Mistress along with them. Where, after abundance of Lamentations, they stabbed her to the Heart, of which she immediately died. A Slave who was at his Work not far from the Place where this astonishing Piece of Cruelty was committed, hearing the Shrieks of the dying Person, ran to see what was the Occasion of them. He then discovered the Woman lying dead upon the Ground, with the two Negroes on each side of her, kissing the dead Corps, weeping over it, and beating their Breasts in the utmost Agonies of Grief and Despair. He immediately ran to the English Family with the News of what he had seen: who upon coming to the Place saw the Woman dead, and the two Negroes expiring by her with Wounds they had given themselves.

We see in this amazing Instance of Barbarity, what strange Disorders are bred in the minds of those Men whose Passions are not regulated by Virtue, and disciplined by Reason. Though the Action which I have recited is in it self full of Guilt and Horror, it proceeded from a Temper of Mind which might have produced very noble Traits, had it been informed and guided by a suitable Education.

It is therefore an unspeakable Blessing to be born in those Parts of the World where Wisdom and Knowledge flourish: tho' it must be confessed, there are, even in these Parts, several poor uneducated Persons, who are but little above the Inhabitants of those Nations, of which I have been here speaking: as those who have had the Advantages of a more liberal Education, rise above one another by several different Degrees of Perfection. For to return to our Statue in the Block of Marble we see it sometimes only begun to be elipped, sometimes rough hewn and but just sketched into a human Figure, sometimes we see the Man appearing distinctly in all his Limbs and Features, sometimes we find the Figure wrought up to a great Elegancy, but seldom meet with any to which the Hand of a Phidias or Praxiteles could not give several more touches and finishings.

Discourses of Morality, and Reflections upon human Nature, are the best Means we can make use of to improve our Minds, and gain a true Knowledge of our selves, and consequently to recover our Souls out of the Vice, Ignorance, and Prejudice, which naturally cleave to them. I have all along profess myself in this Paper a Promoter of these great Ends: and I flatter myself that I do from Day to Day contribute something to the polishing of Mens Minds: at least my Design is laudable, whatever the Execution may be. I must confess I am not a little encouraged in it by many Letters, which I receive from unknown Hands, in Approbation of my Endeavours: and must take this Opportunity of returning my Thanks to those who write them, and excusing myself for not inserting several of them in my Papers, which I am sensible would be a very great Ornament to them. Should I publish the Praises which are so well penned, they would do Honour to the Persons who wrote them: but my publishing of them would I fear be a sufficient Instance to the World that I did not deserve them.

'was taken with a terrible Fit of the Vapours, which, 'tis feared will make her miscarry, if not endanger her Life, therefore, dear Sir, if you know of any Receipt that is good against this fashionable reigning Distemper, be pleased to communicate it for the Good of the Publick, and you will oblige

A NOFWILL.

MR SPECTATOR,

THE Uproar was so great as soon as I had read the Spectator concerning Mrs Freeman, that after many Revolutions in her Temper, of raging, swooning, railing, fainting, putting herself, and reviling her Husband, upon an accidental coming in of a neighbouring Lady (who says she has writ to you also) she had no thing left for it but to fall in a Fit. I had the Honour to read the Paper to her, and have a pretty good Command of my Countenance and Temper on such Occasions, and soon found my historical Name to be Tom Meggot in your Writings, but concealed my self till I saw how it affected Mrs Freeman. She looked frequently at her Husband, as often at me, and she did not tremble as she filled Tea, till she came to the Circumstance of Armstrong's writing out a Piece of Folly for an Opera Tune. Then she burst out, She was exposed, she was deceiv'd, she was wronged and abused. The Tea cup was thrown in the Fire, and without taking Vengeance on her Spouse, she said of me, that I was a pretending Coxcomb, a Medler that knew not what it was to interpose in so nice an Affair as between a Man and his Wife. To which Mr Freeman, Madam, were I less fond of you than I am, I should not have taken this Way of writing to the SPECTATOR, to inform a Woman whom God and Nature has placed under my Direction with what I request of her but since you are so indiscreet as not to take the Hint which I gave you in that Paper, I must tell you, Madam, in so many Words, that you have for a long and tedious Space of Time acted a Part unsuitable to the Sense you ought to have of the Subordination in which you are placed. And I must acquaint you once for all, that the Fellow without, ha Tom! (here the Footman entered and answered Madam) Sirrah don't you know my Voice look upon me when I speak to you I say, Madam, this Fellow here is to know of me myself, whether I am at Leisure to see Company or not. I am from this Hour Master of this House and my Business in it, and every where else, is to behave myself in such a Manner, as it shall be hereafter in Honour to you to bear my Name, and your Pride, that you are the Delight, the Darling, and Ornament of a Man of Honour, useful and esteemed by his Friends, and I no longer one that has buried some Merit in the World, in Complaisance to a forward Humour which has grown upon an agreeable Woman by his Indulgence. Mr Freeman ended this with a tenderness in his Aspect and a downcast Eye, which shewed he was extremely moved at the Anguish he saw her in, for she sat swelling with Passion, and her Eyes

'firmly fixed on the Fire, when I, fearing he would lose all again, took upon me to provoke her out of that miserable Sorrow she was in, to fall upon me upon which I said very seasonably for my Friend, That indeed Mr Freeman was become the common Talk of the Town, and that nothing was so much a Jest, as when it was said in Company Mr Freeman had promised to come to such a Place. Upon which the good Lady turned her Softness into downright Rage, and threw the scalding Tea Kettle upon your humble Servant, flew into the Middle of the Room, and cried out she was the unfortunatest of all Women. Others kept Family Dissatisfactions for Hours of Privacy and Retirement. No Apology was to be made to her, no Expedient to be found, no previous Manner of breaking what was amiss in her, but all the World was to be acquainted with her Errors, without the least Admonition. Mr Freeman was going to make a softening Speech, but I interposed, Look you, Madam, I have nothing to say to this Matter, but you ought to consider you are now pratt a Chicken this Humour, which was well enough in a Girl, is insufferable in one of your Motherly Character. With that she lost all Patience, and flew directly at her Husband's Perwig. I got her in my Arms, and defended my Friend. He making Signs at the same time that it was too much I beckoning, nodding, and frowning over her Shoulder, that [he] I was lost if he did not persist. In this manner [we<sup>2</sup>] flew round and round the Room in a Moment, 'till the Lady I spoke of above and Servants entered upon which she fell on a Couch as breathless. I still kept up my Friend but he, with a very silly Air, bid them bring the Coach to the Door, and we went off, I forced to bid the Coachman drive on. We were no sooner come to my Lodgings, but all his Wife's Relations came to enquire after him, and Mrs Freeman's Mother writ a Note, wherein she thought never to have seen this Day, and so forth.

'In a word, Sir, I am afraid we are upon a thing we have no Talents for, and I can observe already my Friend looks upon me rather as a Man that knows a Weakness of him that he is ashamed of, than one who has rescu'd him from Slavery. Mr SPECTATOR, I am but a young Fellow, and if Mr Freeman submits, I shall be looked upon as an Incendiary, and never get a Wife as long as I breathe. He has indeed sent Word home he shall be at Hampstead to night, but I believe Fear of the first Onset after this Rupture has too great a Place in this Resolution. Mrs Freeman has a very pretty Sister, suppose I delivered him up, and truced with the Mother for her for bringing him home. If he has not Courage to stand it, (you are a great Casuist) is it such an ill thing to bring myself off, as well as I can? What makes me doubt my Man, is that I find he thinks it reasonable to expostulate at least with her and Capt. SENTRY will tell you, if you let your Orders be disputed, you are no longer a Commander. I wish you could ad-

*Time sæmna simplex,
Et pariter toto repetitur clamor ab antro*
Juv Sat 6

I SHALL entertain my Reader to day with some Letters from my Correspondents. The first of them is the Description of a Club, whether real or imaginary I cannot determine but am apt to fancy, that the Writer of it, whoever she is, has formed a kind of Nocturnal Orgie out of her own Fancy. Whether this be so or not, her Letter may conduce to the Amendment of that kind of Persons who are represented in it, and whose Characters are frequent enough in the World.

MR SPECTATOR,

'In some of your first Papers you were pleas'd to give the Publick a very diverting Account of several Clubs and nocturnal Assemblies, but I am a Member of a Society which has wholly escap'd your Notice, I mean a Club of She Romps. We take each a Hackney Coach, and meet once a Week in a large upper Chamber, which we hire by the Year for that Purpose. Our Landlord and his Family, who are quiet People, constantly endeavoring to be abroad on our Club-Night. We are no sooner come together than we throw off all that Modesty and Reservedness with which our Sex are oblig'd to disguise themselves in publick Places. I am not able to express the Pleasure we enjoy from Ten at Night till four in the Morning, in being as rude as you Men can be, for your Lives. As our Play runs high the Room is immediately filled with broken Fans, torn Petticoats, Lappets of Head dresses, Flouncees, Furbelows, Garters, and Working-Aprons. I had forgot to tell you at first, that besides the Coaches we come in our selves, there is one which stands always empty to carry off our dead Men, for so we call all those Fragments and Tatters with which the Room is strewd and which we pack up together in Bundles and put into the fore-and Corch. It is no small Diversion for us to meet the next Night at some Member's Chamber, where every one is to pick out what belonged to her from this confused Bundle of Silks, Stuffs, Laces, and Ribbons. I have hitherto given you an Account of our Diversion on ordinary Club Nights but must acquaint you further, that once a Month we demolish a Prude, that is, we get some queer formal Creature in among us, and unrig her in an Instant. Our last Month's Prude was so armed and fortified in Whalebone and Buckram that we had much ado to come at her but you would have died with laughing to have seen how the sober awkward Thing looked when she was forced out of her Intrenchments. In short, Sir,

'tis impossible to give you a true Notion of our Sports, unless you would come one Night amongst us and tho' it be directly against the Rules of our Society to admit a Male Visitor, we repose so much Confidence in your Silence and Trustworthiness, that 'twas agreed by the whole Club, at our last Meeting, to give you Entrance for one Night as a Spectator.

I am,
Your Humble Servant,
Kitty Loringant

P S We shall demolish a Prude next Thursday

Tho' I thank Kitty for her kind Offer, I do not at present find in my self any Inclination to venture my Person with her and her romping Companions. I should regard my self as a second Clodius intruding on the Mysterious Rites of the Bona Dea, and should apprehend being Demolish'd as much as the Prude.

The following Letter comes from a Gentleman, whose Taste I find is much too delicate to endure the least Advanc'd towards Romping. I may perhaps hereafter improve upon the Hint he has given me, and make it the Subject of a whole Spectator, in the mean time take it as it follows in his own Words.

MR SPECTATOR,

'It is my Misfortune to be in Love with a young Creature who is daily committing I wits, which though they give me the utmost Uneasiness, I know not how to prove her for, or even requint her with. She is pretty, dresses well, is rich, and good humour'd but either wholly neglects or has no Notion of that which Polite People have agreed to distinguish by the Name of Delicacy. After our Return from a Walk the other Day she threw her self into an Elbow-Chair, and profess'd before a large Company, that she was all over in a Sweat. She told me this Afternoon that her Stomach ached, and was complaining Yesterday at Dinner of something that stuck in her Teeth. I treated her with a Basket of Fruit last Summer, which she eat so very greedily, as almost made me resolve never to see her more. In short, Sir, I begin to tremble whenever I see her about to speak or move. As she does not want Sense, if she takes these Hints I am happy, if not, I am more than in afraid, that these Things which shock me even in the Behaviour of a Mistress, will appear insupportable in that of a Wife.

I am,
SIR,
Yours, &c.

My next Letter comes from a Correspondent whom I cannot but very much value, upon the Account which she gives of her self.

MR SPECTATOR,

'I am happily arriv'd at a State of Tranquillity, which few People envy, I mean that of an old Maid therefore being wholly unconcerned in all that Medley of Follies which our Sex is apt to contract from their silly Fondness of yours, I read your Raileries on us without Provocation. I can say with Hamlet,

*—Man delights in me,
Nor Woman neither—*

'Therefore, dear Sir, as you never spare your own
'Sex, do not be afraid of reproving what is ridicu'lous in ours, and you will oblige at least one
'Woman, who is

*Your Humble Servant,
Susannah Frost*

Mr SPECTATOR,

'I am Wife to a Clergyman, and cannot help
'thinking that in your Letter or Letter Character
'of Woman-kind you meant my self, therefore I 'have no Quarrel against you for the other Nine 'Characters

*Quid de quoque vtro et cui dicas si se caritate
Hor*

I HAPPENED the other Day, as my Way is, to strolc into a little Coffee-house beyond Aldgate, and as I sat there, two or three very plain sensible Men were talking of the SPECTATOR.
One said, he had that Morning drawn the great Benefit Ticket another wished he had but a third shaked his Head and said, It was pity that the Writer of that Paper was such a sort of Man, that it was no great Matter whether he lived it or no. He is it seems, said the good Man, the most extravagant Creature in the World, has run through vast Sums, and yet been in continual Want a Man, for all he talks so well of Oeconomy unfit for any of the Offices of Life, by reason of his Profuseness. It would be an unhappy thing to be his Wife, his Child, or his Friend and yet he talks as well of these Duties of Life as any one. Much Reflection has brought me to so easy a Contempt for every thing which is false, that this heavy Accusation gave me no manner of Uneasiness, but at the same Time it threw me into deep Thought upon the Subject of Fame in general and I could not but pity such as were so weak, as to value what the common People say out of their own talkative Temper to the Advantage or Diminution of those whom they mention, without being moved either by Malice or Good will. It will be too long to expatiate upon the Sense all Mankind have of Fame, and the inexpressible Pleasure which there is in the Approbation of worthy Men, to all who are capable of worthy Actions: but methinks one may divide the general Word Fame into three different Species, as it regards the different Orders of Mankind who have any Thing to do with it. Fame therefore may be divided into Glory, which respects the Hero, Reputation, which is preserved by every Gentleman, and Credit, which must be supported by every Tradesman. These Possessions in Fame are dearer than Life to these Characters of Men, or rather are the Life of those Characters. Glory, while the Hero pursues great and noble Enterprizes, is impregnable and all the Assaults of his Renown do but show their Pain and Impatience of its Brightness, without throwing the least Shade upon it. If the Foundation of an high Name be Virtue and Service, all that is offered against it is but Rumour, which is too short-lived to stand up in Competition with Glory, which is everlasting.

Reputation, which is the Portion of every Man who would live with the elegant and knowing Part of Mankind, is as valuable as Glory, if it be as well founded and the common Cause of human Society is thought concerned when we hear a Man of good Behaviour calumniated. Besides which, according to a prevailing Custom amongst us, every Man has his Defence in his own Arm and Reproach is soon checked out of Countenance, and overtaken by Disgrace.

The most unhappy of all Men, and the most exposed to the Vilignity or Wantonness of the common Voice, is the Trader. Credit is undone in Whisper. The Tradesman's Wound is received from one who is more private and more cruel than the Russian with the Lantern and Digger. The Manner of repeating a Man's Name, as Mr
Cash, Oh! do you leave your Money at his Shop?
Why, do you know Mr Serroon? He is indeed a general Merchant. I say, I have seen, from the Iteration of a Man's Name, luding one Thought of him, and expelling what you hide by saying something to his Advantage when you speak, a Merchant hurt in his Credit and him who, every Day he lived, literally added to the Value of his Native Country, undone by one who was only a Burthen and a Blemish to it. Since every Body who knows the World is sensible of this great Evil, how careful ought a Man to be in his Language of a Merchant? It may possibly be in the Power of a very shrewd Creature to lay the Ruin of the best Family or the most opulent City and the more so, the more highly he deserves of his Country: that is to say, the farther he places his Wealth out of his Hands, to draw home that of another Chm's.

In this Case in all Word may change Plenty into Want, and by a rash Sentence a free and generous Fortune may in a few Days be reduced to Beggary. How little does a giddy Prater in-agine, that an idle Phrase to the Disgrace of a Merchant may be as pernicious in the Consequence, as the Forgery of a Deed to bar an Inheritance would be to a Gentleman? Land stands where it did before a Gentleman was calumniated, and the State of a great Action is just as it was before Calumny was offered to diminish it, and there is Time, Place and Occasion expected to unravel all that is contrived against those Characters but the Trader who is ready only for probable Demands upon him, can have no Armour against the Inquisitive, the Malicious, and the Envious, who are prepared to fill the Cry to his Dishonour. Fire and Sword are slow Engines of Destruction, in Comparison of the Babbling in the Case of the Merchant.

For this Reason I thought it an imitable Piece of Humanity of a Gentleman of my Acquaintance, who had great Variety of Affairs, and used to talk with Warmth enough against Gentlemen by whom he thought himself ill dealt with: but he would never let any thing be urged against a Merchant (with whom he had any Difference) except in a Court of Justice. He used to say, that to speak ill of a Merchant, was to begin his Suit with Judgment and Execution. One cannot, I think, say more on this Occasion, than to repeat that the Merit of the Merchant is above that of all other Subjects: for while he is untouched in his Credit, his Hand-writing is a more portable Coin for the Service of his Fellow Citizens, and his Word the Gull of Opium to the Country wherein he resides.

* See No 209.

Vix ea nostra vobis — On

THERE are but few Men, who are not ambitious of distinguishing themselves in their Nation or Country where they live, and of growing considerable among those with whom they converse. There is a kind of Grind and Respect, which the meanest and most insignificant Part of Mankind endeavour to procure in the little Circle of their Friends and Acquaintance. The poorest Mechanick, nay the Man who lives upon common Alms, gets in his Set of Admirers, and delights in that Superiority which he enjoys over those who are in some Respect beneath him. This Ambition, which is natural to the Soul of Man, might methinks receive a very happy turn, and, if it were rightly directed, contribute as much to a Person's Advantage, as it generally does to his Uneasiness and Disquiet.

I shall therefore put together some Thoughts on this Subject, which I have not met with in other Writers, and shall set them down as they have occurred to me without being at the Pains to Connect or Methodise them.

All Superiority and Pre-eminence that one Man can have over another, may be reduced to the Notion of Quality, which, considered at large, is either that of Fortune, Body, or Mind. The first is that which consists in Birth, Title, or Riches, and is the most foreign to our Natures, and what we can the least call our own of any of the three Kinds of Quality. In relation to the Body, Quality arises from Health, Strength, or Beauty, which are nearer to us, and more a Part of our selves than the former Quality, as it regards the Mind, has its Rise from Knowledge or Virtue, and is that which is more essential to us and more intimately united with us than either of the other two.

The Quality of Fortune, tho' a Man has less Reason to value himself upon it than on that of the Body or Mind, is however the kind of Quality which makes the most shining Figure in the Eye of the World.

As Virtue is the most reasonable and genuine Source of Honour, we generally find in Titles an Imitation of some particular Merit that should recommend Men to the high Stations which they possess. Holiness is ascribed to the Pope, Majesty to Kings, Serenity or Mildness of Temper to Princes, Excellence or Perfection to Ambassadors, Grace to Archbishops, Honour to Peers, Worth or Venerable Behaviour to Magistrates, and Reverence, which is of the same Import as the former, to the inferior Clergy.

In the Founders of great Families, such Attributes of Honour are generally corresponded to the Virtue of the Person to whom they are applied: but in the Descendants they are too often the Mark rather of Grandeur than of Merit. The Stamp and Deumure on still continues, but the intrinsic Value is frequently lost.

The Death Bed shows the Impudence of Titles in a true Light. A poor disappointed Sonner lies trembling under the Apprehensions of the State he is entering on, and is a keil by a grave Attendant how his Holiness does? And let him himself addressed to under the Title of Highness or Excellency, who lies under such mean Circumstances of Mortality as are the Disgrace of Human Nature. Titles at such a time look rail or like Insults and Mockery than Respect.

The truth of it is Honours are in this World under no Regulation: true Quality is neglected, Virtue is oppressed, and Vice triumphant. The last Day will rectify this Disorder, and assign to every one a Station suitable to the Dignity of his Character. Ranks will be then adjusted, and Pre-eminence set right.

Methinks we should have an Ambition if not to advance ourselves in another World at least to preserve our Post in it, and out of our Inferiors in Virtue here, that they may not be put above us in a State which is to settle the Distinction for Eternity.

Men in Scripture are called Strangers and Sojourners upon Earth, and I often Pilgrims. Several Heathen as well as Christian Authors, under the same kind of Metaphor, have represented the World as an Inn, which was only designed to furnish us with Accommodations in this our Passage. It is therefore very absurd to think of setting up our Tent before we come to our Journey's End, and not rather to take care of the Reception we shall there meet, than to fix our Thoughts on the little Conveniences and Advantages which we enjoy one above another in the Way to it.

Epictetus makes use of another kind of Allusion, which is very beautiful and wonderfully proper to incline us to be satisfied with the Post in which Providence has placed us. We are here, says he, as in a Theatre, where every one has a Part allotted to him. The great Duty which lies upon a Man is to act his Part in Perfection. We may indeed say, that our Part does not suit us, and that we could act another better. But this (says the Philosopher) is not our Business. All that we are concerned in is to excel in the Part which is given us. If it be an improper one, the Fault is not in us, but in him who has cast our several Parts, and is the great Disposer of the Drama.

The Part that was acted by this Philosopher himself was but a very indifferent one, for he lived and died a Slave His Motion to Contentment in this Particular, receives a very great Inforcement from the above-mentioned Consideration, if we remember that our Parts in the other World will be new cast, and that Mankind will be there rung in different Stations of Superiority and Preeminence, in Proportion as they have here excelled one another in Virtue, and performed in their several Posts of Life the Duties which belong to them

There are many beautiful Passages in the little Apocryphal Book, entitled, The Wisdom of Solomon, to set forth the Vanity of Honour, and the like temporal Blessings which are in so great Requite among Men, and to comfort those who have not the Possession of them It represents in very warm and noble Terms this Advancement of a good Man in the other World and the great Surprise which it will produce among those who are his Superiors in this Then shall the righteous Man stand in great Boldness before the Face of such as have afflicted him, and made no Account of his Labours When they see it they shall be troubled with terrible Fear, and shall be amazed at the Strangeness of his Salvation, so far beyond all that they looked for And they repenting and groaning for Anguish of Spirit shall say within themselves This was he whom we had sometime in Derision, and a Proverb of Reproach We Fools accounted his Life Madness and his End to be without Honour How is he numbered among the Children of God, and his Lot is among the Saints

If the Reader would see the Description of a Life that is passed away in Vanity and among the Shadows of Pomp and Greatness, he may see it very finely drawn in the same Place In the mean time, since it is necessary in the present Constitution of things that Order and Distinction should be kept in the World, we should be happy, if those who enjoy the upper Stations in it, would endeavour to surpass others in Virtue, as much as in Rank, and by their Humanity and Condescension make their Superiority easy and acceptable to those who are beneath them and if, on the contrary, those who are in meaner Posts of Life, would consider how they may better their Condition hereafter, and by a just Deference and Submission to their Superiors make them happy in those Blessings with which Providence has thought fit to distinguish them

My SPECTATOR,

There are so many Artifices and Modes of false Wit, and such a Variety of Humour discover'd it self among us Votaries, that it would be impossible to exhaust so fertile a Subject if you would think fit to resume it The following Instances may if you think fit, be added by Way of Appendix to your Discourses on that Subject

That Feat of Poetical Activity mentioned by Horace, of an Author who could compose two hundred Verses while he stood upon one Leg, has been imitated (as I have heard) by a modern Writer who priding himself on the Hury of his Invention, thought it no small Addition to his Fame to have each Piece minuted with the exact Number of Hours or Days it cost him in the Composition He could taste no Praise till he had acquainted you in how short Space of Time he had deserved it and was not so much led to an Ostentation of his Art, as of his Dispatch

Accipiam tabulas, detur mihi locus, tora, Cusoribus vincarum uter plus scribere possit
Hor

This was the whole of his Ambition and therefore I cannot but think the Flights of this rapid Author very proper to be opposed to those laborious Nothings which you have observed were the Delight of the German Wits, and in which they so happily got rid of such a tedious Quantity of their Time

I have known a Gentleman of another Turn of Humour, who, despising the Name of an Author, never printed his Works, but contracted his Talent, and by the help of a very fine Diamond which he wore on his little Finger, was a considerable Poet upon Glass He had a very good Epigrammatick Wit and there was not a Parlour or Tavern Window where he visited or dined for some Years, which did not receive some Sketches or Memorials of it It was his Misfortune at last to lose his Genius and his Ring to a

'But of all Contractions or Expedients for Wit, I admire that of an ingenious Projector whose Book I have seen'. This Virtuoso being a Mathematician, has, according to his Taste, thrown the Art of Poetry into a short Problem, and contrived Tables by which any one without knowing a Word of Grammar or Sense, may, to his great Comfort, be able to compose or rather to erect Latin Verses. His Tables are a kind of Poetical Logarithms, which being divided into several Squares, and all inscribed with so many incoherent Words, appear to the Eye somewhat like a Fortune telling Screen. What a Joy must it be to the unlearned Operator to find that these Words, being carefully collected and writ down in Order according to the Problem, start of themselves into Hexameter and Pentameter Verses?

A Friend of mine, who is a Student in Astrology, meeting with this Book, performed the Operation, by the Rules there set down he shewed his Verses to the next of his Acquaintance, who happened to understand Latin, and being informed they described a Tempest of Wind, very luckily perceived them, together with a Translation, to an Almanack he was just then printing, and was supposed to have foretold the last great Storm.

I think the only Improvement beyond this, would be that which the late Duke of Buckingham mentioned to a stupid Pretender to Poetry, as the Project of a Dutch Mechanick, viz. a Mill to make Verses. This being the most compendious Method of all which have yet been proposed, may deserve the Thoughts of our modern Virtuosi, who are employed in new Discoveries for the publick Good and it may be worth the while to consider, whether in an Island where few are content without being thought Wits, it will not be a common Benefit, that Wit as well as Labour should be made cheap.

WHEN I have finished any of my Speculations, it is my Method to consider which of the ancient Authors have touched upon the Subject that I treat of. By this means I meet with some celebrated Thought upon it, or a Thought of my own expressed in better Words, or some Similitude for the Illustration of my Subject. Thus is what gives Birth to the Motto of a Speculation, which I rather chuse to take out of the Poets than the Prose-writers, as the former generally give a finer Turn to a Thought than the latter, and by couching it in few Words, and in harmonious Numbers, make it more portable to the Memory.

My Reader is therefore sure to meet with at least one good Line in every Paper, and very often finds his Imagination entertained by a Hint that awakens in his Memory some beautiful Passage of a Classic Author.

It was a Saying of an ancient Philosopher, which I find some of our Writers have ascribed to Queen Elizabeth, who perhaps might have taken occasion to repeat it, that a good Face is a Letter of Recommendation. It naturally makes the Beholders inquisitive into the Person who is the Owner of it, and generally prepossesses them in his Favour. A handsome Motto has the same Effect. Besides that, it always gives a Supernumerary Beauty to a Paper, and is sometimes in a manner necessary when the Writer is engaged in what may appear a Paradox to vulgar Minds, as it shews that he is supported by good Authorities, and is not singular in his Opinion.

I must confess, the Motto is of little Use to an

MR SPECTATOR,

THERE is one thing I have often look'd for in your Papers, and have as often wonder'd to find myself disappointed the rather, because I think it a Subject every way agreeable to your Design, and by being left unattempted by others, seems reserved as a proper Employment for you, I mean a Disquisition, from whence it proceeds, that Men of the brightest Parts, and most comprehensive Genius, completely furnished with Talents for any Province in humane Affairs, such as by their wise Lessons of Oeconomy to others have made it evident, that they have the justest Notions of Life and of true Sense in the Conduct of it — from what unhappy contradictory Cause it proceeds, that Persons thus finished by Nature and by Art, should so often fail in the Management of that which they so well understand, and want the Address to make a right Application of their own Rules This is certainly a prodigious Inconsistency in Behaviour, and makes much such a Figure in Morals as a monstrous Birth in Naturals, with this Difference only, which greatly aggravates the Wonder, that it happens much more frequently and what a Blemish does it cast upon Wit and Learning in the general Account of the World? And in how disadvantageous a Light does it expose them to the busy Class of Mankind, that there should be so many Instances of Persons who have so conducted their Lives in spite of these transcendent Advantages, as neither to be happy in themselves, nor useful to their Friends, when every Body sees it was entirely in their own Power to be eminent in both these Characters? For my part, I think there is no Reflection more astonishing, than to consider one of these Gentlemen spending a fair Fortune, running in every Body's Debt without the least Apprehension of a future Reckoning, and at last leaving not only his own Children, but possibly those of other People, by his Means in starving Circumstances while a Fellow, whom one would scarce suspect to have a humane Soul, shall perhaps ruse a vast Estate out of Nothing, and be the Founder of a Family capable of being very considerable in their Country, and doing many illustrious Services to it That this Observation is just, Experience has put beyond all Dispute But though the Fact be so evident and glaring, yet the Causes of it are still in the Dark which makes me persuade myself, that it would be no unacceptable Piece of Entertainment to the Town, to inquire into the hidden Sources of so unaccountable an Evil

I am,

SIR,

Your most Humble Servant

What this Correspondent wonders at, has been Matter of Admiration ever since there was any such thing as humane Life Horne reflects upon this Inconsistency very agreeably in the Character of Sigellus, whom he makes a mighty Pretender to Oeconomy, and tells you, you might one Day hear him speak the most philosophick Things imaginable concerning being contented with a little, and his Contempt of every thing but mere Necessaries, and in Half a Week after spend a thousand Pound When he says this of him with Relation to Expence, he describes him as unequal to himself in every other Circumstance of Life And indeed, if we consider lavish Men carefully, we shall find it always proceeds from a certain Incapacity of possessing themselves, and finding Enjoyment in their own Minds Mr Dryden has expressed this very excellently in the Character of Zuiri

*A Man so various, that he seem'd to be
Not one, but all Mankind's Epitome Stiff in Opinion, always in the Wrong, travagant from one Pursuit to another, and the Reason that his Expenses are greater than another's, is, that his Wants are also more numerous. But what makes so many go on in this Way to their Lives End, is, that they certainly do not know how contemptible they are in the Eyes of the rest of Mankind, or rather, that indeed they are not so contemptible as they deserve. Jully says, it is the greatest of Wickedness to lessen your paternal Estate. And if a Man would thoroughly consider how much worse than Banishment it must be to his Child, to ride by the Estate which should have been his had it not been for his Father's Injustice to him, he would be smitten with the Reflection more deeply than can be understood by any but one who is a Father. Sure there can be nothing more afflictive than to think it had been happier for his Son to have been born of any other Man living than himself.

It is not perhaps much thought of, but it is certainly a very important Lesson, to learn how to enjoy ordinary Life, and to be able to relish your Being without the Transport of some Passion or Gratification of some Appetite. For want of this Capacity, the World is filled with Whetters, Tipplers, Cutters, Sippers, and all the numerous Train of those who, for want of Thinking, are forced to be ever exercising their Feeling or Lust. It would be hard on this Occasion to mention the harmless Smokers of Tobacco and Takers of Snuff.

The slower Part of Mankind, whom my Correspondent wonders should get Estates, are the more immediately formed for that Pursuit. They can expect distant things without Impatience, because they are not carried out of their Way either by violent Passions or keen Appetite to any thing. To Men addicted to Delights, Business is an Interruption, to such as are cold to Delights, Business is an Entertainment. For which Reason it was said to one who commended a dull Man for his Application, No thanks to him, if he had no Business, he would have nothing to do.

*O snavis Animal! qualem te dicunt bonant
Antehac fuisse, tales cum sint reliquis!*

WHEN I reflect upon the various Fate of those Multitudes of Ancient Writers who flourished in Greece and Italy, I consider Time as an Immense Ocean, in which many noble Authors are entirely swallowed up, many very much shattered and damaged, some quite disjointed and broken into pieces, while some have wholly escaped the Common Wreck, but the Number of the last is very small.

Apparuit rari nantes in gurgite vasto

Among the mutilated Poets of Antiquity, there is none whose Fragments are so beautiful as those of Sappho. They give us a taste of her Way of Writing, which is perfectly conformable with that extraordinary Character we find of her, in the Remarks of those great Critics who were conversant with her Works when they were entire. One may see by what is left of them, that she followed Nature in all her Thoughts, without descending to those little Points, Conceits, and Turns of Wit with which many of our modern Lyicks are so miserably infected. Her Soul seems to have been made up of Love and Poetry. She felt the Passion in all its Warmth, and described it in all its Symptoms. She is called by ancient Authors the Tenth Muse, and by Plutarch is compared to Cacus the Son of Vulcan, who breathed out nothing but Flame. I do not know, by the Character that is given of her Works, whether it is not for the Benefit of Mankind that they are lost. They were filled with such bewitching Tenderess and Rapture, that it might have been dangerous to have given them a Reading.

An Inconstant Lover, called Phaon, occasioned great Calumnies to this Poetical Lady. She fell desperately in Love with him, and took a Voyage into Sicily in Pursuit of him, he having withdrawn himself thither on purpose to avoid her. It was in that Island, and on this Occasion, she is supposed to have made the Hymn to Venus, with a Translation of which I shall present my Reader. Her Hymn was infectious for the procuring that Happiness which she prayed for in it. Phaon was still obdurate, and Sappho so transported with the Violence of her Passion, that she was resolved to get rid of it at any Price.

There was a Promontory in Acarnania called [Leucate], on the Top of which was a little Temple dedicated to Apollo. In this Temple it was usual for despairing Lovers to make their Vows in secret, and afterwards to fling themselves from the Top of the Precipice into the Sea, where they were sometimes taken up alive. This Place was therefore called, The Lover's Leap, and whether or no the Knight they had been in, or the Resolution that could push them to so dreadful a Remedy, or the Bruises which they often received in their Fall, banished all the tender Sentiments of Love, and gave their Spirits another Turn, those who had taken this Leap were observed never to relapse into that Passion. Sappho tried the Cure, but perished in the Experiment.

After having given this short Account of Sappho so far as it regards the following Ode, I shall subjoin the Translation of it as it was sent me by a Friend, whose admirable Pastorals and Winter-Piece have been already so well received.<sup>2</sup> The

<sup>2</sup> Ambrose Philips, whose Winter Piece appeared in No. 12 of the Spectator, and whose six Pastorals preceded those of Pope. Philips's Pastorals had appeared in 1709 in a sixth volume of a Poetical Miscellany issued by Jacob Tonson. The first four volumes of that Miscellany had been edited by Dryden, the fifth was collected after Dryden's death, and the sixth was notable for opening with the Pastorals of Ambrose Philips and closing with those of young Pope when Tonson had volunteered to print, thereby, said Wycherley, furnishing a Reader will find in it that Pathetic Simplicity which is so peculiar to him, and so suitable to the Ode he has here translated. This Ode in the Greek (besides those Beauties observed by Madam Dacier) has several harmonious Turns in the Words, which are not lost in the English. I must further add, that the Translation has preserved every Image and Sentiment of Sappho, notwithstanding it has all the Ease and Spirit of an Original. In a Word, if the Ladies have a mind to know the Manner of Writing practised by the so much celebrated Sappho, they may here see it in its genuine and natural Beauty, without any foreign or affected Ornaments.

AN HYMN TO VENUS

I

O Venus, Beauty of the Skies,
To whom a Thousand Temples rise,
Gayly false in gentle Smiles,
Full of Love perplexing Wiles,
O Goddess! from my Heart remove All wasting Cares and Pains of Love

II

If ever thou hast kindly heard
A Song in soft Distress prefer'd, Propitious to my tuneful Vow,
O gentle Goddess! hear me now
Descend, thou bright, immortal Guest,
In all thy radiant Charms consist

III

Thou once didst Love Almighty Jove,
And all the Golden Roofs above
The Carr thy wanton Sparrows drew,
How ring in Air they lightly flew,
As to my Lover they wing'd their Way
I saw their quivering Pinions play

IV

The Birds dismiss (while you remain)
Bore back their empty Carr again
Then You, with Looks divinely mild,
In every heavenly Feature smil'd,

Jacob's ladder by which Pope mounted to immortality. In a letter to his friend Mr Henry Cromwell, Pope said, generously putting himself out of account, that there were no better eclogues in our language than those of Philips; but when afterwards Iickell in the Guardian, criticizing Pastoral Poets from Theocritus downwards, evicted Philips and prised over Pope, the slighted poet took his revenge by sending to Steele an amusing one paper more upon Pastorals. This was ironical exaltation of the worst he could find in Philips over the best bits of his own work, which Steele inserted (it is No. 40 of the Guardian). Hereupon Philips, it is said, stuck up a rod in Button's Coffee House, which he said was to be used on Pope when next he met him. Pope retained his wrath, and celebrated Philips afterwards under the character of Maceer, saying of this Spectator time,

When simple Maceer, now of his high renown,
First sought a Poet's fortune in the town
Twas all the ambition his high soul could feel,
To wear red stockings, and to dine at his Club

And ask'd what new Complaints I made,
And why I call'd you to my Aid!

V

What Phrenzy in my Bosom rag'd,
And by what Carr to be assuag'd?
What gentle Youth I could allure,
Whom in my artful Toiles secure?
Who does thy tender Heart subdue, Tell me, my Sappho, tell me Who?

VI

Tho' now he Shows thy longing Arms,
He soon shall court thy slighted Charms
Tho' now thy Off'rings he despise,
He soon to thee shall Sacrifice
Tho' now he freeze, he soon shall burn,
And be thy Victim in his turn

VII

Celestial Visitant, once more
Thy needful Presence I implore!
In Pity come and ease my Grief,
Bring my distemper'd Soul Relief,
Favour thy Suppliant's hidden Fires,
And give me All my Heart desires

Madam Dacier observes, there is something very pretty in that Circumstance of this Ode, wherein Venus is described as sending away her Christ upon her Arrival at Sappho's Lodgings, to denote that it was not a short transient Visit which she intended to make her. This Ode was preserved by an eminent Greek Critick,<sup>1</sup> who inserted it intire in his Works, as a Pattern of Perfection in the Structure of it.

Longinus has quoted another Ode of this great Poetess, which is likewise admirable in its Kind, and has been translated by the same Hand with the foregoing one. I shall oblige my Reader with it in another Paper. In the mean while, I cannot but wonder, that these two finished Pieces have never been attempted before by any of our Countrymen. But the Truth of it is, the Compositions of the Ancients which have not in them any of those unnatural Witticisms that are the Delight of ordinary Readers, are extremely difficult to render into another Tongue, so as the Beauties of the Original may not appear weak and faded in the Translation.

—In gente trahit constrictos Gloria currus
Non minus ignotos generosis— Hor Sat 6

If we look abroad upon the great Multitudes of Mankind, and endeavour to trace out the Principles of Action in every Individual, it will I think, seem highly probable that Ambition runs through the whole Species, and that every Man in Proportion to the Vigour of his Conception is more or less actuated by it. It is indeed no uncommon thing to meet with Men, who by the natural Bent of their Inclinations, and without the Discipline of Philosophy, aspire not to the Heights of Power and Grandeur, who never set their Hearts upon a numerous Train of Chents and Dependancies, nor other gay Appendages of Greatness, who are contented with a Competency, and will not molest their Tranquillity to gain an Abundance. But it is not therefore to be concluded that such a Man is not ambitious: his Desires may have cut out another Channel and determined him to other Pursuits: the Motive however may be still the same: and in these Cases likewise the Man may be equally pushed on with the Desire of Distinction.

Though the pure Consciousness of worthy Actions, abstracted from the Views of popular Applause, be to a generous Mind an ample Reward, yet the Desire of Distinction was doubtless implanted in our Natures as an additional Incentive to exert our selves in virtuous Excellence.

This Passion indeed, like all others, is frequently perverted to evil and ignoble Purposes, so that we may account for many of the Excellencies and Follies of Life upon the same innate Principle, to wit, the Desire of being remarkable. For this, as it has been differently cultivated by Education, Study and Commerce, will bring forth suitable Effects as it falls in with (ingenious<sup>1</sup>) Disposition, or a corrupt Mind: it does accordingly express itself in Acts of Magnanimity or selfish Cunning, as it meets with a good or a weak Understanding. As it has been employed in embellishing the Mind, or adorning the Outside, it renders the Man eminently Praise-worthy or ridiculous. Ambition therefore is not to be confined only to one Passion or Pursuit: for as the same Humours in Constitutions otherwise different, affect the Body after different Manners, so the same aspiring Principle within us sometimes breaks forth upon one Object, sometimes upon another.

It cannot be doubted but that there is as great a Desire of Glory in a Ring of Wrestlers or Cudgel-Players, as in any other more refined Competition for Superiority. No Man that could avoid it, would ever suffer his Head to be broken but out of a Principle of Honour. This is the secret Spring that pushes them forward: and the Superiority which they gain above the undistinguished many, does more than repair those Wounds they have received in the Combat. 'Tis Mr Waller's Opinion, that Julius Cæsar, had he not been Master of the Roman Empire, would in all Probability have made an excellent Wrestler.

*Great Julius on the Mount taw a breed,
A Flock perhaps or Herd I ad led,
He that the World subdued, had been Put the best Wrestler on the Green.<sup>2</sup>*

That he subdued the World, was owing to the Accidents of Art and Knowledge, had he not met with those Advantages, the same Sparks of Emulation would have kindled within him, and prompted him to distinguish himself in some Enterprize of a lower Nature. Since therefore no Man's Lot is so unalterably fixed in this Life, but that a thousand Accidents may either forward or disappoint his Advancement, it is, methinks, a pleasant and inoffensive Speculation, to consider a great Man as divested of all the advantageous Circumstances of Fortune, and to bring him down in one's Imagination to that low Station of Life, the Nature of which bears some distant Resemblance to that high one he is at present possessed of. Thus one may view him exercising in Mankind those Talents of Nature, which being drawn out by Education to their full Length, enable him for the Discharge of some important Employment. On the other Hand, one may ruse uneducated Merit to such a Pitch of Greatness as may seem equal to the possible Extent of his improved Capacity.

Thus Nature furnishes a Man with a general Appetite of Glory, Education determines it to this or that particular Object. The Desire of Distinction is not, I think, in any Instance more observable than in the Variety of Outrides and new Apperances, which the modish Part of the World are obliged to provide, in order to make themselves remarkable for any thing glaring and particular, either in Behaviour or Apparel, is known to have this good Effect, that it catches the Eye, and will not suffer you to pass over the Person so adorned without due Notice and Observation. It has likewise, upon this Account, been frequently resented as a very great Slight, to leave any Gentleman out of a Lampoon or Satyr, who has as much Right to be there as his Neighbour, because it supposes the Person not eminent enough to be taken notice of. To this passionate Fondness for Distinction are owing various frolicsome and irregular Proceedings, as sailing out into Nocturnal Exploits, breaking of Windows, singing of Catches, beating the Watch, getting Drunk twice a Day, killing a great Number of Horses with many other Enterprizes of the like fiery Nature. For certainly many a Man is more Rakish and Extravagant than he would willingly be, were there not others to look on and give their Approbation.

One very Common, and at the same time the most absurd Ambition that ever shewed it self in Humane Nature, is that which comes upon a Man with Experience and old Age, the Season when it might be expected he should be wisest: and therefore it cannot receive any of those lessening Circumstances which do, in some measure, excuse the disorderly Ferments of youthful Blood. I mean the Passion for getting Money, exclusive of the Character of the Provident Father, the Affectionate Husband, or the Generous Friend. It may be remarked, for the Comfort of honest Poverty, that this Desire reigns most in those who have but few good Qualities to recommend them. This is a Weed that will grow in a barren Soil. Humility, Good Nature, and the Advantages of a Liberal Education, are incompatible with Avarice. 'Tis strange to see how suddenly this abject Passion kills all the noble Sentiments and generous Ambitions that adorn Humane Nature: it renders the Man who is over-run with it, peevish and cruel Master, a severe Parent, an unsociable Husband, a distant and mistrustful Friend. But it is more to the present Purpose to consider it as an inward Passion of the Heart, rather than as a vicious Affection of the Mind. As there are frequent Instances to be met with of a proud Humility, so this Passion, contrary to most others, affects Applause, by avoiding all Show and Appearance, for this Reason it will not sometimes endure even the common Decencies of Apparel. A co-let is Man will call himself poor, that you may sceth his Vanity by contradicting him. Love and the Desire of Glory, as they are the most natural, so they are capable of being refined into the most delicate and rational Passions. 'Tis true, the wise Man who strikes out of the secret Paths of a private Life, for Honour and Dignity, allured by the Splendour of a Court, and the unsifted Weight of publick Employment, whether he succeeds in his Attempts or no, usually comes near enough to this painted Greatness to discern the Drawing: he is then desirous of extracting himself out of the Hurry of Life, that he may pass away the Remainder of his Days in Tranquillity and Retirement.

It may be thought then that common Prudence in a Man not to chinge a better State for a worse, nor ever to quit that which he knows he shall take up again with Pleasure, and yet if human Life be not a little moved with the gentle Gales of Hopes and Fears, there may be some Danger of its stragling in an unsteady Indulgence and Security. It is a known Story of Demetrius, that after he had possessed himself of the Roman Empire, his Desires turn'd upon catching, like Active and Masculine Spirits, in the Vigour of Youth neither can nor ought to remain at Rest. If they debir themselves from aiming at a noble Object, their Desires will move downward, and they will feel themselves recruited by some low and sordid Passion. Thus if you cut off the top Branches of a Tree, and will not suffer it to grow any higher, it will not therefore cease to grow, but will quickly shoot out at the Nodding. The Man indeed who goes into the World only with the narrow Views of Self Interest, who catches at the Applause of an idle Multitude, as he can find no solid Contentment at the End of his Journey, so he deserves to meet with Disappointments in his Way, but he who is actuated by a noble Principle, whose Mind is so far enlarged as to take in the Prospect of his Country's Good, who is enamoured with that Prize which is one of the fair Attendants of Virtue, and whose not those Acclamations which are not seconded by the impartial Testimony of his own Mind, who repines not at the low Station which Providence has at present allotted him, but yet would willingly advance himself by justifiable Means to a more rising and advantageous Ground, such a Man is warmed with a generous Emulation: it is a virtuous Movement in him to wish and to endeavour that his Power of doing Good may be equal to his Will.

The Man who is fitted out by Nature, and sent into the World with great Abilities, is capable of doing great Good or Mischief in it. It ought therefore to be the Care of Education to infuse into the untainted Youth early Notices of Justice and Honour, that so the possible Advantages of good Parts may not take in evil Turn, nor be perverted to base and unworthy Purposes. It is the Business of Religion and Philosophy not so much to extinguish our Passions, as to regulate and direct them to valuable well-chosen Objects. When these have pointed out to us which Course we may lawfully steer, 'tis no Harm to set out all our Sail: if the Storms and Tempests of Adversity should rise upon us, and not suffer us to make the Haven where we would be, it will however prove no small Consolation to us in these Circumstances, that we have neither mistaken our Course, nor fallen into Calamities of our own procuring.

Religion therefore were we to consider it no farther than as it interposes in the Affairs of this Life, is highly valuable, and worthy of great Veneration: as it settles the various Pretensions, and otherwise interposes in the Affairs of mortal Man, and thereby consults the Harmony and Order of the great Community, as it gives a Man room to play his Part, and exert his Abilities, as it invites to Actions truly laudable in themselves, in their Effects beneficial to Society, as it inspires rational Ambitions, correct Love, and elegant Desires. I HAVE often thought if the Minds of Men were laid open, we should see but little Difference between that of the Wise Man and that of the Fool. There are infinite Acervities, numberless Intricacies, and a perpetual Train of Vanities which pass through both. The great Difference is that the first knows how to pick and cull his Thoughts for Conversation, by suppressing some, and communicating others, whereas the other lets them all indifferently fly out in Words. This sort of Discretion however, has no Place in private Conversation between intimate Friends. On such Occasions the wisest Men very often talk like the wisest, else but thinking aloud.

Fully has therefore very justly expounded a Precept delivered by some Ancient Writers, That a Man should live with his Enemy in such a manner, as might leave him room to become his Friend, and with his Friend in such a manner, that if he became his Enemy, it should not be in his Power to hurt him. The first Part of this Rule, which regards our Behaviour towards an Enemy, is indeed very reasonable, as well as very prudent, but the latter Part of it which regards our Behaviour towards a Friend, savours more of Cunning than of Discretion, and would cut a Man off from the greatest Pleasures of Life which are the Pleasures of Conversation with a Bosom Friend. Besides, that when a Friend is turned into an Enemy, and (as the Son of Simeon calls him) a Betrayal of Secrets, the World is just enough to accuse the Perverseness of the Friend, rather than the Indiscretion of the Person who confided in him.

Discretion does not only shew it self in Words, but in all the Circumstances of Action: and is like an Under-Agent of Providence, to guide and direct us in the ordinary Concerns of Life.

There are many more shining Qualities in the Mind of Man, but there is none so useful as Discretion, it is this indeed which gives a Value to all the rest, which sets them at work in their proper Times and Places, and turns them to the Advantage of the Person who is possessed of them. Without it Learning is Pedantry, and Wit Impertinence. Virtue itself looks like Weakness, the best Parts only qualify a Man to be more spitefully in Errors, and active to his own Prejudice.

Nor does Discretion only make a Man the Master of his own Parts, but of other Mens. The discreet Man finds out the Talents of those he converses with, and knows how to apply them to proper Uses. Accordingly if we look into particular Communities and Divisions of Men, we may observe that it is the discreet Man, not the Witty, nor the Learned, nor the Brave, who guides the Conversation, and gives Measures to the Society. A Man with great Talents, but void of Discretion, is like Polyphemus in the Fable, Strong and Blind, endued with an irresistible Force, which for want of Sight is of no Use to him.

Though a Man has all other Perfections, and wants Discretion he will be of no great Consequence in the World, but if he has this single Talent in Perfection, and but a common Share of others, he may do what he pleases in his particular Station of Life.

At the same time that I think Discretion the most useful Talent a Man can be Master of, I look upon Cunning to be the Accomplishment of little, mean, ungenerous Minds. Discretion points out the noblest Ends to us, and pursues the most proper and laudable Methods of attaining them. Cunning has only private selfish Aims, and sticks at nothing which may make them succeed. Discretion has large and extended Views, and, like a well formed Eye, commands a whole Horizon. Cunning is a Kind of Short sightedness, that discovers the minutest Objects which are near at hand, but is not able to discern things at a distance. Discretion, the more it is discovered, gives a greater Authority to the Person who possesses it. Cunning, when it is once detected, loses its Force, and makes a Man incapable of bringing about even those Events which he might have done, had he passed only for a plain Man. Discretion is the Perfection of Reason, and a Guide to us in all the Duties of Life. Cunning is a Kind of Instinct that only looks out after our immediate Interest and Welfare. Discretion is only found in Men of strong Sense and good Understandings. Cunning is often to be met with in Brutes themselves and in Persons who are but the fewest Removes from them. In short Cunning is only the Mimick of Discretion, and may pass upon weak Men, in the same manner as Vivacity is often mistaken for Wit, and Gravity for Wisdom.

The Cast of Mind which is natural to a discreet Man, makes him look forward into Futurity, and consider what will be his Condition Millions of Ages hence, as well as what it is at present. He knows that the Misery or Happiness which are reserved for him in another World, lose nothing of their Reality by being placed at so great a Distance from him. The Objects do not appear little to him because they are remote. He considers that those Pleasures and Pains which he bid in Eternity, approach nearer to him every Moment, and will be present with him in their full Weight and Measure, as much as those Pains and Pleasures which he feels at this very Instant. For this Reason he is careful to secure to himself that which is the proper Happiness of his Nature, and the ultimate Design of his Being. He carries his Thoughts to the End of every Action, and considers the most distant as well as the most immediate Effects of it. He supercedes every little Prospect of Gain and Advantage which offers itself here, if he does not find it consistent with his Views of an Hereafter. In a word, his Hopes are full of Immortality, his Schemes are large and glorious, and his Conduct suitable to one who knows his true Interest, and how to pursue it by proper Methods.

I have, in this Essay upon Discretion, considered it both as an Accomplishment and as a Virtue, and have therefore described it in its full Extent, not only as it is conversant about worldly Affairs, but as it regards our whole Existence, not only as it is the Guide of a mortal Creature, but as it is in general the Director of a reasonable Being. It is in this Light that Discretion is represented by the Wise Man, who sometimes mentions it under the Name of Discretion, and sometimes under that of Wisdom. It is indeed (as described in the latter Part of this Paper) the greatest Wisdom, but at the same time in the Power of every one to attain. Its Advantages are infinite, but its Acquisition easy, or to speak of her in the Words of the Apocryphal Writer whom I quoted in my last Saturday's Paper, Wisdom is glorious, and ever sweetly won, yet she is easily seen of them that love her, and found of such as seek her. She presenteth them that desire her, in making herself first known unto them. He that seeketh her early, shall have no great Travail for he shall find her sitting at his Doors. To him therefore upon her is Perfectness of Wisdom, and who so catcheth for her shall quickly be without Care. For she goeth about seeking such as are worthy of her, she will her self favourably unto them in the Ways, and will tell them in every Thing.<sup>1</sup> in the most agreeable Aspect imaginable, that it does not only express the Passion or Concern as it sits upon him who is drawn, but has under those Features the Height of the Painter's Imagination. What strong Images of Virtue and Humanity might we not expect would be instilled into the Mind from the Labours of the Pencil? This is a Poetry which would be understood with much less Capriciousness, and less Expence of Time, than what is taught by Writings; but the Use of it is generally perverted, and that admirable Skill prostituted to the basest and most unworthy Ends. Who is the better Man for beholding the most beautiful Venus, the best wrought Bacchanal, the Images of sleeping Cupids, languishing Nymphs, or any of the Representations of Gods, Goddesses, Demy-gods, Satyr, Polyphenes, Sphinxes, or Titans? But if the Virtues and Vices, which are sometimes pretended to be represented under such Draughts, were given us by the Painter in the Characters of real Life, and the Persons of Men and Women whose Actions have rendered them laudable or infamous we should not see a good History-Piece without receiving an instructive Lecture. There needs no other Proof of this Truth, than the Testimony of every reasonable Creature who has seen the Cartons in Her Majesty's Gallery at Hampton Court. These are Representations of no less Actions than those of our Blessed Saviour and his Apostles. As I now sit and recollect the warm Images which the admirable Raphael has raised, it is impossible even from the faint Traces in one's Memory of what one has not seen these two Years, to be unmoved at the Horror and Reverence which appear in the whole Assembly when the mercenary Man fell down dead, at the Amusement of the Man born blind, when he first receives Sight, or at the graceless Indignation of the Sorcerer, when he is struck blind. The Lame, when they first find Strength in their Feet, stand doubtful of their new Vigour. The heavenly Apostles appear acting these great Things, with a deep Sense of the Infirmities which they relieve, but no Value of themselves who administer to their Weakness. They know themselves to be but Instruments, and the generous Distrust they are painted in when divine Honours are offered to them, is a Representation in the most exquisite Degree of the Beauty of Holiness. When St Paul is preaching to the Athenians, with what wonderful Art are almost all the different Tempers of Man kind represented in that elegant Audience? You see one credulous of all that is said, another wrapt up in deep Suspence, another saying there is some Reason in what he says, another angry that the Apostle destroys a favourite Opinion which he is unwilling to give up, another wholly convinced and holding out his Hands in Rapture while the Generality attend, and wait for the Opinion of those who are of leading Characters in the Assembly. I will not pretend so much as to mention that Chart on which is drawn the Appearance of our Blessed Lord after his Resurrection. Present Authority, late Suffering, Humility and Majesty, Despotick Command, and [Divine<sup>1</sup>] Love, are at once seated in his celestial Aspect. The Figures of the Eleven Apostles are all in the same Passion of Admiration, but discover it differently according to their Characters. Peter receives his Master's Orders on his Knees with an Admiration mixed with a more particular Attention. The two next with a more open Testimony, though still constrained by the Awe of [the Divine<sup>2</sup>] Presence. The beloved Disciple, whom I take to be the Right of the two first Figures, lies in his Countenance Wonder drowned in Love and the last Personage, whose Back is towards the Spectator[s], and his Side towards the Presence, one would fancy to be St Thomas, as abashed by the Conscience of his former Diffidence which perplexed Concern it is possible Raphael thought too hard a Task to draw but by this Acknowledgment of the Difficulty to describe it.

The whole Work is an Exercise of the highest Piety in the Painter and all the Loudest of a religious Mind are expressed in a Manner much more forcible than can possibly be performed by the most moving Eloquence. These invaluable Pieces are very justly in the Hands of the greatest and most pious Sovereign in the World and cannot be the frequent Object of every one at their own Leisure. But as an Engraver is to the Painter what a Printer is to an Author, it is worthy Her Majesty's Name, that she has encouraged that noble Artist, Monsieur Dorigny,<sup>2</sup> to publish these Works of Raphael. We have of this Gentleman a Piece of the Transfiguration, which, I think, is held a Work second to none in the World.

It methinks it would be ridiculous in our People of Condition, after their large Bounties to Foreigners of no Name or Merit, should they overlook this Occasion of having, for a trifling Subscription, a Work which it is impossible for a Man of Sense to behold, without being warmed with the noblest Sentiments that can be inspired by Love, Admiration, Compassion, Contempt of this World, and Expectation of a better.

It is certainly the greatest Honour we can do our Country, to distinguish Strangers of Merit who apply to us with Modesty and Diffidence, which generally recompenses Merit. No Opportunity of this Kind ought to be neglected, and a modest Behaviour should alarm us to examine whether we do not lose something excellent under that Disadvantage in the Possessor of that <sup>2</sup> Michel Dorigny, printer and engraver, native of St. Quentin, pupil and son in law of Simon Vouet, whose style he adopted, was Professor in the Paris Academy of Painting, and died at the age of 48, in 1665. His son and Vouet's grand son, Nicola Dorigny, in aid of whose undertaking Steele wrote this paper in the Spectator, had been invited from Rome by several of the nobility, to produce, with licence from the Queen, engravings from Raphael's Cartoons, at Hampton Court. He offered eight plates 19 inches high, and from 25 to 30 inches long for four guineas subscription, although he said in his Prospectus, the five prints of Alexander and Darius after Lebrun were often sold for twenty guineas.

Quality. My Skill in Paintings where one is not directed by the Passion of the Pictures, is so inconsiderable, that I am in very great Perplexity when I offer to speak of any Performances of Painters of Landscapes, Buildings, or single Figures. This makes me at a loss how to mention the Pieces which Mr. Boul exposes to Sale by Auction on Wednesday next in Standon street. But having heard him commended by those who have bought of him heretofore for great Integrity in his Dealing, and overheard him himself (tho' a humble Painter) say, nothing of his own was fit to come into the Room with those he had to sell, I fear'd I should lose an Occasion of serving a Man of Worth, in omitting to speak of his Auction.

IN my last Thursday's Paper I made mention of a Place called The Lover's Leap, which I find has raised a great Curiosity among several of my Correspondents. I there told them that this Leap was used to be taken from a Promontory of Leucas. This Leucas was formerly a Part of Acarnania, being joined to it by a narrow Neck of Land, which the Sea has by length of Time overflowed and washed away, so that at present Leucas is divided from the Continent, and is a little Island in the Ionian Sea. The Promontory of this Island, from whence the Lover took his Leap was formerly called Leucate. If the Reader has a mind to know both the Island and the Promontory by their modern Names, he will find in his Map the ancient Island of Leucas under the Name of St Mauro, and the ancient Promontory of Leucate under the Name of The Cape of St Mauro.

Since I am engaged thus far in Antiquity, I must observe that Isocrates in the Motia prefixed to my Paper, describes one of his despairing Shepherds addressing himself to his Mistress after the following manner, Alas! What will become of me! Wretch that I am! Will you not fear me? I'll throw off my Cloths, and take a Leap into that Part of the Sea which is so much frequented by Ophius the Fisherman. And tho' I should escape with my Life, I know you will be pleas'd with it. I shall leave it with the Critics to determine whether the Place, which this Shepherd so particularly points out, was not the above mentioned Leucate, or at least some other Lover's Leap which was supposed to have had the same Effect. I cannot believe, as all the Interpreters do, that the Shepherd means nothing farther here than that he would drown himself, since he represents the Issue of his Leap as doubtful by adding That if he should escape with [Life] he knows his Mistress would be pleas'd with it which is, according to our Interpretation, the she would rejoice any way to get rid of a Lover who was so troublesome to her.

After this short Preface, I shall present my Reader with some Letters which I have received upon this Subject. The first is sent me by a Physician.

MR SPECTATOR,

The Lover's Leap, which you mention in your 227<sup>d</sup> Paper, was generally, I believe a very effectual Cure for Love and not only for Love, but for all other Furies. In short Sir, I am afraid it was such a Leap as that which Heracles took to get rid of her Passion for Lauder. A Man is in no Danger of breaking his Heart who breaks his Neck to prevent it. I know very well the Wonders which ancient Authors relate concerning this Leap, and in particular, that very many Persons who tried it escaped not only with their Lives but their Lambs. If by this Means they got rid of their Love, tho' it may in part be ascribed to the Reasons you give for it, why may not we suppose that the cold Bath into which they plunged themselves had also some Share in their Cure? A Leap into the Sea or into any Creek of Salt Waters, very often gives a new Motion to the Spirits, and a new Turn to the Blood, for which Reason we prescribe it in Distempers which no other Medicine will reach. I could produce a Quotation out of a very venerable Author, in which the Frenzy produced by Love, is compared to that which is produced by the biting of a mad Dog. But as this Comparison is a little too coarse for your Paper, and might look as if it were cited to ridicule the Author who has made use of it I shall only hint that it and desire you to consider whether, if the Frenzy produced by these two different Causes be of the same Nature it may not very properly be cured by the same Means.

I am, Sir,

Your most humble Servant
and Well wisher,
ESCULAPIUS

'ned another Pray tell me in what Part of the 'World your Promontory lies, which you call The 'Lover's Leap, and whether one may go to it by 'Land? But, alas, I am afraid it has lost its Vir'tue, and that a Woman of our Times would find
'no more Relief in taking such a Leap, than in 'singing an Hymn to Venus So that I must cry
'out with Dido in Dryden's Virgil,

Ah! cruel Heaven, that made no Cure for Love!

Your disconsolate Servant,
ATHENAI

MISTER SPECTATUR,

'My Heart is so full of Loves and Passions for
'Mrs Gumfrid, and she is so pettish and over'run with Cholers against me, that if I had the 'good Happiness to have my Dwelling (which is 'placed by my Great-Cranfather upon the Pottom
'of an Hill) no further Distance but twenty Mile 'from the Lifer's Leap, I would indeed endeavour
'to break my Neck upon it on Purpose Now, good
'Mister SPECTATUR of Crete Prittan, you must 'know it there is in Cænaryanshire a very pig
'Mountain, the Clory of all Wales, which is named
'Penmannauze, and you must also know, it is 'no great Journey on Foot from me, but the 'Road is stony and bad for Shoes Now, there 'is upon the Forehead of this Mountain a very 'high Rock, (like a Parish Steeple) that cometh a 'huge deal over the Sea so when I am in my 'Melancholies, and I do throw myself from it, I 'do desire my very good Friend to tell me in his
'Spectatur, if I shall be cure of my gresvous Loves,
'for there is the Sea clear as Glass, and as green
'as the Leek Then likewise if I be drown, and 'break my Neck, if Mrs Gumfrid will not lose
'me afterwards Pray be speedy in your Answers,
'for I am in crete Haste, and it is my Tesure to 'do my Business without Loss of Time I remem'ber with cordial Affections, your ever loving Friend,
Davyth ap Shenkyu

P S 'My Law-suits have brought me to 'London, but I have lost my Causes and so have 'made my Resolutions to go down and leap before
'the Frosts begin, for I am apt to take Colds

Ridicule, perhaps, is a better Expedient against Love than sober Advice, and I am of Opinion, that Hudibras and Don Quixote may be as effectual to cure the Extravagancies of this Passion, as any of the old Philosophers I shall therefore publish, very speedily, the Translation of a little Greek Manuscript, which is sent me by a learned Friend It appears to have been a Piece of those Records which were kept in the little Temple of Apollo, that stood upon the Promontory of Leu-cate The Reader will find it to be a Summary Account of several Persons who tried the Lover's Leap, and of the Success they found in it. As there seem to be in it some Anachronisms and Deviations from the ancient Orthography, I am not wholly satisfied myself that it is authentick, and not rather the Production of one of those Grecian Sophisters, who have imposed upon the World several spurious Works of this Nature. I speak this by way of Precaution, because I now there are several Writers, of uncommon Erudition, who would not fail to expose my Ignorance, if they caught me tripping in a Matter of so great Mo-

proper Behaviour in all the Occurrences of com-

'or no, I know not, but I fancy I do not wear Shoes thick enough for the Weather, and I have coughed all this Week. It must be so, for the Custom of washing my Head with Water and Summer with cold Water, prevents any Injury from the Season entering that Way, so it must come in at my feet. But I take no notice of it, as it comes so it goes. Most of our Evil proceed from too much Leniency, and our Fears are naturally so little able to resist the Cold as a hermit. The Indian answered very well to me. I enquire, who asked him how he could go naked; I am all Free.

I observed this Discourse was so welcome to my general Enquirer as any other of more Consequence could have been, but some Body calling our Talker to another Part of the Room, the Enquirer told the next Man who sat by him that Mr. such a one, who was just gone from him, used to wash his Head in cold Water every Morning, and so repeated almost à l'eternité all that had been said to him. The Truth is, the Inquisitive are the Channels of Conversation, they do not take in any thing for their own Use, but merely to pass it to another. They are the Channels through which all the Good and Evil that is spilt on in Town are conveyed. Such as are offended at them, or think they suffer by their Behaviour, may themselves mend that Inconvenience for they are not a malicious People, and if you will supply them, you may contravert any thing they have said before by their own Mouths. A further Account of a thing is one of the gratefullest Goods that can arrive to them, and it is seldom that they are more particular than to say, The Town will have it, or I have it from a good Hand. So that there is room for the Town to know the Matter more particularly, and for a better Hand to contravert what was said by a good one.

I have not known this Humour more ridiculous than in a Father, who has been earnestly sollicitous to have an Account how his Son has passed his leisure Hours, if it be in a Way thoroughly insignificant, there cannot be a greater Joy than an Enquirer discovers in seeing him follow so hopelessly his own Steps. But this Humour among Men is most pleasant when they are saying something, which is not wholly proper for a third Person to hear, and yet is in itself indifferent. The other Day there came in a well-dressed young Fellow, and two Gentlemen of this Species immediately fell a whispering his Pedigree. I could overhear, by Breals, She was his Aunt, then an Answer, Ay, she was of the Mother's Side. Then again in a little lower Voice, His Father wore generally a darker Wig. Answer, Not much. But this Gentleman wears higher Heels to his Shoes.

As the Inquisitive, in my Opinion, are such merely from a Vacancy in their own Imaginations, there is nothing, methinks, so dangerous as to communicate Secrets to them, for the same Temper of Enquiry makes them so impertinently communicative. But no Man, though he converses with them, need put himself in their Power, for they will be contented with Matters of less Moment as well. When there is Fuel enough, no matter what it is. Thus the Ends of Sentences in the News Papers, as, This wants Confirmation,

This is a very Spurious and True will die or be lost, are read by them, and considered not as mere Explicatives.

One may see now and then this Humour accompanied with an insatiable Desire of knowing what passes, without turning it to any Use in the world but merely their own Entertainment. A Mind which is gratified this Way is adapted to Humour and Pleasantry, and formed for an unconcerned Character in the World, and, like myself, to be a mere Spectator. This Curiosity, without Malice or Self-interest, lays up in the Imagination a Magazine of Circumstances which cannot but enter in when they are productive in Conversation. If one were to learn, from the Man of the new Quality to the meanest Servant, the different Iniquities, Sentiments, Pleasures, and Interests of Mankind, would it not be the most pleasing Intertainment imaginable to enjoy so constant a Piece as the observing Mankind much more different from themselves in their secret Thoughts and publick Actions, than in their Night cap and long Periwigs?

My SPECTATOR,

Pittacus tells us, that Camus Gracchus, the Roman, was frequently hurried by his Passion into so loud and tumultuous a way of Speaking, and so crined his Voice as not to be able to proceed. To remedy this Excess, he had an ingenious Servant by Name Licinius, always attended him with a Pitch pipe, or Instrument to regulate the Voice, who, whenever he heard his Master begin to be high, immediately touched a soft Note at which, his soul, Camus would presently abate and grow calm.

Upon recollecting this Story, I have frequently wondered that this useful Instrument should have been so long discontinued, especially since we find that this good Officer of Licinius has preserved his Memory for many hundred Years, which, methinks, should have encouraged some one to have revived it, if not for the publick Good, yet for his own Credit. It may be objected, that our loud Talkers are so fond of their own Noise, that they would not take it well to be checked by their Servants. But granting this to be true, surely any of their Hearers have a very good Title to play a soft Note in their own Defence. To be short, no Licinius appearing and the Noise increasing, I was resolved to give this late long Vacation to the Good of my Country, and I have at length, by the Assistance of an ingenious Artist, (who works to the Royal Society) almost completed my Design, and shall be ready in a short Time to furnish the Publick with what Number of these Instruments they please, either to lodge in Coffee-houses, or carry for their own private Use. In the mean time I shall print that Respect to several Gentlemen, who I know will be in Danger of offending against this Instrument, to give them notice of it by private Letters, in which I shall only write, Get a Licinius.

I should now trouble you no longer, but that I must not conclude without desiring you to accept one of these Pipes, which shall be left for you with Buckley, and which I hope will be serviceable to you, since as you are silent your'self you are most open to the Insults of the 'Noisy

Eolus fidibus puellæ—Hor*

A MONG the many famous Pieces of Antiquity which are still to be seen at Rome, there is the Trunk of a Statue<sup>1</sup> which has lost the Arms, Legs, and Head but discovers such an exquisite Workmanship in what remains of it, that Michael Angelo declared he had learned his whole Art from it. Indeed he studied it so attentively, that he made most of his Statues, and even his Pictures in that Gusto, to make use of the Italian Phrase for which Reason this named Statue is still called Michael Angelo's School.

A Fragment of Sappho, which I design for the Subject of this Paper,<sup>2</sup> is in as great Reputation among the Poets and Critics, as the mutilated Figure above mentioned is among the Statuaries and Painters. Several of our Countrymen, and Mr Dryden in particular, seem very often to have copied after it in their Dramatick Writings, and in their Poems upon Love.

Whatever might have been the Occasion of this Ode, the English Reader will enter into the Beauties of it, if he supposes it to have been written in the Person of a Lover sitting by his Mistress. I shall set to View three different Copies of this beautiful Original. The first is a Translation by Catullus, the second by Monsieur Boileau, and the last by a Gentleman whose Translation of the Hymn to Venus has been so deservedly admired.

Ad LESBIAM

*Ille nil par esse deo videtur,
Ille, si fas est, superare divos,
Qui sedens adversus identidem te,
Spectat, et audit
Dulce ridentem, misero quod omnis
Eripit sensus mihi nam simul te,
Lesbia, adspexi, nihil est super mi
Quod loquar amens
Lingua sed torpet, tenuis sub artus
Flamma dimanat, sonitu snopet
Innuunt aures, gemina teguntur Lumina nocte*

My learned Reader will know very well the Reason why one of these Verses is printed in

Roman Letter<sup>2</sup> and if he compares this Translation with the Original, will find that the three first Stanzas are rendered almost Word for Word, and not only with the same Elegance, but with the same short Turn of Expression which is so remarkable in the Greek, and so peculiar to the Sapphick Ode. I cannot imagine for what Reason Mr. Dacier has told us, that this Ode of Sappho is preserved entire in Longinus, since it is manifest to any one who looks into that Author's Quotation of it, that there must at least have been another Stanza, which is not transmitted to us.

The second Translation of this Fragment which I shall here cite, is that of Monsieur Boileau

*Heureux! qui près de toi, pour toi seule soupire
Qui jouit du plaisir de t'entendre parler
Qui te voit quelquefois doucement lui sourire
Les Dieux, dans son bonheur, peuvent-ils l'égalér?*

*Je sens de veine en veine une subtile flamme
Courir par tout mon corps, si tost que je te vois Et dans les doux transports, où s'égare mon
ame,*

*Je ne saurois trouver de langue, ni de voir
Un nuage confus se refait sur ma vue, Je n'entens plus, je tombe en de douces lan-gueurs,
Et pâle, sans haleine, interdite, esperdue,
Un frisson me saisit, je tremble, je me meurs*

The Reader will see that this is rather an Imitation than a Translation. The Circumstances do not lie so thick together, and follow one another with that Vehemence and Emotion as in the Original. In short, Monsieur Boileau has given us all the Poetry, but not all the Passion of this famous Fragment. I shall, in the last Place, present my Reader with the English Translation.

I

*Blest as th' immortal Gods is he,
The Youth who fondly sits by thee,
And hears and sees thee all the while Softly speak and sweetly smile*

II

*'Twas this depriv'd my Soul of Rest,
And rais'd such Tumults in my Breast,
For while I liv'd, in Transport lost,
My Breath was gone, my Voice was lost*

III

*My Bosom glow'd, the subtle Flame Ran quick through all my vital Frame,
O'er my dim Eyes a Darkness hung,
My Ears with hollow Murmurs ring*

IV

*In drowsy Damps my Limbs were chill'd,
My Blood with gentle Horrors thrill'd,
My feeble Pulse for got to play,
I fainted, sunk, and dy'd away*

Instead of giving any Character of this last Translation, I shall desire my learned Reader to look into the Criticisms which Longinus has made upon the Original. By that means he will know to which of the Translations he ought to give the

Preference I shall only add that this Translation is written in the very Spirit of Sappho, and as near the Greek is the Genius of our Language will possibly suffer.

Longinus has observed, that this Description of Love in Sappho is an exact Copy of Nature and that all the Circumstances which follow one another in such an Hurry of Sentiments, notwithstanding they appear repugnant to each other, are really such as happen in the Phrenies of Love.

I wonder, that not one of the Critics or I diters, through whose Hands this Ode has passed, has taken Occasion from it to mention a Circumstance related by Plutarch. That Author in the famous Story of Antioch is, who fell in Love with Stratonice his Mother in Law, and (no daring to discover his Passion) pretended to be confined to his Bed by Sickness, tells us, that Leontine, the Physician found out the Nature of his Distemper by those Symptoms of Love which he had learnt from Sappho's Writings. Stratonice was in the Room of the Love sick Prince when these Symptoms discovered themselves to his Physician and it is probable, that they were not very different from those which Sappho here describes in a Lover sitting by his Mistress. This Story of Antioch is, as well known, that I need not add the Sequel of it, which has no Relation to my present Subject.

Hominum ad Deos nulla res propterea accedit, quia sanctum Romanibus danda—Jull.

HUMAN Nature appears a very deformed, or a very beautiful Object according to the different Lights in which it is viewed. When we see Men of inflamed Passions, or of wicked Designs, tearing one another to pieces by open Violence, or undermining each other by secret Treachery when we observe bare and narrow Ends pursued by ignominious and dishonest Means when we behold Men mixed in Society as if it were for the Destruction of it we are even ashamed of our Species, and out of Humour with our own Being. But in another Light, when we behold them mild, good, and benevolent, full of a generous Regard for the publick Prosperity, compassionating each other's Distresses, and relieving each other's Wants, we can hardly believe they are Creatures of the same kind. In this View they appear Gods in each other, in the Exercise of the noblest Power, that of shewing himself, and the greatest Compliment we have ever been able to make to our own Being, has been by calling this Disposition of Mind Humanity. We cannot but observe a Pleasure arising in our own Breast upon the seeing or hearing of a generous Action, even when we are wholly disinterested in it. I cannot give a more proper Instance of this, than by a Letter from Philo, in which he recommends a Friend in the most handsome manner, and, methinks, it would be a great Pleasure to know the Success of this Epistle though each Party concerned in it has been so many hundred Years in his Grave.

TO MAXIMUS

'What I should gladly do for my Friend of your, I think I may now with Confidence request for a Friend of mine Arrianus Maximus is the most considerable Man of his Country, when I call him so I do not speak with Relation to his Fortune, though that is very plentiful, but to his Integrity, Justice, Gravity, and Prudence, his Advice is useful to me in Business, and his Judgment in Matters of Learning. His Fidelity, Truth, and good Understanding, are very great. Besides this, he loves me as you do than which I cannot say any thing that signifies a warmer Affection. He has nothing that's wanting, and though he might rise in the highest Order of Nobility, he keeps himself in an inferior Rank yet I think myself bound to use my Endeavours to serve and promote him and would therefore find the Means of adding something to his Honours while he neither expects nor knows it, nay, though he should refuse it. Something, in short, I would have for him that may be honourable, but not troublesome, and I entreat that you will procure him the first thing, of this kind that offers, by which you will not only oblige me but him also for though he does not covet it, I know he will be as grateful in acknowledging your Favour as if he had asked it.'

MR SPECTATOR,

'The Reflections in some of your Papers on the servile manner of Education now in Use, have given Birth to an Ambition, which, unless you discontinue it, will, I doubt, engage me in a very difficult, tho' not ungrateful Adventure. I am about to undertake, for the sake of the British Youth, to instruct them in such a manner, that the most dangerous Page in Virgil or Horace may be read by them with much Pleasure, and with perfect Safety to their Persons.

'Could I prevail so far as to be honoured with the Protection of some few of them, (for I am not Hero enough to rescue many) my Design is to retire with them to an agreeable Solitude though within the Neighbourhood of a City, for the Convenience of their being instructed in Music, Dancing, Drawing, Designing, or any other such Accomplishments, which it is conceived may make as proper Diversions for them, and almost as pleasant, as the little sordid

'Games which dirty School boys are so much delighted with. It may easily be imagined, how such a pretty Society, conversing with none beneath themselves, and sometimes admitted as perhaps not unentertaining Parties amongst better Company, commended and caressed for their little Performances, and turned by such Conversations to a certain Gallantry of Soul, might be brought early acquainted with some of the most polite English Writers. Thus having given them some tolerable Taste of Books, they would make themselves Masters of the Latin Tongue by Methods far easier than those in Latin, with as little Difficulty or Reluctance as young Ladies learn to speak French, or to sing Italian Operas. When they had advanced thus far, it would be time to form their Taste something more exactly. One that had any true Relish of fine Writing, might, with great Pleasure both to himself and them, run over together with them the best Roman Historians, Poets, and Orators, and point out their more remarkable Beauties: give them a short Scheme of Chronology, a little View of Geography, Medals, Astronomy, or what else might best feed the busy inquisitive Humour so natural to that Age. Such of them as had the least Spark of Genius, when it was once awakened by the shining Thoughts and great Sentiments of those admired Writers, could not, I believe, be easily withheld from attempting that more difficult Sister Language, whose exalted Beauties they would have heard so often celebrated as the Pride and Wonder of the whole Learned World. In the mean while, it would be requisite to exercise their Style in Writing any light Pieces that ask more of Fancy than of Judgment, and that frequently in their Native Language, which every one methinks should be most concerned to cultivate, especially Letters, in which a Gentleman must have so frequent Occasions to distinguish himself. A Set of genteel good natured Youths fallen into such a Manner of Life, would form almost a little Academy, and doubtless prove no such contemptible Companions, as might not often tempt a wiser Man to mingle himself in their Diversions, and draw them into such serious Sports as might prove nothing less instructing than the gravest Lessons. I doubt not but it might be made some of their Favourite Plays, to contend which of them should recite a beautiful Part of a Poem or Oration most gracefully, or sometimes to join in acting a Scene of Terence, Sophocles, or our own Shakespeare. The Cause of Milo might again be pleaded before more favourable Judges, Caesar a second time be taught to tremble, and another Race of Athenians be refreshed by the Ambition of another Philip. Amidst these noble Amusements, we could hope to see the early Dawnings of their Imagination daily brighten into Sense, their Innocence improve into Virtue, and their unexperienced Good nature directed to a generous Love of their Country.

I am, &c.

O Pudor! O Pietas! ——— Mart.

LOOKING over the Letters which I have lately received from my Correspondents, I met with the following one, which is written with such a Spirit of Politeness, that I could not but be very much pleased with it my self, and question not but it will be as acceptable to the Reader

'You, who are no Stranger to Publick Assemblies, cannot but have observed the Awe they often strike on such as are obliged to exert any Talent before them. This is a sort of elegant Distress, to which ingenious Minds are the most liable, and may therefore deserve some remarks in your Paper. Many a brave Fellow, who has put his Enemy to Flight in the Field, has been in the utmost Disorder upon making a Speech before a Body of his Friends at home. One would think there was some kind of Fascination in the Eyes of a large Circle of People, when darting altogether upon one Person. I have seen a new Actor in a Tragedy so bound up by it as to be scarce able to speak or move, and have expected he would have died above three Acts before the Dagger or Cup of Poison were brought in. It would not be amiss, if such an one were at first introduced as a Ghost or a Statue, till he recovered his Spirits, and grew fit for some living Part.

'As this sudden Devotion of one's self shews a Diffidence, which is not displeasing, it implies at the same time the greatest Respect to an Audience that can be. It is a sort of mute Eloquence, which pleads for their Favour much better than Words could do, and we find their Generosity naturally moved to support those who are in so much Perplexity to entertain them. I was extremely pleased with a late Instance of this Kind at the Opera of Almida, in the Encouragement given to a young Singer,<sup>2</sup> whose more than ordinary Concern on her first Appearance, recommended her no less than her agreeable Voice, and just Performance. Meer Bashfulness without Merit is awkward, and Merit without Modesty, insolent. But modest Merit has a double Claim to Acceptance, and generally meets with as many Patrons as Beholders.

I am, &c.

It is impossible that a Person should exert himself to Advantage in an Assembly, whether it be his Part either to sing or speak, who lies under too great Oppressions of Modesty. I remember, upon talking with a Friend of mine concerning the Force of Pronunciation, our Discourse led us into the Enumeration of the several Organs of Speech which an Orator ought to have in Perfection, as the Tongue, the Teeth [the Lips,] the Nose, the Palate, and the Wind pipe. Upon which, says my Friend, you have omitted the most material Organ of them all, and that is the Forehead.

But notwithstanding an Excess of Modesty obstructs the Tongue and renders it unfit for its Office, a due Proportion of it is thought so requisite to an Orator, that Rhetoricians have recommended it to the Disciples as a Particular in their Art. Cicero tells us that he never liked an Orator who did not appear in some little Confusion at the Beginning of his Speech and confesses that he himself never entered upon an Oration without Trembling and Concern. It is indeed a kind of Deference which is due to a great Assembly, and seldom fails to raise a Benevolence in the Audience towards the Person who speaks. My Correspondent has taken notice that the bravest Men often appear timorous on these Occasions, and indeed we may observe, that there is generally no Creature more impudent than a Coward.

— Largeur de l'ame, et de l'esprit de l'homme
Dexter

A bold Tongue and a feeble Arm are the Objections of Demetrius in Paris, as Lucan in express a Man both timorous and sawy a mixture of a kind of Poet which is very rarely to be met with in his Writings, namely that he had the Feet of a Dog, but the Heart of a Lion.

A just and reasonable Modesty does not only recommend itself to the eye, but is of every great Talent which a Man can be possessed of. It heightens all the Virtues which it accompanies like the Shades in Paintings, it raises and improves every Figure and makes the Colours more beautiful though not so glaring as they would be without it.

Modesty is not only an Ornament but also a Guard to Virtue. It is a kind of quick and delicate Feeling in the Soul which makes her shrink and withdraw her self from every thing that has Danger in it. It is such a exquisite Sensibility, as warns her to shun the first Appearance of every thing which is hurtful.

I cannot at present recollect either the Place or Time of what I am going to mention. But I have read somewhere in the History of Ancient Greece, that the Women of the Country were seized with an uncontrollable Melancholy, which disposed several of them to make away with themselves. The Senate, after having tried many Expedients to prevent this Self-Murder which was so frequent among them, published an Edict, That if any Woman whatever should lay violent Hands upon her self, her Corps should be exposed naked in the Street, and dragged about the City in the most publick Manner. This Edict immediately put a stop to the Practice which was before so common. We may see in this Instance the Strength of Female Modesty, which was able to overcome the Violence even of Madness and Despair. The Fear of Shame in the Fair Sex, was in those Days more prevalent than that of Death.

If Modesty has so great an Influence over our Actions, and is in many Cases so inexpressible a Fence to Virtue, what can more undermine Morality than that Politeness which reigns among the unthinking Part of Mankind, and treats as unfashionable the most ingenious Part of our Behav-

our, which recommends Impudence as good Breeding, and keeps a Man always in Countenance, not because he is Innocent, but because he is Shameless?

Seneca thought Modesty so great a Check to Vice, that he prescribes to us the Practice of it in Secret, and advises us to rise it in ourselves upon many Occasions, when such as are real do not offer themselves. For this is the Meaning of his Precept, that when we are by ourselves, and in our greatest Solitudes, we should fancy that Cato is with us, and see every thing we do. In short, if you banish Modesty out of the World, she carries away with her half the Virtue that is in it.

After these Reflections on Modesty, as it is a Virtue, I must observe that there is a vicious Mode of it which justly deserves to be ridiculed, and which these Persons very often discover, who value themselves upon a well bred Confidence. This happens when a Man is ashamed to set up to his Reason, and would not upon any Consideration be surprised in the Practice of those Duties for the Performance of which he was sent into the World. Many an impudent Libertine would blush to be caught in a serious Discourse, and would rather be able to show his Head, after having disclosed a religious Thought, Decency of Behaviour, all outward Show of Virtue, and Abhorrence of Vice, are carefully avoided by this set of Shame faced People as what would disparage their Gravity of Temper, and insupportable Long thin Dishonour. This is such a Foolishness of Spirit, such a despicable Conscience, such a degenerate subject State of Mind, as one would think Humankind incapable of, did we not meet with frequent Instances of it in ordinary Conversation.

There is another Kind of vicious Modesty which makes a Man ashamed of his Person, his Birth, his Profession, his Poverty, or the like Misfortunes, which it was not in his Choice to prevent, and is not in his Power to rectify. If a Man appears ridiculous by any of the afore mentioned Circumstances, he becomes much more so by being out of Countenance for them. They should rather give him Occasion to exert a noble Spirit, and to palliate those Imperfections which are not in his Power, by those Perfections which are or to use a very witty Allusion of an eminent Author, he should imitate Cæsar who, because his Head was bald, covered that Defect with Laurels.

Nihil largiunde gloriam adeptus es — Sallust

MY wise and good Friend, Sir Andrew Freeport, divides himself almost equally between the Town and the Country. His Time in Town is given up to the Publick, and the Management of his private Fortune, and after every three or four Days spent in this Manner, he retires for as many to his Seat within a few Miles of the Town, to the Enjoyment of himself, his Family, and his Friend. Thus Business and Pleasure, or rather, in Sir Andrew, Labour and Rest, recommend each other. They take their Turns with so quick a Vicissitude, that neither becomes a Habit, or takes Possession of the whole Man, nor is it possible he should be surfeited with either. I often see him at our Club in good Humour, and yet sometimes too with an Air of Care in his Looks. But in his Country Retreat he is always unbent, and such a Companion as I could desire, and therefore I seldom fail to make one with him when he is pleased to invite me.

The other Day, as soon as we were got into his Chariot, two or three Beggars on each Side hung upon the Doors, and solicited our Charity with the usual Rhetorick of a sick Wife or Husband at home, three or four helpless little Children all starving with Cold and Hunger. We were forced to part with some Money to get rid of their Importunity, and then we proceeded on our Journey with the Blessings and Acclamations of these People.

'Well then, says Sir Andrew, we go off with the Prayers and good Wishes of the Beggars, and perhaps too our Healths will be drunk at the next Ale house. So all we shall be able to value ourselves upon, is, that we have promoted the Trade of the Victualler and the Excises of the Government. But how few Ounces of Wool do we see upon the Backs of those poor Creatures? And when they shall next fall in our Way, they will hardly be better dressed: they must always live in Rags to look like Objects of Compassion. If their Families too are such as they are represented, 'tis certain they cannot be better clothed, and must be a great deal worse fed. One would think Potatoes should be all their Bread, and their Drink the pure Element: and then what goodly Customers are the Farmers like to have for their Wooll, Corn and Cattle? Such Customers, and such a Consumption, cannot choose but advance the landed Interest, and hold up the Rents of the Gentlemen.

'But of all Men living, we Merchants, who live by Buying and Selling, ought never to encourage Beggars. The Goods which we export are indeed the Product of the Lands, but much the greatest Part of their Value is the Labour of the People: but how much of these Peoples Labour shall we export whilst we hire them to sit still? The very Alms they receive from us, are the Wages of Idleness. I have often thought that no Man should be permitted to take Relief from the Parish, or to ask it in the Street, till he has first purchased as much as possible of his own Livelihood by the Labour of his own Hands: and then the Publick ought only to be taxed to make good the Deficiency. If this Rule was strictly observed, we should see every where such a Multitude of new Labourers, as would in all probability reduce the Prices of all our Manufactures. It is the very Life of Merchandise to buy cheap and sell dear. The Merchant ought to make his Out set as cheap as possible, that he may find the greater Profit upon his Returns: and nothing will enable him to do this like the Reduction of the Price of Labour upon all our Manufactures. This too would be the ready Way to increase the Number of our Foreign Markets. The Abatement of the Price of the Manufacture would pay for the Carriage of it to more distant Countries: and this Consequence would be equally beneficial both to the Landed and Trading Interests. As so great an Addition of labouring Hands would produce this happy Consequence both to the Merchant and the Gentleman, our Liberality to common Beggars, and every other Obstruction to the Increase of Labourers, must be equally pernicious to both.

Sir Andrew then went on to affirm, That the Reduction of the Prices of our Manufactures by the Addition of so many new Hands, would be no Inconvenience to any Man. But observing I was something startled at the Assertion, he made a short Pause, and then resumed the Discourse. 'It may seem, says he, a Paradox, that the Price of Labour should be reduced without an Abatement of Wages, or that Wages can be abated without any Inconvenience to the Labourer, and yet nothing is more certain than that both those Things may happen. The Wages of the Labourers make the greatest Part of the Price of every Thing that is useful: and if in Proportion with the Wages the Prices of all other Things should be abated, every Labourer with less Wages would be still able to purchase as many Necessaries of Life, where then would be the Inconvenience? But the Price of Labour may be reduced by the Addition of more Hands to a Manufacture, and yet the Wages of Persons remain as high as ever. The admirable Sir William Petty has given Examples of this in some of his Writings. One of them, as I remember, is that of a Watch, which I shall endeavour to explain so as shall suit my present Purpose. It is certain that a single Watch could not be made so cheap in Proportion by one only Man, as a hundred Watches by a hundred: for as there is vast Variety in the Work, no one Person could equally suit himself to all the Parts of it: the Manufacture would be tedious, and at best but clumsily performed. But if a hundred Watches were to be made by a hundred Men, the Cases may be assigned to one, the Dials to another, the Wheels to another, the Springs to another, and every other Part to a proper Artist: as there would be no need of perplexing any one Person with too much Variety, every one would be able to perform his single Part with greater Skill and Expedition, and the hundred Watches would be finished in one fourth Part of the Time of the first one, and every one of them at one fourth Part of the Cost, tho' the Wages of every Man were equal. The Reduction of the Price of the Manufacture would increase the Demand of it, all the same Hands would be still employed and as well paid. The same Rule will hold in the Clothing, the Shipping, and all the other Trades whatsoever. And thus an Addition of Hands to our Manufactures will only reduce the Price of them, the Labourer will still have as much Wages, and will consequently be enabled to purchase more Conveniences of Life, so that every Interest in the Nation would receive a Benefit from the Increase of our Working People.

Besides I see no Objection for this Charity to common Beggars, since every Parish is in Indebtedness to the Poor, and every Parish is taxed to the Maintenance of the same Poor. For my own part, I cannot be mightily pleas'd with the Laws which have done this, which have provided better to feed than employ the Poor. We have a Tradition from our Forefathers, that after the first of those Laws was made, they were mischievous with this famous Song.

*Here's sorrow, and east 27 13 Care,
The Parish is bound to find us, &c.*

And if we will be so good natured as to maintain them without Work they can do no less in Return than sing us The Merry Beggars.

What then? Am I against all Acts of Charity? God forbid! I know of no Virtue in the Gospel that is in more philosophical Expressions recommended to our Practice. I was hungry and ye gave me no Meat, thirsty and ye gave me no Drink, naked and ye clothed me not, a Stranger and ye took me not in, sick and in prison and ye visited me not. Our Blessed Saviour treats the Exercise or Neglect of Charity towards a poor Man, as the Performance or Breach of this Duty towards himself. I shall endeavour to obey the Will of my Lord and Master. And therefore if an industrious Man shall submit to the hardest Labour and contest I do, rather than endure the Shame of taking Relief from the Parish, or asking it in the Street, this is the Hungry, the Thirsty, the Naked, and I ought to believe, if any Man is come hither for Shelter against Persecution or Oppression, this is the Stranger, and I ought to take him in. If any Countryman of our own is fallen into the Hands of Infidels, and lives in a State of miserable Captivity, this is the Man in Prison, and I should contribute to his Ransom. I ought to give to an Hospital of Invalids, to recover as many useful Subjects as I can, but I shall bestow none of my Bounties upon an Alms house of idle People, and for the same Reason I should not think it a Reproach to me if I had withheld my Charity from those common Beggars. But we prescribe better Rules than we are able to practise, we are reprimanded not to give into the mistaken Customs of our Country. But at the same time, I cannot but think it a Reproach worse than that of common Swearing, that the Idle and the Abandoned are suffered in the Name of Heaven and all that is Our idle poor till the time of Henry VIII lived upon alms. After the dissolution of the monasteries experiments were made for their cure, and by a statute 43 Eliz. overseers were appointed and Parishes charged to maintain their helpless poor and find work for the sturdy. In Queen Anne's time the Poor Law had been made more intricate and troublesome by the legislation on the subject that had been introduced after the Restoration.

*Langnam fac aut iustitia iudicium favorem,
Aut Deus ille nalis hominum natescere discat
Virg*

I SHALL, in this Paper, discharge myself of the Promise I have made to the Publick, by obliging them with a Translation of the little Greek Manuscript, which is said to have been a Piece of those Records that were preserved in the Temple of Apollo, upon the Promontory of Leucate. It is a short History of the Lover's Leap, and is inscribed, An Account of Persons Male and Female, who offered up their Vows in the Temple of the Pythian Apollo, in the forty sixth Olympiad, as it leaped from the Promontory of Leucate into the Ionian Sea, in order to cure themselves of the Passion of Love.

This Account is very dry in many Parts, as only mentioning the Name of the Lover who leaped, the Person he leaped for, and relating, in short, that he was either cured, or killed, or married by the Fall. It indeed gives the Names of so many who died by it, that it would have looked like a Bill of Mortality, had I translated it at full length. I have therefore made an Abridgement of it, and only extracted such particular Passages as have something extraordinary, either in the Case, or in the Cure, or in the Fate of the Person who is mentioned in it. After this short Preface take the Account is follows.

Battus, the Son of Metastus the Sicilian, leaped for Aminta the Musonian. Got rid of his Passion with the Loss of his Right Leg and Arm, which were broken in the Fall.

Melissa, in Love with Daphnis, very much bruised, but escaped with Life.

Cynisca, the Wife of Aschines, being in Love with Lyceus; and Aschines her Husband being in Love with Larissa, (which had made this married Couple very uneasy to one another for several Years) both the Husband and the Wife took the Leap by Consent, they both of them escaped, and have lived very happily together ever since.

Larissa, a Virgin of Thessaly, deserted by Plexippus, after a Courtship of three Years, she stood upon the Brow of the Promontory for some time, and after having thrown down a Ring, a Bracelet, and a little Picture, with other Presents which she had received from Plexippus, she threw herself into the Sea, and was taken up alive.

N B Larissa, before she leaped, made an Offering of a Silver Cupid in the Temple of Apollo.

Simetha, in Love with Daphnis the Myndian, perished in the Fall.

Charaxus, the Brother of Sappho, in Love with Rhodope the Coniarcian, having spent his whole Estate upon her, was advised by his Sister to leap in the Beginning of his Amour, but would not hearken to her till he was reduced to his last Lament, being forsaken by Rhodope, at length resolved to take the Leap. Perished in it.

Ardeus, a beautiful Youth of Epirus, in Love with Praxinos, the Wife of Thespius, escaped without Damage, saving only that two of his Fore-Teeth were struck out and his Nose a little flatted.

Cleora, a Widow of Ephesus, being inconsolable for the Death of her Husband, was resolved to take this Leap in order to get rid of her Passion for his Memory, but being arrived at the Promontory, she there met with Dimmachus the Miletian, and after a short Conversation with him, laid aside the Thoughts of her Leap, and married him in the Temple of Apollo.

N B Her Widow's Weeds are still to be seen hanging up in the Western Corner of the Temple.

Olphis, the Fisherman, having received a Box on the Ear from Thersites the Day before, and being determined to have no more to do with her, leaped, and escaped with Life.

Atalanta, an old Maid, whose Cruelty had several Years before driven two or three despairing Lovers to this Leap, being now in the fifty fifth Year of her Age, and in Love with an Officer of Sparta, broke her Neck in the Fall.

Hipparchus being passionately fond of his own Wife who was enamoured of Bathylus, leaped, and died of his Fall, upon which his Wife married her Gallant.

Tettyx, the Dancing-Master, in Love with Olympia an Athenian Matron, threw himself from the Rock with great Agility, but was crippled in the Fall.

Diagoras, the Usurer, in Love with his Cool-Maid, he peeped several times over the Precipice, but his Heart misgiving him, he went back, and married her that Evening.

Cineadus, after having entered his own Name in the Pythian Records, being asked the Name of the Person whom he leaped for, and being ashamed to discover it, he was set aside, and not suffered to leap.

Eunice, a Maid of Paphos, aged Nineteen, in Love with Eurybates Hurt in the Fall, but recovered.

N B This was her second Time of Leaping. Hesperus, a young Man of Laricum, in Love with his Master's Daughter Drowned, the Boats not coming in soon enough to his Relief.

Sappho, the Lesbian, in Love with Platon, arrived at the Temple of Apollo, habited like a Bride in Garments as white as Snow. She wore a Garland of Myrtle on her Head, and carried in her Hand the little Musical Instrument of her own Invention. After having sung an Hymn to Apollo, she hung up her Garland on one Side of his Altar, and her Harp on the other. She then took'd up her Vestments, like a Spartan Virgin, and amidst thousands of Spectators, who were anxious for her Safety, and offered up Vows for her Deliverance, [marched<sup>2</sup>] directly forwards to the utmost Summit of the Promontory, where after having repeated a Stanza of her own Verses, which we could not hear, she threw herself off the Rock with such an Intrepidity as was never before observed in any who had attempted that dangerous Leap. Many who were present related, that they saw her fall into the Sea, from whence she never rose again, tho' there were others who affirmed, that she never came to the Bottom of her Leap, but that she was changed into a Swan as she fell, and that they saw her hovering in the Air under that Shape. But whether or no the Whiteness and Fluttering of her Garments might not deceive those who looked upon her, or whether she might not really be metamorphosed into that musical and melancholy Bird, is still a Doubt among the Lesbians.

Alcaeus, the famous Lyric Poet, who had for some time been passionately in Love with Sappho, arrived at the Promontory of Leucaea that very Evening, in order to take the Leap upon her Account, but hearing that Sappho had been there before him, and that her Body could be no where found, he very generously lamented her Fall, and is said to have written his hundred and twenty fifth Ode upon that Occasion.

YOU very often hear People, after a Story has been told with some entertaining Circumstances, tell it over again with Particulars that destroy the Jest, but give Light into the Truth of the Narration. This sort of Veracity, though it is unpertinent, has something unnaive in it, because it proceeds from the Love of Truth, even in frivolous Occasions. If such honest Amendments do not promise an agreeable Companion, they do a sincere Friend for which Reason one should allow them so much of our Time, if we fall into their Company, as to set us right in Matters that can do us no manner of Harm, whether the Facts be one Way or the other. Lies which are told out of Arrogance and Ostentation a Man should detect in his own Defence, because he should not be triumphed over, Lies which are told out of Malice he should expose, both for his own sake and that of the rest of Mankind, because every Man should rise against a common Enemy. But the officious Lar many have argued is to be excused, because it does some Man good, and no Man hurt. The Man who made more than ordinary speed from a Light in which the Athenians were beaten, and told them they had obtained a complete Victory, and put the whole City into the utmost Joy and Exultation, was check'd by the Magistrates for his Falshood, but excus'd himself by saying, O Athenians! am I your Enemy because I gave you two happy Days? This Fellow did to a whole People what an Acquaintance of mine does every Day he lives in some eminent Degree to particular Persons. He is ever lying People into good Humour, and, as Plato said, it was allowable in Physicians to lie to their Patients to keep up their Spirits, I am half doubtful whether my Friend's Behaviour is not as excusable. His Manner is to express himself surpris'd at the Cheerful Countenance of a Man whom he observes diffident of himself and generally by that means makes his Lie a Truth. He will, as if he did not know any [thing] of the Circumstance, ask one whom he knows at Variance with another, what is the meaning that Mr. such a one, naming his Adversary, does not apprise him with that Heartiness which formerly he has heard him? He said indeed, (continues he) I would rather have that Man for my Friend than my Man in England, but for an Enemy—I thus melts the Person he talks to, who expected nothing but downright Rallery from that Side. According as he sees his Practices succeeded, he goes to the opposite Party, and tells him, he cannot imagine how it happens that some People know one another so little, you spoke with so much Coldness of a Gentleman who said more Good of you, than, let me tell you, my Man living deserves. The Success of one of these Incidents was, that the next time that one of the Adversaries spied the other, he hems after him in the publick Street, and they must crack a Bottle at the next Tavern, that used to turn out of the other's Way to avoid one another's Eyeshot. He will tell one Beauty she was commended by another, nay, he will say she gave the Woman he speaks to, the Preference in a Particular for which she herself is admired. The pleasantest Confusion imaginable is made through the whole Town by my Friend's indirect Offices, you shall have a Visit returned after half a Year's Absence, and mutual Railing at each other every Day of that Time. They meet with a thousand Lamentations for so long a Separation, each Party naming herself for the greater Delinquent, if the other can possibly be so good as to forgive her, which she has no Reason in the World, but from the Knowledge of her Goodness, to hope for. Very often a whole Train of Railers of each Side ure their Horses in setting Matters right which they have said during the War between the Parties and a whole Circle of Acquaintance are put into a thousand pleasing Passions and Sentiments, instead of the Pangs of Anger, Envy, Detraction, and Malice.

The worst Evil I ever observed this Man's Falshood occasion, has been that he turned Detraction into Flattery. He is well skilled in the Manners of the World, and by over-looking what Men really are, he grounds his Artifice upon what they have a Mind to be. Upon this Foundation, if two distant Friends are brought together, and the Cement seems to be weak, he never rests till he finds new Apparances to take off all Remains of Ill-will, and that by new Misunderstandings they are thoroughly reconciled.

To the SPECTATOR

Devonshire, Nov. 14, 1711

SIR,
There arriv'd in this Neighbourhood two Days ago one of your grey Gentlemen of the Town, who being attended at his Entry with a Servant of his own, besides a Countryman he had taken up for a Guide, excited the Curiosity of the Village to learn whence and what he might be. The Countryman (to whom they applied as most easy of Access) knew little more than that the Gentleman came from London to travel and see Fashions, and was, as he heard say, a Free thinker. What Religion that might be, he could not tell and for his own Part, if they had not told him the Man was a Free thinker, he should have guessed, by his way of talking, he was little better than a Heathen, excepting only that he had been a good Gentleman to him, and made him drunk twice in one Day, over and above what they had bargained for.

I do not look upon the Simplicity of this, and several odd Inquiries with which I shall not trouble you to be wonder'd at, much less can I think that our Yonths of fine Wit, and enlarged Understandings, have any Reason to blush. There is no Necessity that every Squire in Great Britain should know what the Word Free-thinker stands for but it were much to be wished, that they who value themselves upon that conceited Title were a little better instructed in what it ought to stand for, and that they could not persuade themselves a Man is really and truly a Free thinker in any tolerable Sense, merely by virtue of his being an Atheist, or an Infidel of any other Distinction. It may be doubted, with good Reason, whether there ever was in Nature a more abject slavish, and bigotted Generation than the Tribe of Beaux Esprits, at present so prevailing in this Island. Their Pretension to be Free thinkers, is no other than Rakes have to be Free livers, and Scurvies to be Free-men, that is, they can think whatever they have a Mind to, and give themselves up to whatever Convent the Extravagancy of their Inclination, or their Fancy, shall suggest, they can think as wildly as they talk and act, and will not endure that their Wit should be controuled by such formal Things as Decency and common Sense Deduction, Coherence, Consistency, and all the Rules of Reason they recordingly disdain, as too precise and mechanical for Men of a liberal Education.

This, as far as I could ever learn from their Writings, or my own Observation, is a true Account of the British Free thinker. Our Visitant here, who gave occasion to this Paper, has brought with him a new System of common Sense, the Particulars of which I am not yet acquainted with, but will lose no Opportunity of informing my self whether it contrain any [thing] worth Mr SPECTATOR'S Notice. In the mean time, Sir, I cannot but think it would be for the

THERE is nothing which lies more within the Province of a Spectator than publick Shows and Diversions, and as among these there are none which can pretend to vie with those elegant Entertainments that are exhibited in our Theatres, I think it particularly incumbent on me to take Notice of every thing that is remarkable in such numerous and refined Assemblies

It is observed, that of late Years there has been a certain Person in the upper Gallery of the Play house, who when he is pleased with any Thing that is acted upon the Stage, expresses his Approbation by a loud Knock upon the Benches or the Wainscot, which may be heard over the whole Theatre. This Person is commonly known by the Name of the Trunk-maker in the upper Gallery. Whether it be, that the Blow he gives on these Occasions resembles that which is often heard in the Shops of such Artizans, or that he was supposed to have been a real Trunk maker, who after the finishing of his Day's Work used to unbend his Mind at these publick Diversions with his Hammer in his Hand, I cannot certainly tell. There are some, I know, who have been foolish enough to imagine it is a Spirit which haunts the upper Gallery, and from Time to Time makes those strange Noises and the rather, because he is observed to be louder than ordinary every Time the Ghost of Hamlet appears. Others have reported, that it is a dumb Man, who has chosen this Way of uttering himself when he is transported with any Thing he sees or hears. Others will have it to be the Play-house Thunderer, that exerts himself after this Manner in the upper Gallery, when he has nothing to do upon the Roof.

But having made it my Business to get the best Information I could in a Matter of this Moment I find that the Trunk-maker, as he is commonly called, is a large black Man, whom no body knows. He generally leans forward on a huge Oak Plant with great Attention to every thing that passes upon the Stage. He is never seen to smile but upon hearing any thing that pleases him, he takes up his Staff with both Hands, and lays it upon the next Piece of Timber that stands in his Way with exceeding Violence. After which, he composes himself in his former Posture, till such Time as something new sets him again at Work.

It has been observed, his Blow is so well timed, that the most judicious Critick could never except at it. As soon as any shining Thought is expressed in the Poet, or any uncommon Grace appears in the Actor, he smites the Bench or Wainscot. If the Audience does not concur with him, he smites a second Time, and if the Audience is not yet awaked, looks round him with great Wrath, and repeats the Blow a third Time, which never fails to produce the Clap. He sometimes lets the Audience begin the Clap of themselves, and at the Conclusion of their Applause ratifies it with a single Thwack.

He is of so great Use to the Play-house, that it is said a former Director of it, upon his not being able to pry his Attendance by reason of Sickness, kept one in Pay to officiate for him till such time as he recovered; but the Person so employed, tho' he laid about him with incredible Violence, did it in such wrong Places, that the Audience soon found out that it was not their old Friend the Trunk-maker.

It has been remarked, that he has not yet exerted himself with Vigour this Season. He sometimes plies at the Opera and upon Nicolini's first Appearance, was said to have demolished three Benches in the Fury of his Applause. He has broken half a dozen Oak Plants upon Dogget's, and seldom goes away from a Tragedy of Shakespeare, without leaving the Wainscot extremely shattered.

The Players do not only connive at his obsequious Approbation, but very cheerfully repair at their own Cost whatever Damages he makes. They had once a Thought of erecting a Kind of Wooden Anvil for his Use that should be made of a very sounding Plank, in order to render his Stricks more deep and mellow, but as this might not have been distinguished from the Musick of a Kettle Drum, the Project was laid aside.

In the mean while, I cannot but take notice of the great Use it is to an Audience, that a Person should thus preside over their Heads like the Director of a Consort, in order to awaken their Attention, and beat time to their Applauses, or, to raise my Simile, I have sometimes fancied the Trunk maker in the upper Gallery to be like Virgil's Ruler of the Wind, seated upon the Top of a Mountain, who, when he struck his Sceptre upon the Side of it, roused an Hurricane, and set the whole Cavern in an Uproar.

It is certain, the Trunk maker has saved many a good Play, and brought many a graceful Actor into Reputation, who would not otherwise have been taken notice of. It is very visible, the Audience is not a little abashed, if they find themselves betrayed into a Clap, when their Friend in the upper Gallery does not come into it: so the Actors do not value themselves upon the Clap, but regard it as a meer Brutum fulmen, or empty Noise, when it has not the Sound of the Oak Plant in it. I know it has been given out by those who are Enemies to the Trunk-maker, that he has sometimes been bribed to be in the Interest of a bad Poet, or a vicious Player, but this is a Surmise which has no foundation. His Strokes are always just, and his Admonitions reasonable, he does not deal about his Blows at Random, but always hits the right Nail upon the Head. [The] inexpressible Force wherewith he lays them on, sufficiently shows the Evidence and Strength of his Conviction. His Zeal for a good Author is indeed outrageous, and breaks down every Fence and Partition, every Board and Plank, that stands within the Expression of his Applause.

As I do not care for terminating my Thoughts in barren Speculations, or in Reports of pure Matter of Fact, without drawing something from them for the Advantage of my Countrymen, I shall take the Liberty to make an humble Proposal, that whenever the Frink-maker shall deprivt this Life, or whenever he shall have lost the Spring of his Arm by Sickness, old Age, Infirmary, or the like, some able-bodied Critick should be advanced to this Post, and have a competent Salary settled on him for Life, to be furnished with Bamboos for Operas, Crabtree Cudgels for Comedies, and Oakn Plants for Tragedy, at the publick Expence. And to the End that this Place should be always disposed of according to Merit, I would have none preferred to it, who has not given convincing Proofs both of a sound Judgment and a strong Arm, and who could not, upon Occasion, either knock down an Ox, or write a Comment upon Homer's Art of Poetry. In short, I would have him a due Composition of Hercules and Apollo, and so rightly qualified for this important Office, that the Frink-maker may not be missed by our Posterity.

MR SPECTATOR,

YOU have not spoken in so direct a manner upon the Subject of Marriage as that important Case deserves. It would not be improper to observe upon the Peculiarity in the Youth of Great Britain, of ruling and laughing at that Institution and when they fall into it, from a profligate Habit of Mind, being insensible of the [Satisfaction] in that Way of Life, and treating their Wives with the most barbarous Disrespect. Particular Circumstances and Cast of Temper, must teach a Man the Probability of mighty Un easiness in that State, (for unquestionably some there are whose very Dispositions are strangely averse to conjugal Friendship) but no one, I believe, is by his own natural Complexion prompted to tease and torment another for no Reason but being nearly allied to him. And can there be any thing more base, or serve to sink a Man so much below his own distinguishing Characteristick, (I mean Reason) than treating Evil for Good in so open a Manner, as that of treating an helpless Creature with Unkindness, who has had so good an Opinion of him as to believe what he said relating to one of the greatest Concerns of Life, by delivering her Happiness in this World to his Care and Protection? Must not that Man be abandoned even to all manner of Humanity, who can deceive a Woman with Appearances of Affection and Kindness, for no other End but to torment her with more Ease and Authority? Is any Thing more unlike a Gentleman, than when his Honour is engaged for the performing his Promises, because nothing but that can oblige him to it, to become afterwards false to his Word, and be alone the Occasion of Misery to one whose Happiness he but lately pretended was dearer to him than his own? Ought such a one to be trusted in his common Affairs? or treated but as one whose Honesty consisted only in his Incapacity of being otherwise?

There is one Cause of this Usage no less absurd than common, which takes place among the more unthinking Men, and that is the Desire to appear to their Friends free and at Liberty, and without those Trammels they have so much ridiculed. [To avoid] this they fly into the other Extream, and grow Tyrants that they may seem Masters. Because an uncontrollable Command of their own Action, is a certain Sign of entire Dominion, they won't so much as recede from the Government even in one Muscle of their Faces. A kind Look they believe would be fawning, and a civil Answer yielding the Superiority. To this must we attribute an Auste- rity they betray in every Action. What but this can put a Man out of Humour in his Wife's Company, tho' he is so distinguishingly pleasant every where else? The Bitterness of his Replies, and the Severity of his Frowns to the tenderest of Wives, clearly demonstrate, that an ill grounded Fear of being thought too submissive, is at the Bottom of this, as I am willing to call it, affected Moroseness. But if it be such only, put on to convince his Acquaintance of his entire Dominion let him take Care of the Consequence, which will be certain, and worse than the present Evil, his seeming Indifference will by Degrees grow into real Contempt, and if it doth not wholly alienate the Affections of his Wife forever from him, make both him and her more miserable than if it really did so.

However inconsistent it may appear, to be thought a well bred Person has no small Share in this clownish Behaviour. A Discourse therefore relating to good Breeding towards a loving and a tender Wife, would be of great Use to this Sort of Gentlemen. Could you but once convince them, that to be civil at least is not beneath the Character of a Gentleman, nor even tender Affection towards one who would make it reciprocal, betrays any Softness or Effeminacy that the most masculine Disposition need be ashamed of, could you satisfy them of the Gen-

<sup>1</sup> [For this Reason should they appear the least like what they were so much used to laugh at, they would become the Jest of themselves, and the Object of that Railery they formerly bestowed on others. To avoid]

'erosity of voluntary Civility, and the Greatness of Soul that is conspicuous in Benevolence without immediate Obligations, could you recommend to People's Practice the Srying of the Gentleman quoted in one of your Speculations, That he thought it incumbent upon him to make the Inclinations of a Woman of Merit go along with her Duty Could you, I say, persuade these Men of the Beauty and Reasonableness of this Sort of Behaviour, I have so much Charity for some of them at least, to believe you would convince them of a Thing they are only ashamed to allow Besides, you would recommend that State in its truest, and consequently its most agreeable Colours, and the Gentlemen who have for any Time been such professed Enemies to it, when Occasion should serve, would return you their Thanks for assisting their Interest in prevailing over their Prejudices Marriage in general would by this Means be a more easy and comfortable Condition, the Husband would be no where so well satisfied as in his own Parlour, nor the Wife so pleasant as in the Company of her Husband A Desire of being agreeable in the Lover would be increased in the Husband, and the Mistress be more amiable by becoming the Wife Besides all which, I am apt to believe we should find the Race of Men grow wiser as their Progenitors grew kinder, and the Affection of the Parents would be conspicuous in the Wisdom of their Children in short, Men would in general be much better humoured than they are, did not they so frequently exercise the worst Turns of their Temper where they ought to exert the best

MR SPECTATOR,

'I am a Woman who left the Admiration of this whole Town, to throw myself ([for'] Love of Wealth) into the Arms of a Fool When I married him, I could have had any one of several Men of Sense who inguished for me but my Case is just I believed my superior Understanding would form him into a tractable Creature But, alas, my Spouse has Cunning and Suspicion, the inseparable Companions of little Minds and every Attempt I make to divert, by putting on an agreeable Air, a sudden Cheerfulness, or kind Behaviour, he looks upon as the first Act towards an Insurrection against his undevoted Dominion over me Let every one who is still to chuse, and hopes to govern a Fool, remember

IT is very reasonable to believe, that Part of the Pleasure which happy Minds shall enjoy in a future State, will arise from an enlarged Contemplation of the Divine Wisdom in the Government of the World, and a Discovery of the secret and amazing Steps of Providence, from the Beginning to the End of Time Nothing seems to be an Entertainment more adapted to the Nature of Man, if we consider that Curiosity is one of the strongest and most lasting Appetites implanted in us, and that Admiration is one of our most pleasing Passions and what a perpetual Succession of Enjoyments will be afforded to both these, in a Scene so large and various as shall then be laid open to our View in the Society of superior Spirits, who perhaps will join with us in so delightful a Prospect

It is not impossible, on the contrary, that Part of the Punishment of such as are excluded from Bliss, may consist not only in their being denied this Privilege, but in having their Appetites at the same time vastly encreased, without any Satisfaction afforded to them In these, the vain Pursuit of Knowledge shall, perhaps, add to their Infelicity, and bewilder them into Labyrinths of Error, Darkness, Distracution and Uncertainty of every thing but their own evil State Milton has thus represented the fallen Angels reasoning together in a kind of Respite from their Torments, and creating to themselves a new Disquiet amidst their very Amusements he could not properly have described the Sports of condemned Spirits, without that Cast of Horror and Melancholy he has so judiciously mingled with them

In our present Condition, which is a middle State, our Minds are, as it were, chequered with Truth and Falshood, and as our Faculties are narrow, and our Views imperfect, it is impossible but our Curiosity must meet with many Repulses The Business of Mankind in this Life being rather to act than to know, their Portion of Knowledge is dealt to them accordingly

From hence it is, that the Reason of the Inquisitive has so long been exercised with Difficulties, in accounting for the promiscuous Distribution of Good and Evil to the Virtuous and the Wicked in this World. From hence come all those pathetic Complaints of so many tragical Events, which happen to the Wise and the Good and of such surprising Prosperity, which is often the Lot of the Guilty and the Foolish, that Reason is sometimes puzzled, and at a loss what to pronounce upon so mysterious a Dispensation.

Plato expresses his Abhorrence of some Fables of the Poets, which seem to reflect on the Gods as the Authors of Injustice, and lays it down as a Principle, That whatever is permitted to befall a just Man, whether Poverty, Sickness, or any of those Things which seem to be Evils, shall either in Life or Death conduce to his Good. My Reader will observe how agreeable this Maxim is to what we find delivered by a greater Authority. Seneca has written a Discourse purposely on this Subject, in which he takes Pains, after the Doctrine of the Stoicks, to shew that Adversity is not in itself an Evil, and mentions a noble Saying of Demetrius, That nothing would be more unhappy than a Man who had never known Affliction. He compares Prosperity to the Indulgence of a fond Mother to a Child, which often proves his Ruin, but the Affection of the Divine Being to that of a wise Father who would have his Sons exercised with Labour, Disappointment, and Pain, that they may gather Strength, and improve their Fortitude. On this Occasion the Philosopher rises into the celebrated Sentiment, That there is not on Earth a Spectator more worthy the Regard of a Creator intent on his Works than a brave Man superior to his Sufferings, to which he adds, That it must be a Pleasure to Jupiter himself to look down from Heaven, and see Cato amidst the Ruins of his Country preserving his Integrity.

Thus Thought will appear yet more reasonable, if we consider human Life as a State of Probation, and Adversity as the Post of Honour in it, assigned often to the best and most select Spirits.

But what I would chiefly insist on here, is, that we are not at present in a proper Situation to judge of the Counsels by which Providence acts, since but little arrives at our Knowledge, and even that little we discern imperfectly, or according to the elegant Figure in Holy Writ. We see but in part, and as in a Glass darkly [It is to be considered, that Providence<sup>3</sup>] in its Oeconomy regards the whole System of Time and Things together, [so that] we cannot discover the beautiful Connection between Incidents which he widely separated in Time, and by losing so many Links of the Chain, our Reasonings become broken and imperfect. Thus those Parts in the moral World which have not an absolute, may yet have a relative Beauty, in respect of some other Parts concealed from us, but open to his Eye before whom Past, Present, and To come, are set together in one Point of View and those Events, the Permission of which seems now to accuse his Goodness, may in the Consummation of Things both magnify his Goodness, and exalt his Wisdom. And this is enough to check our Presumption, since it is in vain to apply our Measures of Regularity to Matters of which we know neither the Antecedents nor the Consequents, the Beginning nor the End.

I shall relieve my Reader from this abstracted Thought, by relating here a Jewish Tradition concerning Moses,<sup>1</sup> which seems to be a kind of Parable, illustrating what I have last mentioned. That great Prophet, it is said, was called up by a Voice from Heaven to the top of a Mountain, where, in a Conference with the Supreme Being, he was permitted to propose to him some Questions concerning his Administration of the Universe. In the midst of this Divine [Colloquy] he was commanded to look down on the Plain below. At the Foot of the Mount on there issued out a clear Spring of Water, at which a Soldier alighted from his Horse to drink. He was no sooner gone than a little Boy came to the same Place, and finding a Purse of Gold which the Soldier had dropped, took it up and went away with it. Immediately after this came an infirm old Man, weary with Age and Travelling, and having quenched his Thirst, sat down to rest himself by the Side of the Spring. The Soldier missing his Purse returns to search for it, and demands it of the old Man, who affirms he had not seen it, and appeals to Heaven in witness of his Innocence. The Soldier not believing his Protestations, kills him. Moses fell on his Face with Horror and Amusement, when the Divine Voice thus prevented his Expostulation. 'Be not surprised, Moses, nor ask why the Judge of the whole Earth has suffered this Thing to come to pass. The Child is the Occasion that the Blood of the old Man is spilt but know, that the old Man whom thou saw'st, was the Murderer of that Child's Father.'

—So softens and disarms the Mind,
That not one Arrow can Resistance find

First we flatter ourselves, and then the flattery of others is sure of Success. It awakens our Self Love within, a Party which is ever ready to revolt from our better Judgment, and join the Luxury without. Hence it is that the Profession of Favourites we suffer see poured upon the Private, are represented to us, by our Self Love, as Justice done to Man, who so agreeably recommends us to our selves. When we are overcome by such soft Insinuations and ensuring Compliances, we gladly recompense the Artifices that are made use of to blind our Reason, and which triumph over the Weaknesses of our Temper and Inclinations.

But were every Man persuaded from how mean and low a Principle this Passions is derived there can be no doubt but the Person who should attempt to gratify it, would then be as contemptible as he is now successful. 'Tis the Desire of some Quality we are not possessed of, or Inclination to be something we are not, which are the Causes of our giving ourselves up to that Man, who bestows upon us the Characters and Qualities of others, which perhaps suit us as ill and were as little design'd for our wearing, as their Cloaths. Instead of going out of our own contemplational Nature into that of others, 'twere a better and more laudable Industry to improve our own, and instead of a miserable Copy become a good Original for there is no Temper, no Disposition so rude and untractable, but may in its own peculiar Cast and Turn be brought to some agreeable Use in Conversation, or in the Affairs of Life. A Person of a rougher Deportment, and less tied up to the usual Ceremonies of Behaviour, will, like Hanly in the Play, please by the Grace which Nature gives to every Action wherein she is complied with. The Brisk and Lively will not want their Admirers, and even a more reserved and melancholy Temper may at some times be agreeable.

When there is not Vanity enough awake in a Man to undo him, the flatterer stirs up that dormant Weakness and inspires him with Merit enough to be a Coxcomb. But if Flattery be the most sordid Act that can be complied with, the Art of Praising justly is as commendable. For 'tis laudable to praise well as Poets at one and the same time give Immortality, and receive it themselves for a Reward. Both are pleased, the one whilst he receives the Recompence of Merit, the other whilst he shows he knows how to discern it. But above all, that Man is happy in this Art, who, like a skilful Painter, returns the Features and Complexion, but still softens the Picture into the most agreeable Likeness.

There can hardly, I believe, be imagin'd a more desirable Pleasure, than that of Praise unmix'd with any Possibility of Flattery. Such was that which Germanicus enjoyed, when, the Night before a Battle, desirous of some sincere Mark of the Esteem of his Legions for him, he is described by Tacitus listening in a Disguise to the Discourse of a Soldier, and wrapt up in the Imagination of his Glory, whilst with an undesign'd Similarity they praised his unble and majestic Mien, his Affability, his Valour, Conduct, and Success in War. How must a Man have his Heart full blown with Joy in such an Article of Glory as this? What a Spirit and Encouragement still to proceed in those Steps which he had already brought him to so pure a Taste of the greatest of mortal Enjoyments?

It sometimes happens, that even Enemies and envious Persons bestow the sincerest Marks of Esteem when they least design it. Such afford a greater Pleasure, as extorted by Merit, and freed from all Suspicion of Flattery or Flattery. Thus it is with Malvolio, he has Wit, Learning, and Discernment, but temper'd with an Alloy of Envy, Self Love and Detraction. Malvolio turns pale at the Mirth and good Humour of the Company, if it center not in his Person. He grows jealous and dispirited when he ceases to be the only Person admired, and looks upon the Commendations paid to another as a Detraction from his Merit, and an Attempt to lessen the Superiority he affects. But by this very Method, he bestows such Praise as can never be suspected of Flattery. His Unrests and Distracts are so many sure and certain Signs of another's Title to that Glory he desires, and has the Satisfaction to find himself not possessed of.

A good Name is fitly compared to a precious Ointment,<sup>1</sup> and when we are praised with Skill and Decency 'tis indeed the most agreeable Perfume, but if too strongly admitted into a Brain of a less vigorous and happy Texture, 'twill, like too strong an Odour, overcome the Senses, and prove pernicious in those Nerves was intended to refresh. A generous Mind is of all others the most sensible of Praise and Dispraise, and a noble Spirit is as much invigorated with its due Proportion of Honour and Applause, as is depressed by Neglect and Contempt. But 'tis only Persons far above the common Level who are thus affected with either of these Extremes, as in a Thermometer, 'tis only the purest and most sublimated Spirit that is either contracted or diluted by the Benignity or Inequality of the Season.

MR SPECTATOR,

The Translations which you have lately given us from the Greek, in some of your last Papers, have been the Occasion of my looking into some of these Authors among whom I chanc'd on a Collection of Letters which pass under the Name of Aristotelus of all the Remains of Antiquity, I believe there can be nothing produced of in Air so gallant and polite as each Letter contains a little Novel or Adventure, which is told with all the Beauties of Language and heightened with a Lavishment of Wit. There are several of them translated,<sup>2</sup> but with such wide Deviations from

<sup>2</sup> In a volume of translated 'Letters on Wit, 'Politics' and Morality, edited by Abel Boyer, in 1701. The letters ascribed to Aristotelus of Nice in Bithynia who died A.D. 358, but which were written after the fifth century, were afterwards translated as 'Letters of Love and Gallantry, written in Greek by Aristotelus.' This volume, 12mo (1715), was dedicated to Laurence Budge, who is 'the Original, and in a Style so far differing from the Authors, that the Translator seems rather to have taken Hints for the expressing his own Sense and Thoughts, than to have endeavoured to render those of Aristanetus. In the following Translation, I have kept as near the Meaning of the Greek as I could, and have only added a few Words to make the Sentences in English fit together a little better than they would otherwise have done. The Story seems to be taken from that of Pygmalion and the Statue in Ovid. Some of the Thoughts are of the same Turn, and the whole is written in a kind of Poetical Prose

Philomax to Clorion

"Never was Man more overcome with so fantastical a Passion as mine. I have painted a beautiful Woman, and am desirous, dying for the Picture. My own Skill has undone me. 'Tis not the Dirt of Veris, but my own Pencil has thus wounded me. Ah me! with what Anxiety am I necessitated to adore my own Idol! How miserable am I, whilst every one must as much pity the Painter as he praises the Picture and own my Torment more than equal to my Art. But why do I thus complain? Have there not been more unhappy and unnatural Passions than mine? Yes, I have seen the Representations of Phedra, Narcissus, and Passiflora. Phedra was unhappy in her Love; that of Passiflora was more rous, and whilst the other caught at his beloved Likeness, he destroyed the waters Image, which ever eluded his Embraces. The Fountain represented Narcissus to himself, and the Picture both that and him, thrusting after his adored Image. But I am yet less unhappy, I enjoy her Presence continually, and if I touch her, I destroy not the beautiful Form, but she looks pleased, and a sweet Smile sits in the charming Space which divides her Lips. One would swear that voice and Speech were issuing out, and that one's Ears felt the melodious Sound. How often have I, deceived by a Lover's Credulity, hearkened if she had not something to whisper me? and when frustrated of my Hopes, how often have I taken my Revenge in Kisses from her Cheeks and Eyes, and softly wooed her to my Embrace, whilst she (as to me it seem'd) only, withheld her Tongue the more to inflame me. But, Madman that I am, shall I be thus taken with the Representation only of a beautiful Face, and flowing Hair, and thus waste myself and melt to Tears for a Shadow? Ah, sure 'tis something more, 'tis a Reality! for see her Beauties shine out with new Lustre, and she seems to upbraid me with such unkind Reproaches. Oh may I have a living Mistress of this Form, that when I shall compare the Work of Nature with that of Art, I may be still at a loss which to choose, and be long perplex'd with the pleasing Uncertainty.

Bella, horrida bella!—Virg

I HAVE sometimes amused myself with considering the several Methods of managing a Debate which have obtained in the World

The first Races of Mankind used to dispute, as our ordinary People do now-a-days, in a kind of wild Logic, uncultivated by Rules of Art

Socrates introduced a catechetical Method of Arguing. He would ask his Adversary Question upon Question, till he had convinced him out of his own Mouth that his Opinions were wrong. This Way of Debating drives an Enemy up into a Corner, seizes all the Passes through which he can make an Escape, and forces him to surrender at Discretion

Aristotle changed this Method of Attack, and invented a great Variety of little Weapons, call'd Syllogisms. As in the Socratic Way of Dispute you agree to every thing which your Opponent advances, in the Aristotelick you are still denying and contradicting some Part or other of what he says. Socrates conquers you by Stratagem, Aristotle by Force. The one takes the Town by Saps, the other Sword in Hand

The Universities of Europe, for many Years, carried on the r Debates by Syllogism, insomuch that we see the Knowledge of several Centuries hid out into Objections and Answers, and all the good Sense of the Age cut and minced into almost an Infinitude of Distinctions

When our Universities found that there was no End of Wrangling this Way, they invented a kind of Argument, which is not reducible to any Mood or Figure in Aristotle. It was call'd the Argumentum Basilium (others write it Baculum or Baculi) which is pretty well express'd in our English Word Club Law. When they were not able to confute their Antagonist, they knock'd him down. It was their Method in these polemical Debates, first to discharge their Syllogisms, and afterwards to betake themselves to their Clubs, till such Time as they had one Way or other confounded their Gamblers. There is in Oxford a narrow [Defile,] (to make use of a military Term) where the Partizans used to encounter, for which Reason it still retains the Name of Logic Lane. I have heard an old Gentleman, a Physician, make his Boasts, that when he was a young Fellow he marched several Times at the Head of a Troop of Statists,<sup>2</sup> and cudgel'd a Body of Smuglesians<sup>3</sup>

<sup>2</sup> The followers of the famous scholastic philosopher, Duns Scotus (who taught at Oxford and died in 1308), were Realists, and the Scotists were as Realists opposed to the Nominalists, who, as followers of Thomas Aquinas, were called Thomists. Abuse, in later time, of the followers of Duns gave its present sense to the word Dunce.

<sup>3</sup> The followers of Martin Smiglecius, a Polish Jesuit, who taught Philosophy for four years and Theology for ten years at Vilna, in Lithuania, and died at Krich in 1618. Besides theological works he published a book of Disputations upon Logic.

half the length of High street, 'till they had dispersed themselves for Shelter into their respective Garrisons

This Humour, I find, went very far in Erasmus's Time For that Author tells us, 'That upon the Revival of Greek Letters, most of the Universities in Europe were divided into Greeks and Trojans The latter were those who bore a mortal Enmity to the Language of the Greeks, inasmuch that if they met with any who understood it, they did not fail to treat him as a Foe Erasmus himself had, it seems, the Misfortune to fall into the Hands of a Party of Trojans, who laid him on with so many Blows and Buffets that he never forgot their Hostilities to his dying Day

There is a way of managing an Argument not much unlike the former, which is made use of by States and Communities, when they draw up a hundred thousand Disputants on each Side, and convince one another by Dint of Sword A certain Grand Monarch<sup>2</sup> was so sensible of his Strength in this way of Reasoning, that he writ upon his Great Guns—Ratio ultima Regum, The Logic of Kings, but, God be thanked, he is now pretty well baffled at his own Weapons When one has to do with a Philosopher of this kind, one should remember the old Gentleman's Saying, who had been engaged in an Argument with one of the Roman Emperors<sup>3</sup> Upon his Friend's telling him, That he wonder'd he would give up the Question, when he had visibly the Better of the Dispute I am never ashamed, says he, to be confuted by one who is Master of fifty Legions

I shall but just mention another kind of Reasoning, which may be called arguing by Poll and another which is of equal Force, in which Wagers are made use of as Arguments, according to the celebrated Line in Hudibras<sup>4</sup>

But the most notable way of managing a Controversy, is that which we may call Arguing by Torture This is a Method of Reasoning which has been made use of with the poor Refugees, and which was so fashionable in our Country during the Reign of Queen Mary, that in a Passage of an Author quoted by Monsieur Bayle,<sup>5</sup> it is said the Price of Wood was raised in England, by reason of the Executions that were made in Smithfield These Disputants convince their Adversaries with a Sorites,<sup>6</sup> commonly called a Pile of Faggots The Rack is also a kind of Syllogism which has been used with good Effect, and has made Multitudes of Converts Men were formerly disputed out of their Doubts, reconciled to Truth by Force of Reason, and won over to Opinions by the Candour, Sense and Ingenuity of those who had the Right on their Side but this Method of Conviction operated too slowly Pam was found to be much more enlightning than Reason Every Scruple was looked upon as Obstinacy, and not to be removed but by several Engines invented for that Purpose In a Word, the Application of Whips, Ricks, Gibbets, Gallies, Dungeons, Fire and Faggot, in a Dispute, may be look'd upon as Popish Refinements upon the old Heathen Logic

There is another way of Reasoning which seldom fails, tho' it be of a quite different Nature to that I have last mentioned I mean, convincing a Man by ready Money, or as it is ordinarily called, bribing a Man to an Opinion This Method has often proved successful, when all the others have been made use of to no purpose A Man who is furnished with Arguments from the Mint, will convince his Antagonist much sooner than one who draws them from Reason and Philosophy Gold is a wonderful Clearer of the Understanding, it dissipates every Doubt and Scruple in an Instant, accommodates itself to the meanest Caprices, silences the Loud and Clamorous, and brings over the most Obstinate and Inflexible Philip of Macedon was a Man of most invincible Reason this Way He resisted by it all the Wisdom of Athenians, confounded their Statesmen, struck their Orators dumb, and at length argued them out of all their Liberties

Having here touched upon the several Methods of Disputing, as they have prevailed in different Ages of the World, I shall very suddenly give my Reader an Account of the whole Art of Caviling which shall be a full and satisfactory Answer to all such Papers and Pamphlets as have yet appeared against the SPECTATOR C

Mr SPECTATOR,

I AM of one of the most genteel Trades in the City, and understand thus much of liberal Education, as to have an ardent Ambition of being useful to Mankind, and to think That the chief End of Being is to this Life I had these good Impressions given me from the handsome Behaviour of a learned, generous, and wealthy Man towards me when I first began the World Some Dissatisfaction between me and my Parents made me enter into it with less Relish of Business than I ought, and to turn off this Uneasiness I gave myself to criminal Pleasures, some Excesses, and a general loose Conduct I know not what the excellent Man above-mentioned saw in me, but he descended from the Superiority of his Wisdom and Merit, to throw himself frequently into my Company This made me soon hope that I had something in me worth cultivating, and his Conversation made me sensible of Satisfaction in a regular Way, which I had never before imagined When he was grown familiar with me, he opened himself like a good Angel, and told me, he had long laboured to ripen me into a Preparation to receive his Friendship and Advice, both which I

ASTERIA

Absence is what the Poets call Death in Love, and has given Occasion to abundance of beautiful Complaints in those Authors who have treated of this Passion in Verse Ovid's Epistles are full of them Ottway's Monimia talks very tenderly upon this Subject<sup>1</sup>

—It was not I and
To leave me like a Turtle, here alone,
To droop and mourn the Absence of my Mate
When thou art from me, every Place is desert
And I, methinks, am savage and forlorn
Thy Presence only 'tis can make me blest, Heal my unequal Mind, and tune my Soul

The Consolations of Lovers on these Occasions are very extraordinary Besides those mentioned by Astoria, there are many other Motives of Comfort, which are made use of by absent Lovers

I remember in one of Scudery's Romances, a Couple of honourable Lovers agreed at their parting to set aside one half Hour in the Day to think of each other during a tedious Absence The Romance tells us, that they both of them punctually observed the Time thus agreed upon and that whatever Company or Business they were engaged in, they left it abruptly as soon as the Clock warned them to retire The Romance further adds, that the Lovers expected the Return of this stated Hour with as much Impatience, as if it had been a real Assignment, and enjoyed an imaginary Happiness that was almost as pleasing to them as what they would have found from a real Meeting It was an inexpressible Satisfaction to these divided Lovers, to be assured that each was at the same time employ'd in the same kind of Contemplation, and making equal Returns of Tenderness and Affection

If I may be allowed to mention a more serious Expedient for the alleviating of Absence, I shall take notice of one which I have known two Persons practise, who joined Religion to that Efficacy of Sentiments with which the Passion of Love generally inspires its Victims This was, at the Return of such an Hour, to offer up a certain Prayer for each other, which they had agreed upon before their Parting The Husband, who is a Man that makes a Figure in the polite World, as well as in his own Family, has often told me, that he could not have supported an Absence of three Years without this Expedient

[Strada, in one of his Prolusions,<sup>2</sup>] gives an Account of a numerical Correspondence between two Friends by the Help of a certain Lordstone, which had such Virtue in it, that if it touched two several Needles, when one of the Needles so touched [began] to move, the other, tho' at never so great a Distance, moved at the same Time, and in the same Manner He tells us, that the two Friends, being each of them possessed of one of these Needles, made a kind of a Dial plate, inscribing it with the four and twenty Letters, in the same manner as the Hours of the Day are marked upon the ordinary Dial plate They then fixed one of the Needles on each of these Plates in such a manner, that it could move round without Impediment, so as to touch any of the four and twenty Letters Upon their Separating from one another into distant Countries, they agreed to withdraw themselves punctually into their Closets at a certain Hour of the Day, and to converse with one another by means of this their Invention Accordingly when they were some hundred Miles asunder, each of them shut himself up in his Closet at the Time appointed, and immediately cast his Eye upon his Dial plate If he had a mind to write any thing to his Friend, he directed his Needle to every Letter that formed the Words which he had occasion for, making a little Pause at the end of every Word or Sentence, to avoid Confusion The Friend, in the mean while, saw his own sympathetical Needle moving of itself to every Letter which that of his Correspondent pointed at By this means they talked together across a whole Continent, and conveyed their Thoughts to one another in an Instant over Cities or Mountains, Seas or Deserts

If Monsieur Scudery, or any other Writer of Romance, had introduced a Necromancer, who is generally in the Train of a Knight-Errant, making a Present to two Lovers of a Couple of those above-mentioned Needles, the Reader would not have been a little pleased to have seen them corresponding with one another when they were guarded by Spies and Watches, or separated by Castles and Adventures

In the mean while, if ever this Invention should be revived or put in practice, I would propose, that upon the Lover's Dial plate there should be written not only the four and twenty Letters, but several entire Words which have always a Place in passionate Epistles, as Flames, Darts, Die, Language, Absence, Cupid, Heart, Eyes, Hang, Drown, and the like. This would very much bridge the Lover's Pains in this way of writing a Letter, as it would enable him to express the most useful and significant Words with a single Touch of the Needle.

Cr titur, ex medio quia res accessit, habere Sudoris minimum. Hor

MR SPECTATOR,
YOUR Speculations do not so generally prevail over Mens Manners as I could wish. A former Paper of yours concerning the Misbehaviour of People, who are necessarily in each others Company in travelling, ought to have been a lasting Admonition against Transgressions of that Kind. But I find the Fate of your Quaker, in meeting with a rude Fellow in a Stage Coach, who entertained two or three Women of us (for there was no Man besides himself) with Language as indecent as was ever heard upon the Water. The impertinent Observations which the Coxcomb made upon our Shame and Confusion were such, that it is an unspeakable Grief to reflect upon them. As much as you have declaimed against Duelling, I hope you will do us the Justice to declare, that if the Brute has Courage enough to send to the Place where he saw us all alight together to get rid of him, there is not one of us but has a Lover who shall revenge the Insult. It would certainly be worth your Consideration, to look into the frequent Misfortunes of this Kind, to which the Modest and Innocent are exposed, by the licentious Behaviour of such as are as much Strangers to good Breeding as to Virtue. Could we avoid hearing what we do not approve, as easily as we can seeing what is disagreeable, there were some Consolation but since [in a Box at a Play,<sup>2</sup>] in an Assembly of Ladies, or even in a Pew at Church it is in the Power of a gross Coxcomb to utter what a Woman cannot avoid hearing, how miserable is her Condition who comes within the Power of such Impertinents? And how necessary is it to repeat Injunctives against such a Behaviour? If the Licentious had not utterly forgot what it is to be modest, they would know that offended Modesty labours under one of the greatest Sufferings to which human Life can be exposed. If one of these Brutes could reflect thus much, tho' they want Shame, they would be moved, by their Pity, to abhor an impudent Behaviour in the Presence of the Chaste and Innocent. If you will oblige us with a Spectator on this Subject and procure it to be pasted against every Stage Coach in Gr. Bt. Britain, as the Law of the Journey, you will highly oblige the whole Sex, for which you have professed so great an Esteem and in particular, the two Ladies my late Fellow-Sufferers, and,

SIR, Your most humble Servant,
Rebecca Ridinghood

MR SPECTATOR,
The Matter which I am now going to send you, is an unhappy Story in Ion Life, and will recommend it self, so that you must excuse the Manner of expressing it. A poor idle drunken Weaver in Spittle-Fields has a faithful laborious Wife, who by her Frugality and Industry had hid by her as much Money as purchased her a Ticket in the present Lottery. She had hid this very privately in the Bottom of a Trunk, and had given her Number to a Friend and Confidant, who had promised to keep the Secret, and bring her News of the Success. The poor Adventurer was one Day gone abroad, when her careless Husband, suspecting she had saved some Money, searches every Corner, till at length he finds this same Ticket which he immediately carries abroad, sells, and squanders away the Money without the Wife's suspecting any thing of the Matter. A Day or two after this, this Friend, who was a Woman, comes and brings the Wife word, that she had a Benefit of Five Hundred Pounds. The poor Creature, overjoyed, flies up Stairs to her Husband, who was then at Work, and desires him to leave his Loom for that Evening, and come and drink with a Friend of his and hers below. The Man received this cheerful Invitation as his Husbands sometimes do, and after a cross Word or two told her he wouldn't come. His Wife with Tenderness renewed her Importunity, and at length said to him, My Love! I have within these few Months, unknown to you, scraped together as much Money as has bought us a Ticket in the Lottery; and now here is Mrs Quack (come) to tell me, that 'us come up this Morning a Five hundred Pound Prize. The Husband replies immediately, You lye, you Slut, you have no Ticket, for I have sold it. The poor Woman upon this runs away in a Fit, recovers, and is now run distracted. As she had no Design to defraud her Husband, but was willing only to participate in his good Fortune, every one pities her, but thinks her Husband's Punishment but just. Thus, Sir, is Miter of Fret, and would, if the Persons and Circumstances were greater, in a well wrought Play be called Beautiful Distress. I have only sketched it out with Chalk, and know a good Hand can make a moving Picture with worse Materials.

SIR, &c.

MR SPECTATOR,
I am what the World calls a warm Fellow, and by good Success in Trade I have raised myself to a Capacity of making some Figure in the World but no matter for that I have now under my Guardianship a couple of Nieces, who will certainly make me run mad when you will not wonder it when I tell you they are Female Virtuosos, and during the three Years and a half that I have had 'hem under my Care, they never in the least inclined their Thoughts towards any 'one single Part of the Character of a notable Woman. Whilst they should have been considering the proper Ingredients for a Sick-posset, you should hear a Dispute concerning the [mag-netick<sup>1</sup>] Virtue of the Loadstone, or perhaps the Pressure of the Atmosphere. Their Language is peculiar to themselves, and they seem to express themselves on the meanest Trifle with Words that are not of a Latin Derivation. But this were supportable still, would they suffer me to enjoy an uninterrupted Ignorance, but, unless I fall in with their abstracted Idea of Things (as they call them) I must not expect to smooke one Pipe in Quiet. In a late Fit of the Gout I complained of the Pain of that Distemper when my Niece Kitty begged Leave to assure me, that whatever I might think, several great Philosophers, both ancient and modern, were of Opinion, that both Pleasure and Pain were imaginary [Distinctions<sup>2</sup>], and that there was no such thing as either in rerum Natura. I have often heard them affirm that the Fire was not hot, and one Day when I, with the Authority of an old Fellow, desired one of them to put my blue Cloak on my Knees she answered, Sir, I will reach the Cloak, but take notice, I do not do it as allowing your Description, for it might as well be called Yellow as Blue, for Colour is nothing but the various Infractions of the Rays of the Sun. Miss Molly told me one Day, That to say Snow was white, is allowing a vulgar Error, for as it contains a great Quantity of nitrous Particles, it [might more reasonably<sup>3</sup>] be supposed to be black. In short, the young Husseys would persuade me, that to believe one's Eyes is a sure way to be deceived, and have often advised me, by no means, to trust any thing so fallible as my Senses. What I have to beg of you now is, to turn one Speculation to the due Regulation of Female Literature, so far at least, as to make it consistent with the Quiet of such whose Fate it is to be liable to its Insults and to tell us the Difference between a Gentleman that should make Cheesecakes and raise Paste, and a Lady that reads Loche, and understands the Mathematics. In which you will extremely oblige

Formam quidem ipsam, Marce fili, et tanquam faciem Honesti vides quæ si oculis cerneretur, mirabiles amores (ut ait Plato) excitaret Sapientia—Tull Offic

I DO not remember to have read any Discourse written expressly upon the Beauty and Loveliness of Virtue, without considering it as a Duty, and as the Means of making us happy both now and hereafter. I design therefore this Speculation as an Essay upon that Subject, in which I shall consider Virtue no further than as it is in it self of an amiable Nature, after having premised, that I understand by the Word Virtue such a general Notion as is affixed to it by the Writers of Morality, and which by devout Men generally goes under the Name of Religion, and by Men of the World under the Name of Honour.

Hypocrisy it self does great Honour, or rather Justice, to Religion, and truly acknowledges it to be an Ornament to human Nature. The Hypocrite would not be at so much Pains to put on the Appearance of Virtue, if he did not know it was the most proper and effectual means to gain the Love and Esteem of Mankind.

We learn from Hierocles, it was a common Saying among the Heathens, that the Wise Man hates no body, but only loves the Virtuous.

Tully has a very beautiful Gradation of Thoughts to shew how amiable Virtue is. We love a virtuous Man, says he, who lives in the remotest Parts of the Earth, though we are altogether out of the Reach of his Virtue, and can receive from it no Manner of Benefit, nay, one who died several Ages ago, raises a secret Fondness and Benevolence for him in our Minds, when we read his Story. Nay, what is still more, one who has been the Enemy of our Country, provided his Wars were regulated by Justice and Humanity, as in the Instance of Pyrrhus whom Tully mentions on this Occasion in Opposition to Hannibal. Such is the natural Beauty and Loveliness of Virtue.

Stoicism, which was the Pedantry of Virtue, ascribes all good Qualifications, of what kind soever, to the virtuous Man. Accordingly [Cato], in the Character Tully has left of him, carried Matters so far, that he would not allow any one but a virtuous Man to be handsome. This indeed looks more like a Philosophical Rant than the real Opinion of a Wise Man, yet this was what Cato very seriously maintained. In short, the Stoics thought they could not sufficiently represent the Excellence of Virtue, if they did not comprehend in the Notion of it all possible Perfection[s], and therefore did not only suppose, that it was transcendently beautiful in it self, but that it made the very Body amiable, and banished every Kind of Deformity from the Person in whom it resided.

It is a common Observation, that the most abandoned to all Sense of Goodness, are apt to wish those who are related to them of a different Character, and it is very observable, that none are more struck with the Charms of Virtue in the fair Sex, than those who by their very Admiration of it are carried to a Desire of running it.

A virtuous Mind in a fair Body is indeed a fine Picture in a good Light, and therefore it is no Wonder that it makes the beautiful Sex all over Charms.

As Virtue in general is of an amiable and lovely Nature, there are some particular Kinds of it which are more so than others, and these are such as dispose us to do Good to Mankind. Temperance and Abstinence, with and Devotion, are in themselves perhaps as laudable as any other Virtues but those which make a Man popular and beloved, are Justice, Charity, Munificence, and, in short, all the good Qualities that render us beneficial to

As there should be but one forcible Light in a Picture which should catch the Eye and fall on the Hero, so there should be but one Object of our Love, even the Author of Nature. These and the like Reflections well improved, might very much contribute to open the Beauty of that Art, and prevent young People from being poisoned by the ill Gusto of an extravagant Workman that should be in posed upon us.

Mr SPECTATOR,

'Though I am a Woman, yet I am one of those who confess themselves highly pleased with a Speculation you obliged the World with some time ago, from an old Greek Poet you call Simonides, in relation to the several Natures and Distinctions of our own Sex. I could not but admire how justly the Characters of Women in this Age, fall in with the Times of Simonides, there being no one of those Sorts I have not at some time or other of my Life met with a Sample of. But, Sir, the Subject of this present Address, are a Set of Women comprehended, I think, in the Ninth Species of that Speculation, called the Apes, the Description of whom I find to be, "That they are such as are both ugly and ill-natured, who have nothing beautiful themselves, and endeavour to detract from or ridicule every thing that appears so in others." Now, Sir, this Sect, as I have been told, is very frequent in the great Town where you live, but as my Circumstance of Life obliges me to reside altogether in the Country, though not many Miles from London, I can't have met with a great Number of 'em, nor indeed is it a desirable Acquaintance, as I have lately found by Experience. You must know, Sir, that at the Beginning of this Summer a Family of these Apes came and settled for the Season not far from the Place where I live. As they were Strangers in the Country, they were visited by the Ladies about 'em, of whom I was, with an Humanity usual in those that pass most of their Time in Solitude. The Apes lived with us very agreeably our own Way till towards the End of the Summer, when they began to bethink themselves of returning to Town: then it was, Mr SPECTATOR, that they began to set themselves about the proper and distinguishing Business of their Character, and, as 'tis said of evil Spirits, that they are apt to carry away a Piece of the House they are about to leave, the Apes, without regard to common Merit, Civility, or Gratitude, thought fit to mimic and fall foul on the Faces, Dress, and Behaviour of their innocent Neighbours, bestowing abominable Censures and disgraceful Appellations, commonly called Nicknames, on all of them, and in short, like true fine Ladies, made their honest Plainness and Sincerity Matter of Ridicule. I could not but acquaint you with these Grievances, as well as the Desire of all the Parties injur'd, as from my own

'Inclination. I hope, Sir, if you can't propose entirely to reform this Evil, you will take such Notice of it in some of your future Speculations, as may put the deserving Part of our Sex on their Guard against these Creatures, and at the same time the Apes may be sensible, that this sort of Mirth is so far from an innocent Diversion, that it is in the highest Degree fit Vice which is said to comprehend all others.'

Ficta Voluptatis causæ sint proxima Veris

Hor

THERE is nothing which one regards so much with an Eye of Mirth and Pity as Innocence, when it has in it a Dash of Folly. At the same time that one esteems the Virtue, one is tempted to laugh at the Simplicity which accompanies it. When a Man is made up wholly of the Dove, without the least Grain of the Serpent in his Composition, he becomes ridiculous in many Circumstances of Life, and very often discredit his best Actions. The Comitians tell a Story of their Founder St Irenæus, that as he passed the Streets in the Dusk of the Evening, he discovered a young Fellow with a Maid in a Corner upon which the good Man, say they, lifted up his Hands to Heaven with a secret Thanksgiving, that there was still so much Christian Charity in this World. The Innocence of the Saint made him mistake the Kiss of a Lover for a Salute of Charity. I am heartily concerned when I see a virtuous Man without a competent Knowledge of the World, and if there be any Use in these my Papers, it is this, that without presenting Vice under any false alluring Notions, they give my Reader an Insight into the Ways of Men, and represent human Nature in all its changeable Colours. The Man who has not been engaged in any of the Follies of the World, or, as Shakespeare expresses it, hackney'd in the Ways of Men, may here find a Picture of its Follies and Extravagancies. The Virtuous and the Innocent may know in Speculation what they could never arrive at by Practice, and by this Means avoid the Snares of the Crafty, the Corruptions of the Vicious, and the Reasonings of the Prejudiced. Their Minds may be opened without being vitiated.

It is with an Eye to my following Correspondent, Mr Timothy Doodle, who seems a very well meaning Man, that I have written this short Preface, to which I shall subjoin a Letter from the said Mr Doodle.

SIR,

'I could heartily wish that you would let us know your Opinion upon several innocent Diversions which are in use among us, and which are very proper to pass away a Winter Night for those who do not care to throw away their Time in an Opera, or at the Play house. I would gladly know in particular, what Notion you have of Hot Cockles, is also whether you think that Questions and Commands, Mortgages, Suckles, and Cross Purposes have not more Mirth and Wit in them, than those publick Diversions which are grown so very fashionable among us. If you would recommend to our Wives and Daughters, who read your Papers with a great deal of Pleasure some of those Sports and Pastimes that may be practised within Doors, and by the Fire side, who are Masters of Families should be hugely obliged to you. I need not tell you that I would have these Sports and Pastimes not only merry but innocent, for which Reason I have not mentioned either Whisk or Lanterloo, nor indeed so much as One and Ninety. After having communicated to you my Request upon this Subject,

I will be so free as to tell you how my Wife and I pass away these tedious Winter Evenings with a great deal of Pleasure. Tho' she be young and handsome, and good humoured to a Miracle, she does not care for gadding abroad like others of her Sex. There is a very friendly Man, a Colonel in the Army, whom I am mightily obliged to for his Civilities, that comes to see me almost every Night for he is not one of those giddy young Fellows that cannot live out of a Play house. When we are together, we very often make a Party at Blind Man's buff, which is a Sport that I like the better, because there is a good deal of Exercise in it. The Colonel and I are blinded by Turns, and you would laugh your Heart out to see what Pains my Dear takes to hoodwink us so that it is impossible for us to see the last Glance of Light. The poor Colonel sometimes hits his Eye against a Post, and makes us die with laughing. I have generally the good Luck not to hurt myself, but am very often alone half an Hour before I can catch either of them for you must know we hide our selves up and down in Corners that we may have the more Sport. I only give you this Hint as a Sample of such Innocent Diversions as I would have you recommend. And am,
Most esteemed SIR, your ever loving Friend,
Jumoth Doodle

The following Letter was occasioned by my last Thursday's Paper upon the Absence of Lovers, and the Methods therein mentioned of making such Absence supportable

SIR,

Among the several Ways of Consolation which absent Lovers make use of while their Souls are in that State of Departure, which you say is Death in Love, there are some very material ones that have escaped your Notice. Among these, the first and most received is a crooked Shilling, which has administered great Comfort to our Forefathers, and is still made use of on this Occasion with very good Effect in most Parts of Her Majesty's Dominions. There are some, I know, who think a Crown Piece cut into two equal Parts, and preserved by the distant Lovers, is of more sovereign Virtue than the former. But since Opinions are divided in this Particular why may not the same Persons make use of both? The Figure of a Heart, whether cut in Stone or cast in Metal whether bleeding upon an Altar, stuck with Darts or held in the Hand of a Cupid, has always been looked upon as salutary in Distresses of this Nature. I am acquainted with many a brave Fellow, who carries his Mistress in the Tail of his Snuff box and by that Expedient has supported himself under the Absence of a whole Campaign. For my own Part, I have tried all these Remedies, but never found so much Benefit from any as from a Ring in which my Mistress's Hair is plaited together very intricately in a kind of True-Lover's Knot. As I have received great Benefit from this Secret, I think myself obliged to communicate it to the Publick, for the Good of my Fellow Subjects. I desire you will add this Letter as an Appendix to your Considerations upon Absence, and am,

I am very humble Servant, T B

I shall conclude this Paper with a Letter from an University Gentleman, occasioned by my last Thursday's Paper, wherein I gave some Account of the great Levels which happened formerly in those learned Studies between the modern Greeks and Trojans

SIR,

This will give you to understand, that there is at present in the Society, whereof I am a Member, a very considerable Body of Trojans, who, upon a proper Occasion, would not fail to declare themselves. In the mean while we do all we can to annoy our Enemies by Stratagem, and are reviv'd by the first Opportunity to attack Mr Joshua Barnes, whom we look upon as the Act of the opposite Party. As for myself, I have had the Reputation ever since I came from School of being a trusty Trojan, and am resolved never to give Quarter to the smallest Particle of Greek, where-ever I chance to meet it. It is for this Reason I take it very ill of you, that you sometimes bring out Greek Colours at the Head of your Paper, and sometimes give a Word of the Enemy even in the Body of it.
When I meet with any thing of this nature, I throw down your Speculations upon the Table, with that Form of Words which we make use of when we declare War upon an Author

MR SPECTATOR,
AS your Paper is Part of the Equipage of the Tale Tale, I enquire you to print what I now write to you for I have no other Way to communicate what I have to say to the fair Sex on the most important Circumstances of Life, viz the Care of Children. I do not understand that you profess your Paper is always to consist of Matters which are only to entertain the Learned and Politic, but that it may agree with your Design to publish some which may tend to the Information of Mankind in general and when it does so, you do more than writing Wit and Humour. Give me leave then to tell you, that of all the Abuses that ever you have as yet endeavour'd to reform, certainly not one wanted so much your Assistance as the Abuse in [nursing] Children.
It is unnecessary to see, that a Woman endow'd with all the Perfections and Blessings of Nature, can, as soon as she is deliver'd, turn off her innocent, tender, and helpless Infant, and give it up to a Woman that is (ten thousand to one) neither in Health nor good Condition, neither sound in Mind nor Body, that has neither Honour nor Reputation, neither Love nor Pity for the poor Babe, but more regard for the Money than for the whole Child, and never will take further Care of it than what by all the Encouragement of Money and Presents she is forced to, like Aesop's Lark, which would not nurse the Plant of another Ground, altho' never so much improved, by reason that Plant was not of its own Production. And since another's Child is no more natural to a Nurse than a Plant to a strange and different Ground, how can it be supposed that the Child should thrive? and if it thrives, must it not imbibe the gross Humours and Qualities of the Nurse, like a Plant in a different Ground, or like a Graft upon a different Stock?
Do not we observe, that a Lamb sucking a Goat changes very much its Nature, nay even its Skin and Wool into the Goat Kind? The Power of a Nurse over a Child, by infusing into it, with her Milk, her Qualities and Disposition, is sufficiently and daily observ'd. Hence came that old Saying concerning an ill natur'd and malicious Fellow, that he had imbibed his Malice with his Nurse's Milk, or that some Brute or other had been his Nurse. Hence Romulus and Remus were said to have been nursed by a Wolf, Telephus the Son of Hercules by a Hind, Plutus the Son of Neptune by a Mare, and Antisthus by a Goat: not that they had actually suck'd such Creatures, as some Simpletons have imagin'd, but that their Nurses had been of such a Nature and Temper, and infused such into them.

Many Instances may be produced from good Authorities and daily Experience, that Children acquire such in the several Passions and depraved Inclinations of their Nurses as Anger, Malice, Fear, Melancholy, Sadness, Devotion, and Aversion. This Diadorus, lib. 2, witnesses, when he speaks, saying, that Nero the Imperial Nurse had been very much addicted to Drinking, which Habit Nero received from his Nurse, and was so very particular in this, that the People took so much notice of it, as instead of Paterus Nero, they call'd him Biberus.
Nero. The same Diadorus also relates of Ca-lphula, Predecessor to Nero, that his Nurse used to moisten the Nipples of her Breast frequently with Blond, to make Calphula take the better Hold of them, which, says Diadorus, was the Cause that made him so blood thirsty and cruel all his Life time after, that he not only committed frequent Murder by his own Hand, but likewise wished that all human Kind were but one Neck, that he might have the Pleasure to cut it off. Such like Degeneracies astonish the Parents, [who] not knowing after whom the Child can take, [see] one to incline to Stinging, another to Drinking, Cruelty, Stupidity, yet all these are not imputed. Nay it is easy to demonstrate, that a Child, although it be born from the best of Parents, may be corrupted by an ill tem-per'd Nurse. How many Children do we see daily brought into Fits, Consumptions, Rickets, &c, merely by sucking their Nurses when in a Passion or Lury? But indeed almost any Disorder of the Nurse is a Disorder to the Child, and few Nurses can be found in this Town but what labour under some Distemper or other.
The first Question that is generally asked a young Woman that wants to be a Nurse, [Why?] she should be a Nurse to other People's Children is answered, by her having an ill Husband, and that she must make Shift to live. I think now this very Answer is enough to give any Body a Shock if duly considered for in all Husband may, or ten to nine if he does not, bring home to his Wife an ill Distemper, or at least Vexation and Disturbance. Besides as she takes the Child out of inner Necessity, her Food will be accordingly, or else very coarse at best, whence proceeds an ill concocted and coarse Food for the Child for as the Blood, so is the Milk and hence I am very well assured proceeds the Scurvy, the Evil, and many other Distempers. I beg of you, for the Sake of the many poor Infants that may and will be saved, by weighing this Case seriously, to exhort the People with the utmost Vehemence to let the Children suck their own

[Mothers'] both for the Benefit of Mother and Child. For the general Argument, that a Mother is weakened by giving suck to her Children, is run and sunple, I will maintain that the Mother grows stronger by it, and will have her Health better than she would have otherwise. She will find it the greatest Cure and Preservative for the Vapours and future Miscarriages, much beyond any other Remedy whatsoever. Her Children will be like Giants, whereas otherwise they are but living Shadows and like unripe Fruit. And certainly if a Woman is strong enough to bring forth a Child, she is beyond all Doubt strong enough to nurse it afterwards. It grieves me to observe and consider how many poor Children are daily ruin'd by careless Nurses, and yet how tender ought they to be of a poor Infant, since the least Hurt or Blow, especially upon the Head, may make it senseless, stupid, or otherwise miserable for ever?

But I cannot well leave this Subject as yet, for it seems to me very unnatural, that a Woman that has fed a Child a Part of her self for nine Months, should have no Desire to nurse it further, when brought to Light and before her Eyes, and when by its Cry it implores her Assistance and the Office of a Mother. Do not the very cruellest of Brutes tend their young ones with all the Care and Delight imaginable? For how can she be call'd a Mother that will not nurse her young ones? The Lark is call'd the Mother of all Things, not because she produces, but because she maintains and nurses what she produces. The Generation of the Infant is the Effect of Desire, but the Care of it argues Virtue and Choice. I am not ignorant but that there are some Cases of Necessity where a Mother cannot give Suck, and then out of two Evils the least must be chosen. but there are so very few, that I am sure in a Thousand there is hardly one real Instance, for if a Woman does but know that her Husband can spare about three or six Shillings a Week extraordinary, (altho' this is but seldom considered) she certainly, with the Assistance of her Gossips, will soon persuade the good Man to send the Child to Nurse, and easily impose upon him by pretending Indisposition. This Cruelty is supported by Fashion, and Nature gives Place to Custom.

SIR,

Your humble Servant

WE are told by some ancient Authors, that Socrates was instructed in Eloquence by a Woman, whose Name, if I am not mistaken, was Aspasia. I have indeed very often looked upon that Art as the most proper for the female Sex, and I think the Universities would do well to consider whether they should not fill the Rhetorick Chairs with She Professors.

It has been said in the Praise of some Men, that they could talk whole Hours together upon any thing, but it must be owned to the Honour of the other Sex, that there are many among them who can talk whole Hours together upon Nothing. I have known a Woman branch out into a long Extempore Dissertation upon the Edging of a Petticoat, and chide her Servant for breaking a China Cup, in all the Figures of Rhetorick.

Were Women admitted to plead in Courts of Judicature, I am persuaded they would carry the Eloquence of the Bar to greater Heights than it has yet arrived at. If any one doubts this, let him but be present at those Debates which frequently arise among the Ladies [of the] British Fishery.

The first Kind therefore of Female Orators which I shall take notice of, are those who are employed in stirring up the Passions, a Part of Rhetorick in which Socrates his Wife had perhaps made a greater Proficiency than his above mentioned Teacher.

The second Kind of Female Orators are those who deal in Invectives, and who are commonly known by the Name of the Censorious. The Imagination and Elocution of this Set of Rhetoricians is wonderful. With what a Fluency of Invention, and Copiousness of Expression, will they enlarge upon every little Slip in the Behaviour of another? With how many different Circumstances, and with what Variety of Phrases, will they tell over the same Story? I have known an old Lady malice in unhappy Marriage the Subject of a Month's Conversation. She blamed the Bride in one Place, patted her in another, laughed at her in a third, wondered at her in a fourth, was angry with her in a fifth and in short, wore out a Pair of Coach Horses in expressing her Concern for her. At length, after having quite exhausted the Subject on this Side, she made a Visit to the new married Pair, praised the Wife for the prudent Choice she had made, told her the unreasonable Reflections which some malicious People had cast upon her, and desired that they might be better acquainted. The Censure and Approbation of this Kind of Women are therefore only to be consider'd as Helps to Discourse.

A third Kind of Female Orators may be comprehended under the Word Gossips. Mrs Fiddle Faddle is perfectly accomplished in this Sort of Eloquence, she launches out into Descriptions of Christenings, runs Divisions upon an Head dress, knows every Dish of Meat that is served up in her Neighbourhood, and entertains her Company a whole Afternoon together with the Wit of her little Boy, before he is able to speak.

The Coquet may be looked upon as a fourth Kind of Female Orator. To give her self the larger Field for Discourse, she hates and loves in the same Breath, talks to her Lap-dog or Parrot, is uneasy in all kinds of Weather, and in every Part of the Room. She has false Quirels and feigned Obligations to all the Men of her Acquaintance, sighs when she is not sad, and

Laughs when she is not Merry The Coquet is in particular a great Mistress of that Part of Oratory which is called Action, and indeed seems to speak for no other Purpose, but as it gives her an Opportunity of stirring a Lamb, or varying a Feature, of glancing her Eyes, or playing with her Fan

As for News mongers, Politicians, Mimicks, Story-Tellers, with other Characters of that nature, which give Birth to Loquacity, they are as commonly found among the Men as the Women for which Reason I shall pass them over in Silence

I have often been puzzled to assign a Cause why Women should have this Talent of a ready Utterance in so much greater Perfection than Men I have sometimes fancied that they have not a retentive Power, or the Faculty of suppressing their Thoughts, as Men have, but that they are necessitated to speak every Thing they think, and if so, it would perhaps furnish a very strong Argument to the Cartesians, for the supporting of their [Doctrine,] that the Soul always thinks But as several are of Opinion that the Fair Sex are not altogether Strangers to the Art of Dissembling and concealing their Thoughts, I have been forced to relinquish that Opinion, and have therefore endeavoured to seek after some better Reason In order to it, a Friend of mine, who is an excellent Anatomist, has promised me by the first Opportunity to dissect a Woman's Tongue, and to examine whether there may not be in it certain Juices which render it so wonderfully voluble [or?] supple, or whether the Fibres of it may not be made up of a finer or more pliant Thread, or whether there are not in it some particular Muscles which dart it up and down by such sudden Glances and Vibrations, or whether in the last Place, there may not be certain undiscovered Channels running from the Head and the Heart, to this little Instrument of Loquacity, and conveying into it a perpetual Affluence of animal Spirits Nor must I omit the Reason which Hudibras has given, why those who can talk on Trifles speak with the greatest Fluency, namely, that the Tongue is like a Race Horse, which runs the faster the lesser Weight it carries

Which of these Reasons soever may be looked upon as the most probable, I think the Irishman's Thought was very natural, who after some Hours Conversation with a Female Orator, told her, that he belicved her Tongue was very glad when she was asleep, for that it had not a Moment's Rest all the while she was awake

That excellent old Ballad of The Wanton Wife of Bath has the following remarkable Lines

I think, quoth Thomas, Womens Tongues Of Aspen Leaves are made

And Ovid, though in the Description of a very barbarous Circumstance, tells us, that when the tongue of a beautiful Female was ent out, and thrown upon the Ground, it could not forbear muttering even in that Posture

*Compressam forcipe linguam
Abstulit ense ferro Radix micat nitida lingua*

<sup>1</sup> [Opinion,]

<sup>2</sup> [and]

*Ipsa jacet, terræque tremens innummural atræ, Utque salire solet mutilatæ cauda colubæ

If a tongue would be talking without a Mouth, what could it have done when it had all its Organs of Speech, and Accomplices of Sound about it? I might here mention the Story of the Pippin-Worin, had not I some Reason to look upon it as fabulous

I must confess I am so wonderfully charmed with the Musick of this little Instrument, that I would by no Means discourage it All that I aim at by this Dissertation is, to cure it of several disagreeable Notes, and in particular of those little Jarrings and Dissonances which arise from Anger, Censoriousness, Gossiping and Coquetry In short, I would always have it tuned by Good-Nature, Truth, Discretion and Sincerity C

THERE are none who deserve Superiority over others in the Esteem of Mankind, who do not make it their Endeavour to be beneficial to Society and who upon all Occasions which their Circumstances of Life can administer, do not take a certain unfeigned Pleasure in conferring Benefits of one kind or other Those whose great Talents and high Birth have placed them in conspicuous Stations of Life, are indispensably obliged to exert some noble Inclinations for the Service of the World, or else such Advantages become Misfortunes, and Shame and Privacy are a more eligible Portion Where Opportunities and Inclinations are given to the same Person, we sometimes see sublime Instances of Virtue, which so dazzle our Imaginations, that we look with Scorn on all which in lower Scenes of Life we may our selves be able to practise But this is a vicious Way of Thinking and it bears some Spice of romantick Madness, for a Man to imagine that he must grow ambitious, or seek Adventures, to be able to do great Actions It is in every Man's Power in the World who is above mere Poverty, not only to do Things worthy but heroic The great Foundation of civil Virtue is Self Denial and there is no one above the Necessities of Life, but has Opportunities of exercising that noble Quality, and doing as much as his Circumstances will bear for the Ease and Convenience of other Men and he who does more than ordinarily Men practise upon such Occasions as occur in his Life, deserves the Value of his Friends as if he had done Enterprises which are usually attended with the highest Glory Men of publick Spirit differ rather in their Circumstances than their Virtue and the Man who does all he can in a low Station, is more [or?] Hero than he who omits any worthy Action he is able to accomplish in a great one It is not many Years ago since Lapirus, in Wrong of his elder Brother, came to a great Estate by Gift of his Father, by reason of the dissolute Behaviour of the First-born Shame and Contrition reformed the Life of the disinherited Youth, and he became as remarkable for his good Qualities as formerly for his Errors Lapirus, who observed his Brother's Amendment, sent him on a New-Year's Day in the Morning the following Letter

Honour'd Brother,

'I enclose to you the Deeds whereby my Father gave me this House and Land And he lived till now, he would not have bestowed it in that Manner, he took it from the Man you were, and I restore it to the Man you are I am,

SIR,

Your affectionate Brother, and humble Servant, P 1

As great and exalted Spirits undertake the Pursuit of hazardous Actions for the Good of others, at the same Time gratifying their Passion for Glory so dowerly Minds in the domestick Way of Life deny themselves many Advantages, to satisfy a generous Benevolence which they bear to their Friends oppressed with Distresses and Calamities Such Natures may call Stores of Providence, which are actuated by a secret Celestial Influence to undervalue the ordinary Gratifications of Wealth, to give Comfort to an Heart laded with Affliction, to save a falling Family, to preserve a Branch of Trade in their Neighbourhood, and give Work to the Industrious, preserve the Portion of the helpless Infant, and raise the Head of the mourning Father People whose Hearts are wholly bent towards Pleasure, or intent upon Gun, never hear of the noble Occurrences among Men of Industry and Humanity It would look like a City Romance, to tell them of the generous Merchant who the other Day sent this Billet to an eminent Trader under Difficulties to support himself, in whose Fall many hundreds besides himself had perished, but because I think there is more Spirit and true Gallantry in it than in any Letter I have ever read from Strephon to Phyllis, I shall insert it even in the mercantile honest Style in which it was sent

SIR,

'I Have heard of the Casualties which have involved you in extreme Distress at this Time and knowing you to be a Man of great Good-Nature Industry and Probity, have resolved to stand by you Be of good Cheer, the Bearer brings with him five thousand Pounds, and has my Order to answer your drawing as much more on my Account I did this in Haste, for fear I should come too late for your Relief but you may value your self with me to the Sum of fifty thousand Pounds for I can very cheerfully run the Hazard of being so much less rich than I am now, to save an honest Man whom I love

Your Friend and Servant, [W S ]

I think there is somewhere in Montaigne Mention made of a Family book, wherein all the Occurrences that happened from one Generation of that House to another were recorded Were there such a Method in the Families, which are concerned in this Generosity, it would be no hard task for the greatest in Europe to give, in their own, an Instance of a Benefit better pleased, or conferred with a more graceful Air It has been heretofore urged, how barbarous and inhuman is any unjust Step made to the Disadvantage of a Trader and by how much such an Act towards him is detestable, by so much an Act of Kindness towards him is laudable I remember to have heard a Benchor of the Temple tell a Story of a Tradition in their House, where they had formerly a Custom of chusing Kings for such a Season, and allowing him his Expenses at the Charge of the Society One of our Kings, said my Friend, carried his Royal Inclination a little too far, and there was a Committee ordered to look into the Management of his Treasury Among other Things it appeared, that his Majesty walking incog in the Cloister, had overheard a poor Man say to another, Such a small Sum would make me the happiest Man in the World The King out of his Royal Compassion privately inquired into his Character, and finding him a proper Object of Charity, sent him the Money When the Committee read their Report, the House passed his Account with a Plaudite without further Examination, upon the Recital of this Article in them,

WHEN I make Choice of a Subject that has not been treated on by others, I throw together my Reflections on it without any Order or Method, so that they may appear rather in the Looseness and Freedom of an Essay, than in the Regularity of a Set Discourse It is after this Manner that I shall consider Laughter and Ridicule in my present Paper

Man is the merriest Species of the Creation, all above and below him are Serious He sees things in a different Light from other Beings, and finds his Mirth arising from Objects that perhaps cause something like Pity or Displeasure in higher Natures Laughter is indeed a very good Counterpoise to the Spleen and it seems but reasonable that we should be capable of receiving Joy from what is no real Good to us, since we can receive Grief from what is no real Evil

I have in my Forty-seventh Paper raised a Speculation on the Notion of a Modern Philosopher,<sup>1</sup> who describes the first Motive of Laughter to be a secret Comprison which we make between our selves, and the Persons we laugh at or, in other Words, that Satisfaction which we receive from the Opinion of some Pre-eminence in our selves, when we see the Absurdities of another or when we reflect on any past Absurdities of our own. This seems to hold in most Cases, and we may observe that the funnest Part of Mankind are the most addicted to this Passion.

I have read a Sermon of a Conventual in the Church of Rome, on those Words of the Wise Man, I said of Laughter, it is mad, and of Mirth, what does it? Upon which he laid it down as a Point of Doctrine, that Laughter was the Effect of Original Sin, and that Adam could not laugh before the Fall.

Laughter, while it lasts, slackens and unbraces the Mind, weakens the Faculties, and causes a kind of Remissness and Dissolution in all the Powers of the Soul. And thus far it may be looked upon as a Weakness in the Composition of Human Nature. But if we consider the frequent Reliefs we receive from it, and how often it breaks the Gloom which is apt to depress the Mind and damp our Spirits, with transient unexpected Gleams of Joy, one would take care not to grow too wise for so great a Pleasure of Life.

The Talent of turning Men into Ridicule, and exposing to Laughter those one converses with, is the Qualification of little ungenerous Tempers. A young Man with this Cast of Mind cuts himself off from all manner of Improvement. Every one has his Flaws and Weaknesses, nay, the greatest Blemishes are often found in the most shining Characters; but what an absurd Thing is it to pass over all the valuable Parts of a Man, and fix our Attention on his Infirmitates? to observe his Imperfections more than his Virtues, and to make use of him for the Sport of others, rather than for our own Improvement?

We therefore very often find, that Persons the most accomplished in Ridicule are those who are very shrewd at hitting a Blot, without exerting any thing masterly in themselves. As there are many eminent Critics who never writ a good Line, there are many admirable Buffoons that animadvert upon every single Defect in another, without ever discovering the least Beauty of their own. By this Means, these unlucky little Wits often gain Reputation in the Esteem of Vulgar Minds, and raise themselves above Persons of much more laudable Characters.

If the Talent of Ridicule were employed to laugh Men out of Vice and Folly, it might be of some Use to the World, but instead of this, we find that it is generally made use of to laugh Men out of Virtue and good Sense, by attacking every thing that is Solemn and Serious, Decent and Praiseworthy in Human Life.

We may observe, that in the First Ages of the World, when the great Souls and Master-pieces of Human Nature were produced, Men shined by a noble Simplicity of Behaviour and were Strangers to those little Embellishments which are so fashionable in our present Conversation. And it is very remarkable, that notwithstanding we fall short at present of the Ancients in Poetry, Painting, Oratory, History, Architecture, and all the noble Arts and Sciences which depend more upon Genius than Experience, we exceed them as much in Doggerel, Humour, Burlesque, and all the trivial Arts of Ridicule. We meet with more Railery among the Moderns, but more Good Sense among the Ancients.

The two great Branches of Ridicule in Writing are Comedy and Burlesque. The first ridicules Persons by drawing them in their proper Characters, the other by drawing them quite unlike themselves. Burlesque is therefore of two kinds: the first represents mean Persons in the Accoutrements of Heroes, the other describes great Persons acting and speaking like the basest among the People. Don Quixote is an Instance of the first, and Lucian's Gods of the second. It is a Dispute among the Critics, whether Burlesque Poetry runs best in Heroick Verse, like that of the Dispensary,<sup>1</sup> or in Doggerel, like that of Hudibras. I think where the low Character is to be raised, the Heroick is the proper Measure; but when an Hero is to be pulled down and degraded, it is done best in Doggerel.

If Hudibras had been set out with as much Wit and Humour in Heroick Verse as he is in Doggerel, he would have made a much more agreeable Figure than he does, though the generality of his Readers are so wonderfully pleased with the double Rhymes, that I do not expect many will be of my Opinion in this Particular.

I shall conclude this Essay upon Laughter with observing that the Metaphor of Laughing, applied to Fields and Meadows when they are in Flower, or to Trees when they are in Blossom, runs through all Languages, which I have not observed of any other Metaphor, excepting that of Fire and Burning when they are applied to Love. This shews that we naturally regard Laughter, as what is in itself both amiable and beautiful. For this Reason likewise Venus has gained the Title of Φιλομειδῶν, the Laughter-loving Dame, as Waller has translated it, and is represented by Horace as the Goddess who delights in Laughter. Milton, in a joyous Assembly of imaginary Persons,<sup>2</sup> has given us a very Poetical Figure of Laughter. His whole Band of Mirth is so finely described, that I shall [set] down [the Passage] at length.

*But come thou Goddess fair and free,
In Heaven ycleped Euphrosyne,
And by Men, heart-easing Mirth,
Whom lovely Venus at a Birth,
With two Sister Graces more,
To Joy crowned Bacchus bore
Haste thee, Nymph, and bring with thee
Test and youthful Jollity,
Quips and Cranks, and wanton Wiles,
Nods, and Becks, and wreathed Smiles,
Such as hang on Hebe's Cheek,
And love to live in Dimple sleep*

<sup>1</sup> Sir Samuel Garth, poet and physician, who was alive at this time (died in 1719), satirized a squabble among the doctors in his poem of the Dispensary.

*The piercing Caustics ply their spiteful Power, Emetics ranch, and keen Cathartics scour
The deadly Drugs in double Doses fly,
And Pestles beat a martial Symphony*

<sup>3</sup> [set it]

*Sport that wrinkled Care derides,
And Laughter holding both his Sides
Come and try it, as we go,
On the light fantastic Toe
As I in this right Hand lead with thee
The Fountain Nymph, so let Liberty,
As if I gave thee Heaven to die,
With admit me of this Crew,
To be with her, and live with thee,
In reprov'd Pleasures free*

MR SPECTATOR,

YOU see the Nature of my Request by the Latin Motto which I address to you I am very sensible I ought not to use many Words to you, who are one of but few but the following Piece is it relates to Speculation in Propriety of Speech, being a Curious in its kind, begs, our Patience It was found in a Poetical Virtuoso's Closet among his Rarities and since the several Pretences of Humors I see, and Nose, have obliged the World, this of Eyes is at your Service

The first Eye of Consequence (under the invisible Author of all) is the visible Luminary of the Universe This glorious Spectator is and never to open his Eyes at his Rising in a Morning, without having a whole Kingdom of Adorers in Persia still a living at his Levée Millions of Creatures derive their Sight from his Original, who, besides his being the great Director of Opticks, is the sweetest I see whether I see be of the same Species with that of an Eagle or that of an Owl The one he emboldens with a timely Assurance to look, speak, ret or plead before the Faces of a numerous Assembly the other he dizzies out of Countenance into a sheepish Dejectedness The Sun Proof Eye dares lead up a Prince in a full Court and without blinking at the Lustre of Beauty, can distribute an Eye of proper Complaisance to a Room crowded with Company each of which deserves particular Regard, while the other sneaks from Conversation, like a fearful Debtor, who never dares [to] look out, but when he can see no body, and no body him

The next Instance of Opticks is the famous Argus, who to speak in the Language of Cambrides was one of an Hundred and being used as a Spy in the Affairs of Jealousy, was oblig'd to have all his Eyes about him We have no Account of the particular Colour, Casts and Turns of this Body of Eyes but as he was Pimp for his Mistress Juno, its probable he used all the modern Fears, shy Glances, and other ocular Activities to serve his Purpose Some look upon him as the then King at Arms to the Heathenish Deities and make no more of his Eyes than as so many Spangles of his Herald's Coat

The next upon the Optick List is old Jarvis, who stood in a double-sighted Capacity, like a Person placed between two opposite Looking-Glasses and so took a sort of retrospective Cast at one View Copies of this double faced Way are not yet out of Fashion with many Professions, and the ingenious Artists pretend to keep up this Species by double headed Canes and Spoons but there is no Mark of this Faculty, except in the emblematical Way of a wise General having an Eye to both Front and Rear, or a pious Man taking a Review and Prospect of his past and future State at the same Time

I must own, that the Names, Colour, Qualities, and Luras of Eyes vary almost in every Head for, not to mention the common Appellations of the Black, the Blue the White, the Gray, and the like the most remarkable are those that borrow their Intels from Animals, by the Virtue of some particular Quality or Resemblance they bear to the Eyes of the respective Creature[s] as that of a greedy rapacious Aspect takes its Name from the Cat, that of a sharp piercing Nature from the Hawk, that of an amorous ro, such Look derive their Intels even from the Sheep, and we say such and such one has a Sheep's Eye, not so much to denote the Innocence as the simple Siness of the Cast Nor is this metaphorical Inoculation a modern Invention, for we find Homer taking the Freedom to place the Eye of an Ox, Bull, or Cow in one of his principal Goddesses, by that frequent Expression of

Βοῦς ἢ βοτρία ἦπυ—

Now as to the peculiar Qualities of the Eye, that fine Part of our Constitution seems as much the Reception and Seat of our Passions, Appetites and Inclinations as the Mind itself and it is the outward Portal to introduce the n to the House within, or rather the common thoroughfare to let our Afflictions pass in and our Love, Anger, Pride, and Avarice, all visibly move in those little Orbs I know a young Lady that can't see a certain Gentleman pass by without shewing a secret Desire of seeing him again by a Dance in her Eye-balls nay, she can't get the Heart of her help looking Half a Street's Length after any Man in a gay Dress You can't behold a covetous Spirit walk by a Goldsmith's Shop without casting a wishful Eye at the Heaps upon the Counter Does not a haughty Person shew the Temper of his Soul in the supercilious Row of his Eye? and how frequently in the Height of Passion does that moving Picture in our Head start and stare, either a Redness and quick Flashes of Lightening, and make all its Humours sparkle with Fire, as I might fully describes it

Ardentis ab ore

3 An 12, v 10.

'As for the various Turns of [the] Eye sight, such as the voluntary or involuntary, the half or the whole Leer, I shall not enter into a very particular Account of them, but let me observe, that oblique Vision, when natural, is anciently the Mark of Bewitchery and magical Lascination, and to this Day 'tis a malignant ill Look, but when 'tis forced and affected it carries a warning Design and in Play houses, and other publick Places, this oblique Intimation is often an Assignment for bad Practices. But this Irregularity in Vision, together with such Licentiousness as tipping the Wink, the Circumspective Rowl, the Side peep through a thin Hood or Fan, must be put in the Class of Heteropuncts, as all wrong Notions of Religion are ranked under the general Name of Heterodox. All the pernicious Applications of Sight are more immediately under the Direction of a SPECTATOR, and I hope you will arm your Readers against the Mischiefs which are daily done by killing Eyes, in which you will highly oblige your wounded unknown I send,

F B

MR SPECTATOR,

'You professed in several Papers your particular Endeavours in the Province of SPECTATION, to correct the Offences committed by STARRERS, who disturb whole Assemblies without any Regard to Time, Place or Modesty. You complained also, that a Starrer is not usually a Person to be convinced by Reason of the Thing, nor so easily rebuked, as to amend by Admonitions. I thought therefore fit to requirunt you with a convenient Mechanical Way, which may easily prevent or correct Starring, by an Optical Contrivance of new Perspective-Glasses, short and commodious like Opera Glasses, fit for short sighted People as well as others, these Glasses making the Objects appear, either as they are seen by the naked Eye, or more distinct, though somewhat less than Life, or bigger and nearer. A Person may, by the Help of this Invention, take a View of another without the Impertinence of Starring at the same Time it shall not be possible to know whom or what he is looking at. One may look towards his Right or Left Hand, when he is supposed to look forwards. This is set forth at large in the printed Proposals for the Sale of these Glasses, to be had at Mr. Dillion's in Long-Acre, next Door to the White-Hart. Now, Sir, as your Spectator has occasioned the Publishing of this Invention for the Benefit of modest Spectators, the Inventor desires your Admonitions concerning the decent Use of it and hopes, by your Recommendation, that for the future Beauty may be beheld without the Torment and Confusion which it suffers from the Insolence of STARRERS. By this means you will relieve the Innocent from an Insult which there is no Law to punish, tho' it is a greater Offence than many which are within the Cognizance of Justice. I am,

SIR,

Your most humble Servant

Lingue centum sunt, oraque centum,
Ferreæ Vox ——— Virg

THERE is nothing which more astonishes a Foreigner, and frights a Country Squire, than the Cries of London. My good Friend Sir Roger often declares, that he cannot get them out of his Head or go to Sleep for them, the first Week that he is in Town. On the contrary, WIT HOWARD calls them the Ramage de la Ville, and prefers them to the Soumils of Larks and Nightingales, with all the Murmur of the Fields and Woods. I have lately received a Letter from some very odd Fellow upon this Subject, which I shall leave with my Reader, without saying any thing further of it.

SIR,

'I am a Man of all Business, and would willingly turn my Head to any thing for an honest Livelihood. I have invented several Projects for raising many Millions of Money without burthening the Subject, but I cannot get the Parliament to listen to me, who look upon me, forsooth, as a Crack, and a Projector, so that despairing to enrich either my self or my Country by this Publick spiritedness, I would make sure Proposals to you relating to a Design which I have very much at Heart, and which may procure me [a] handsome Subsistence, if you will be pleased to recommend it to the Cities of London and Westminster.

'The Post I would aim at, is to be Comptroller-General of the London Cries which are at present under no manner of Rules or Discipline. I think I am pretty well qualified for this Place, as being, a Man of very strong Injuns, of great Insight into all the Branches of our British Trades and Manufactures, and of a competent Skill in Music.

'The Cries of London may be divided into Vocal and Instrumental. As for the latter they are at present under a very great Disorder. A Freeman of London has the Privilege of disturbing a whole Street for 20 Hour together, with the Irwinning of a Brass Kettle or a Fryn, Pan. The Watchman's Whoop at Midnight striles us in our Beds, as much as the Breacking in of a Thief. The Saw gelder's Horn has indeed some thing musical in it, but this is seldom heard within the Liberties. I would therefore propose that no Instrument of this Nature should be made use of, which I have not tried and measured, after having carefully examined in what manner it may affect the Ears of her Majesty's liege Subjects.

'Vocal Cries are of a much larger Extent, and indeed so full of Incongruities and Barbarisms, that we appear a distracted City to Foreigners, who do not comprehend the Meaning of such enormous Outcries. Milk is generally sold in a note above Ela and in Sounds so [exceeding] shrill, that it often is to our Teeth [so] I dige

[ir]

2 [exceedingly]

3 [an]

'The Chimney-sweeper is (confined!) to no certain Pitch, he sometimes utters himself in the deepest Bree, and sometimes in the sharpest Treble; sometimes in the highest, and sometimes in the lowest Note of the Gamut. The same Observation might be made on the Retainers of Small coal, not to mention broken Glasses or Brick-dust. In these therefore, and the like Cases, it should be my Care to sweeten and mellow the Voices of these innumerable Tradesmen, before they make their Appearance in our Streets, as also to accommodate their Cries to their respective Wares, and to take care in particular, that those who cry not make the most Noise who have the least to sell, which is very observable in the Venders of Card matches, to whom I cannot but apply that old Proverb of Mu & Cry but little Word.

'Some of these last mentioned Musicians are a very loud in the Sale of these trifling Manufactures, that an honest Splenetic Gentleman of my Acquaintance bargained with one of them never to come into the Street where he lived. But what was the Effect of this Contract? Why, the whole Tribe of Card match makers which frequent that Quarter, pressed by the Door the very next Day, in hopes of being bought off after the same manner.

'It is another great Imperfection in our London Cries, that there is no just Time nor Measure observed in them. Our News should indeed be published in a very quick Time, because it is a Commodity that will not keep cold. It should not, however, be cried with the same Precipitation as Fire. Yet this is generally the Case. A bloody Battle alarms the Town from one End to another in an Instant. I very often of the French is Published in so great a Hurry, that one would think the Enemy were at our Gates. This likewise I would take upon me to regulate in such a manner, that there should be some Distinction made between the spreading of a Victory, a March, or an Incantment, a Dutch, a Portuguese or a Spanish Mail. Nor must I omit under this Head, those excessive Alarms with which several boisterous Rusticks infect our Streets in Turnip Season, and which are more inexcusable, because these are Wares which are in no Danger of Cooling upon their Hands.

'There are others who affect a very slow Time, and are, in my Opinion, much more tuneable than the former, the Cooper in particular swells his first Note in an hollow Voice, that is not without its Harmony. I forecan I forbear being inspired with a most agreeable Melancholy, when I hear that sad and solemn Air with which the Public are very often asked, if they have any Chairs to mend? Your own Memory may suggest to you many other lamentable Duties of the same No-ture, in which the Musick is wonderfully improving and melodious.

I am always pleased with that particular Time of the Year which is proper for the picking of Dill and Cucumbers. But alas, this Cry, like the Song of the [Nightingale], is not heard above my Mouth. It would therefore be worth while to consider whether the same Air might not in some Cases be adapted to other Words.

'It might likewise deserve our most serious Consideration, how far, in a well regulated City, those Humourists are to be tolerated, who, not contented with the traditional Cries of their Forefathers, have invented particular Songs and Tunes of their own. Such as was, not in my Years since, the Party man commonly known by the Name of the Colly Mollie Puff, and such as is at this Day the Vender of Powder and Wash balls, who, if I am rightly informed, lives under the Name of Peter the Buff.

'I must not here omit one particular Abusivity which runs through this whole vicious Generation, and which renders their Cries very often not only uncommodious, but altogether useless to the Publick. I mean, that idle Accomplishment which they all of them run at, of Crying so as not to be understood. Whether or no they have learned this from several of our affected Singers, I will not take upon me to say, but most certainly it is that People know the Wares they deal in rather by their Tunes than by their Words, insomuch that I have some times seen a Country Boy run out to buy Apples of a Bellows mender, and purchase bread from a Grinder of knives and Scissors. Nay so strangely infatuated are some very eminent Artists of this particular Grace in a Cry, that none but their Acquaintance are able to guess at their Profession, for who else can know, that Work if I fail it, should be the Signification of a Corn Cutter?

'I forbear therefore as Persons of this Rank are seldom Men of Genius or Capacity, I think it would be very proper, that some Man of good Sense and sound Judgment should preside over the Publick Cries, who should permit none to lift up their Voices in our Streets, that have not tuneable Throats, and are not only able to overcome the Noise of the Crowd, and the Rattling of Chaises, but also to lend their respective Merchandises in apt Phrases, and in the most distinct and agreeable Sounds. I do therefore humbly recommend my self as a Person highly qualified for this Post, and if I meet with fitting Encouragement, shall communicate some other Projects, which I have by me, that in no less conduce to the Improvement of the Publick fill the Reader with more agreeable Images, and give him a more delightful Entertainment than what can be found in the following, or any other Book.

One cannot indeed without Offence, to Your self, observe, that You excel the rest of Mankind in the least, as well as the greatest Endowments. Nor were it a Circumstance to be mentioned, if the Graces and Attractions of Your Person were not the only Preheminence You have above others, which is left, almost, unobserved by greater Writers.

Yet how pleasing would it be to those who shall read the surprising Revolutions in your Story, to be made acquainted with your ordinary Life and Deportment? How pleasing would it be to hear that the same Man who had earned Fire and Sword into the Countries of all that had opposed the Cause of Liberty, and struck a Perilous blow into the Armies of France, had, in the midst of His high Station, a Behaviour as gentle as is usual in the first Steps towards Greatness? And if it were possible to express that easy Grandeur, which did at once persuade and command, it would appear as clearly to those to come, as it does to his Contemporaries, that all the great Events which were brought to pass under the Conduct of so well govern'd a Spirit, were the Blessings of Heaven upon Wisdom and Valour, and all which seem adverse fell out by divine Permission, which we are not to search into.

You have pass'd that Year of Life wherein the most able and fortunate Captain, before Your Time, declared he had liv'd enough both to Nature and to Glory: and Your Grace may make that Reflection with much more Justice. He spoke it after he had arriv'd at Empire, by an Usurpation upon those whom he had crush'd, but the Prince of Mindelheim may rejoice in a Sovereignty which was the Gift of Him whose Dominions he had preserv'd.

Glory established upon the uninterrupted Success of honourable Designs and Actions is not subject to Diminution nor to any Attempts prevail against it, but in the Proportion which the narrow Circuit of Rumour bears to the unlimited Extent of Fame.

We may congratulate Your Grace not only upon your high Achievements, but likewise upon the happy Expiration of Your Command, by which your Glory is put out of the Power of Fortune. And when your Person shall be so too, that the Author and Disposer of all things may place You in that higher Mansion of Bliss and Immortality which is prepar'd for good Princes, Languages, and Heroes, when HE in HIS due Time removes them from the Lvy of Mankind, is the hearty Prayer of,

My Lord,
Your Grace's
Most Obedient,

[Errante, passimque oculos per cuncta ferenti

MR SPECTATOR,
I AM very sorry to find by your Discourse upon the Eye, that you have not thoroughly studied the Nature and Force of that Part of a beautiful Face. Had you ever been in Love, you would have said ten thousand things, which it seems did not occur to you. Do but reflect upon the Noisiness it makes Men talk, the Flames which it is said to kindle, the Transport it raises, the Dejection it causes in the bravest Men, and if you do believe those things are express'd to an Extravagance, yet you will own, that the Influence of it is very great which moves Men to that Extravagance. Certain it is, that the whole Strength of the Mind is sometimes seated there, that a kind Look imports all, that a Year's Discourse could give you, in one Moment. What matters it what she says to you, see how she looks, is the Language of all who know what Love is. When the Mind is thus summed up and express'd in a Glance, did you never observe a sudden Joy rise in the Countenance of a Lover? Did you never see the Attendance of Years paid, never paid in an Instant? You a SPECTATOR, and not know that the Intelligence of Affection is carried on by the Eye only. That Good-breeding has made the Tongue falsify the Heart, and yet a Part of continual Constraint, while Nature has preserv'd the Eyes to her self, that she may not be disguis'd or misrepresented. The poor Bride can give her Hand, and say, I do, with a hanging Air, to the Man she is oblig'd by cruel Parents to take for mercenary Reasons, but at the same time she cannot look as if she loved. Her Eye is full of Sorrow, and Reluctance sits in a Frown, while the Offering of the Sacrifice is performed in what we call the Marriage Ceremony. Do you never go to Physic? Cannot you distinguish between the Eyes of those who go to see, from those who come to be seen? I am a Woman turn'd of Thirtie, and am on the Observation a little, therefore if you or your Correspondent had consulted me in your Discourse on the Eye, I could have told you that the Eye of Leonora is slyly wretched while it looks negligent, she looks round her without the Help of the Glasses you speak of, and yet seems to be employ'd on Objects directly before her. This Eye is what affects Chirac midley, and on a sudden, as if it attended to another thing, turns all its Charms against an Ogle. The Eye of Lusitania is an Instrument of premeditated Murder, but the Design being visible, destroys the Execution of it, and with much more Beauty

[Nescio quis Teneros oculus mihi fascinat

'than that of Leucera it is not half so mischievous.
'There is a brave Soldier's Daughter in To-day, that
'by her Eye has been the Death of more than ever
'her Father made fly before him. A beautiful
'Eye makes Silence eloquent, a kind Eye makes 'Contradiction an Assent, an enraged Eye makes 'Beauty deformed. This little Member gives 'Life to every other Part about us, and I believe
'the Story of Argus implies no more than that 'the Eye is in every Part, that is to say, every 'other Part would be maimed, were not its Force
'represented more by the Eye than even by it 'self. But this is Heathen Gnô to those who 'have not covered us by Glances. Till Sir, is a 'Language in which there can be no Deceit, nor 'can a Skillful Observer be imposed upon by Looks
'even among Politicians and Courtiers. If you 'sent of Secret History, by Translating all the 'Looks of the next Assembly of Ladies and Gen'tlemen into Words, to adorn some future Paper

'I am,

SIR,

Your faithful Friend,

Mary Hearstree.

Dear Mr SPECTATOR,

'I have a Son of a Husband that lives a very
'scandalous Life, and wastes away his Body and
'Fortune in Debaucheries and immovables to 'all the Arguments I can urge to him. I would 'gladly know whether in some Cases a Cudgel
'may not be allowed as a good Figure of Speech,
'and whether it may not be lawfully used by a 'Female Orator.

Your humble Servant,

Barbara Crabtree.

Mr SPECTATOR,

'Though I am a Practitioner in the Law of 'some standing, and have heard many eminent
'Pleaders in my Time as well as other eloquent
'Speakers of both Universities, yet I agree with 'you, that Women are better qualified to succeed
'in Oratory than the Men and believe this is to 'be resolved in a natural Cause. You have men'tioned only the Volubility of their Tongue, but 'what do you think of the silent Flattery of their 'pretty Faces, and the Persuasion which even an 'inspired Discourse carries with it when flowing 'from beautiful Lips, to which it would be cruel to 'deny any thing? It is certain too that they are 'possessed of some Springs of Rhetorick which 'Men want, such as Tears, fainting Fits, and the 'like, which I have seen employed upon Occasions
'with good Success. You must know I am a plain
'Man and love my Money, yet I have a Spouse
'who is so great an Orator in this Way, that she 'draws from me what Sum she pleases. Every 'Room in my House is furnished with Trophies
'of her Eloquence, such Cabinets of Piles of China,
'Japan Screens, and costly Jars, and if you were
'to come in on my great Parlour, you would fancy 'yourself in an Indian Ware-house. Besides this 'she keeps a Squirrel, and I am doubly taxed to 'pay for the China she breaks. She is seized with 'periodical Fits about the Time of the Subscrip'tions to a new Opera, and is drowned in Tears

'after having seen any Woman there in finer 'Cloaths than herself. These are Arts of Per'suasion purely Feminine, and which a tender
'Heart cannot resist. What I would therefore 'desire of you is, to prevail with your Friend
'who has promised to dissect a Female Tongue,
'that he would at the same time give us the 'Anatomy of a Female Eye, and explain the 'Springs and Sources which feed it with such ready
'Supplies of Modesty and likewise of Lewd-
'ness. What men, if possible, they may be stopped at 'a reasonable Expence. On the other side, since there is something so strong in the very Image of 'weeping Beauty, it would be worth his Art to 'provide that these eloquent Drops may not more
'be lavished on Ladies employed as Servants
'to their Guard Wards, but reserved for serious
'Occasions in Life to adorn generous Pitties, true
'Penitence, or real Sorrow.

THESE are notions which were current in a great Mind, than the Abhorrence of Envy and Detraction. This Passion reigns more among and Poets, than among any other Set of Men.

Is there are more ambitious of Fame, than those who are conversant in Poetry, it is very natural for such as have not succeeded in it to deprecate the Works of those who have. For since they cannot raise themselves to the Reputation of their Fellow-Writers they must endeavour to sland their own Patch if they would still keep themselves upon a Level with them.

The greatest Wits that ever were produced in our Age, lived together in so good an Understanding and celebrated one another with so much Generosity, that each of them received an additional Lustre from his Contemporaries, and is more famous for having lived with Men of so extraordinary a Genius, than if he had himself been the sole Reader of the Age. I need not tell my Reader that I here point at the Reign of Argus and I believe he will be of my Opinion, that neither Virgil nor Heraeus would have gained so great a Reputation in the World, had they not been the Friends and Admirers of each other. Indeed all the great Writers of that Age, for whom every one has so great an Esteem, stand up together as vouchers for one another's Reputation. But at the same time that Virgil was celebrated by Gallus, Propertius, Horace, Lucan, Tacitus and Ovid, we know that Barus and Martius were his declared Foes and Calumniators.

In our own Country a Man seldom sets up for a Poet, without attacking the Reputation of all his Brothers in the Art. The Ignorance of the the Expletive do in the third, and the ten Monosyllables in the fourth, give such a Beauty to this Passage, as would have been very much admired in an Ancient Poet. The Reader may observe the following Lines in the same View

*A needless Alexandrine ends the Song,
That like a wounded Snake, drags its slow Length along*

And afterwards,

*'Tis not enough no Harshness gives Offence,
The Sound must seem an Echo to the Sense
Soft is the Strain when Zephyr gently blows,
And the smooth Stream in smoother Numbers flows,*

*But when loud Surges lash the sounding Shore,
The hoarse rough Verse should like the Torrent roar*

When Ajax strives some Rock's vast Weight to throw,

*The Line too labours, and the Words move slow,
Not so, when swift Camilla scours the Plain, Flies o'er the unbending Corn, and stuns along the Main*

The beautiful Distich upon Ajax in the foregoing Lines, puts me in mind of a Description in Homer's Odyssey, which none of the Critics have taken notice of.<sup>1</sup> It is where Sisyphus is represented lifting his Stone up the Hill, which is no sooner carried to the Top of it, but it immediately tumbles to the Bottom. This double Motion of the Stone is admirably described in the Numbers of these Verses. As in the four first it is heaved up by several Spondees intermixed with proper Breathing places, and it last trundles down in a continual Line of Dactyls

Καὶ μὴν Σίσυφον εἰσεῖδον, ἱματέρ' ἄλγε'

It would be endless to quote Verses out of Virgil which have this particular Kind of Beauty in the Numbers, but I may take an Occasion in a future Paper to shew several of them which have escaped the Observation of others

I cannot conclude this Paper without taking notice that we have three Poems in our Tongue, which are of the same Nature, and each of them a Master-piece in its Kind, the Essay on Translated Verse,<sup>2</sup> the Essay on the Art of Poetry,<sup>2</sup> and the Essay upon Criticism C

<sup>1</sup> Wentworth Dillon, Earl of Roscommon, author of the 'Essay on Translated Verse,' was nephew and godson to Wentworth, Earl of Strafford. He was born in Ireland, in 1633, educated at the Protestant University of Caen, and was there when his father died. He travelled in Italy, came to England at the Restoration, held one or two court offices, gambled, took a wife, and endeavoured to introduce into England the principles of criticism with which he had found the polite world occupied in France. He planned a society for refining our language and fixing its standard. During the troubles of King James's reign he was about to leave the kingdom, when his departure was delayed by gout, of which he died in 1684. A foremost English representative of the chief literary movement of his time, he translated into blank verse Horace's Art of Poetry, and besides a few minor translations and some short pieces of original verse, which earned from Pope the credit that in all Charles's days Roscommon only boasts unspotted lays,

he wrote in heroic couplets an 'Essay on Translated Verse' that was admired by Dryden, Addison, and Pope, and was in highest honour wherever the French influence upon our literature made itself felt. Roscommon believed in the superior energy of English wit, and wrote himself with care and frequent vigour in the turning of his couplets. It is from this poem that we get the often quoted lines,

*Immodest words admit of no Defence,
For Want of Decency is Want of Sense*

<sup>2</sup> The other piece with which Addison ranks Pope's Essay on Criticism, was by John Sheffield, Duke of Buckingham, who was living when the Spectator first appeared. He died, aged 72, in the year 1721. John Sheffield, by the death of his father, succeeded at the age of nine to the title of Earl of Mulgrave. In the reign of Charles II. he served by sea and land, and was, as well as Marlborough, in the French service. In the reign of James II. he was admitted into the Privy Council, made Lord Chamberlain, and, though still Protestant, attended the King to mass. He succeeded in the Revolution, but remained out of office and disliked King William, who in 1694 made him Marquis of Normanhby. Afterwards he was received into the Cabinet Council, with a pension of £3000. Queen Anne, to whom Walpole says he had made love before her marriage, highly favoured him. Before her coronation she made him Lord Privy Seal, next year he was made first Duke of Normanhby, and then of Buckinghamshire, to exclude any potent claimant to the title, which had been extinct since the miserable death of George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, the author of the Rehearsal. When the Spectator appeared John Sheffield had just built Buckingham House—now a royal palace—on ground granted by the Crown, and taken office as Lord Chamberlain

Σ μὲν ἔπος ἀρετῆς, ὃ δὲ αὐτρίδος ἄχος
διέλλει

WHEN I consider the false Impressions which are received by the Generality of the World, I am troubled at none more than a certain Levity of Thought, which many young Women of Quality have entertained, to the Hazard of their Character, and the certain Misfortune of their Lives. The first of the following Letters may best represent the Faults I would now point at, and the Answer to it the Temper of Mind in a contrary Character.

He wrote more verse than Roscommon and poorer verse. The Essay on Poetry, in which he followed the critical fashion of the day, he was praised into regarding as a masterpiece. He was continually polishing it, and during his lifetime it was re-issued with frequent variations. It is polished quartz, not diamond, a short piece of about 360 lines, which has something to say of each of the chief forms of poetry, from songs to epics. Sheffield shows most natural force in writing upon plays, and here in objecting to perfect characters, he struck out the often quoted line

A faultless monster which the world ne'er saw

When he comes to the epics he is, of course, all for Homer and Virgil

*Read Homer once, and you can read no more,
For all books else appear so mean, so poor,
Verse will seem Prose, but still persist to read,
And Homer will be all the Books you need*

And then it is supposed that 'some Angel' had disclosed to M. Bossu, the French author of the treatise upon Epic Poetry then fashionable, the sacred mysteries of Homer. John Sheffield had a patronizing recognition for the genius of Shakspeare and Milton, and was so obliging as to revise Shakspeare's Julius Caesar and confine the action of that play within the limits prescribed in the French gospel according to the Unities. Pope, however, had in the Essay on Criticism reckoned Sheffield, Duke of Buckingham, among the sounder few.

*Who durst assert the juster ancient Cause
And have restored Wit's Fundamental Laws
Such was the Muse, whose Rules and Practice tell, Nature's chief Masterpiece is writing well*

With those last words which form the second line in the Essay on Poetry Pope's citation has made many familiar. Addison paid young Pope a valid compliment in naming him as a critic in verse with Roscommon, and, what then passed on all hands for a valid compliment, in holding him worthy also to be named as a poet in the same breath with the Lord Chamberlain.

My dear Harriot,

'If thou art she, but oh how fallen, how changed, what an Apostate! how lost to all that's gay and agreeable.' To be married I find is to be hurried alive, I can't conceive it more dismal to be shut up in a Vault to converse with the Shades of my Ancestors, than to be carried down to an old Manor House in the Country, and confined to the Conversation of a sober Husband and an awkward Chamber-maid. For Variety I suppose you may entertain yourself with Malin in her Program-Gown, the Spouse of your Parish Vicar, who has by this time I am sure well furnished you with Receipts for making Salves and Possets, distilling Cordial Waters, making Syrups, and applying Poultices.

'Blest Solitude! I wish thee Joy, my Dear, of thy loved Retirement, which indeed you would persuade me is very agreeable, and different enough from what I have here described. But, Child, I am afraid thy Brains are a little disordered with Romances and Novels. After six Months Marriage to hear thee talk of Love, and print the Country Scenes so softly, is a little extravagant, one would think you lived the Lives of Sylvan Deities, or roved among the Walks of Paradise, like the first happy Pair. But prythee leave these Whimsies, and come to Town in order to live and tell like other Mortals. However, as I am extremely interested in your Reputation, I would willingly give you a little good Advice at your first Appearance under the Character of a married Woman. 'Tis a little Insolence in me perhaps, to advise a Matron, but I am so afraid you'll make so silly a figure as a fond Wife, that I cannot help warning you not to appear in any public Place with your Husband, and never to saunter about St James's Park together. If you presume to enter the Ring at Hide Park, together, you are ruined for ever, nor must you take the least notice of one another at the Play-house or Opera, unless you would be laughed at for a very loving Couple most happily paired in the Yoke of Wedlock. I would recommend the Example of an Acquaintance of ours to your Imitation. She is the most negligent and fashionable Wife in the World, she is hardly ever seen in the same Place with her Husband, and if they happen to meet, you would think them perfect Strangers. She never was heard to name him in his Absence, and takes care he shall never be the Subject of any Discourse that she has a Share in. I hope you'll propose this Lady as a Pattern, tho' I am very much afraid you'll be so silly to think Portia, &c. Sabin and Roman Wives much brighter Examples. I wish it may never come into your Head to imitate those antiquated Creatures so far, as to come into Publick in the Habit as well as Air of a Roman Matron. You make already the Entertainment at Mrs. Modish's Tea-Table she says, she always thought you a discreet Person, and qualified to manage a Family with admirable Prudence. She dies to see what demure and serious Airs Wedlock has given you, but she says she shall never forgive your Choice of so gallant a Man as Belamour to transform him to a meer sober Husband, 'twas unpardonable. You see, my Dear,

'we all envy your Happiness, and no Person more than

Your humble Servant,

'Be not in pain, good Madam, for my Appearance in Town, I shall frequent no publick Places, or make any Visits where the Character of a modest Wife is ridiculous. As for your wild Railery on Matrimony, 'tis all Hypocrisy, you, and all the handsome young Women of our Acquaintance, shew yourselves to no other Purpose than to gain a Conquest over some Man of Worth, in order to bestow your Charms and Fortune on him. There's no Indecency in the Confession, the Design is modest and honourable, and all your Affectation can't disguise it.

'I am married, and have no other Concern but to please the Man I Love, he's the End of every Care I have. If I dress, 'tis for him; if I read a Poem or a Play, 'tis to qualify myself for a Conversation agreeable to his Taste. He's almost the End of my Devotions, half my Prayers are for his Happiness. I love to talk of him, and never hear him named but with Pleasure and Emotion. I am your Friend, and wish your Happiness, but am sorry to see by the Air of your Letter that there are a Set of Women who are got into the Common Place Railery of every Thing that is sober, decent, and proper. Matrimony and the Clergy are the Topicks of People of little Wit and no Understanding. I own to you, I have learned of the Vicar's Wife all you tax me with. She is a discreet, ingenious, pleasant, pious Woman, I wish she had the handling of you and Mrs. Modish, you would find, if you were too free with her, she would soon make you as charming as ever you were, she would make you blush as much as if you had never been fine. Ladies. The Vicar, Madam, is so kind as to visit my Husband, and his agreeable Conversation has brought him to enjoy many sober happy Hours when even I am shut out, and my dear Master is entertained only with his own Thoughts. You live no Goodness in the World, and are not in earnest in any thing you say that is serious, if you do not send me a plain Answer to this. I happened some Days past to be at the Play, where during the Time of Performance, I could not keep my Eyes off from a beautiful young Creature who sat just before me, and who I have been since informed has no Fortune. It would utterly ruin my Reputation for Discretion to marry such a one, and by what I can learn she has a Character of great Modesty, so that there is nothing to be thought on any other Way. My Mind has ever since been so wholly bent on her, that I am much in danger of doing something very extravagant without your speedy Advice to

Per puræ lecto poterunt recreare libello — Hor*

THE Soul, considered abstractedly from its Passions, is of a remiss and sedentary Nature, slow in its Resolves, and languishing in its Executions. The Use therefore of the Passions is to stir it up, and to put it upon Action, to awaken the Understanding, to enforce the Will, and to make the whole Man more vigorous and attentive in the Prosecutions of his Designs. As this is the End of the Passions in general, so it is particularly of Ambition, which pushes the Soul to such Actions as are apt to procure Honour and Reputation to the Actor. But if we carry our Reflections higher, we may discover further Ends of Providence in implanting this Passion in Man kind.

It was necessary for the World, that Arts should be invented and improved, Books written and transmitted to Posterity, Nations conquered and civilized. Now since the proper and genuine Motives to these and the like great Actions, would only influence virtuous Minds, there would be out small Improvements in the World, were there not some common Principle of Action working equally with all Men. And such a Principle is Ambition or a Desire of Fame, by which [great] Endowments are not suffered to be idle and useless to the Publick, and many vicious Men over-reached, as it were, and engaged contrary to their natural Inclinations in a glorious and laudable Course of Action. For we may further observe, that Men of the greatest Abilities are most fired with Ambition. And that on the contrary, mean and narrow Minds are the least rewarded by it. Whether it be that [a Man's Sense of his own] Incapacities makes [him] desirous of coming at Fame, or that [he has] not enough range of Thought to look out for any Good which does not more immediately relate to [his] Interest or Convenience, or that Providence, in the very Frame of [his Soul], would not subject [him] to such a Passion is would be useless to the World, and a Torment to [himself].

Were not this Desire of Fame very strong, the Difficulty of obtaining it, and the Danger of losing it when obtained, would be sufficient to deter a Man from so vain a Pursuit.

How few are there who are furnished with Abilities sufficient to recommend their Actions to the Admiration of the World, and to distinguish

<sup>5</sup> [their]

<sup>7</sup> [them]

<sup>2</sup> [the Sense of their own]

themselves from the rest of Mankind? Providence for the most part sets us upon a Level, and observes a kind of Proportion in its Dispensation to wards us. If it renders us perfect in one Accomplishment, it generally leaves us defective in another, and seems careful rather of preserving every Person from being mean and deficient in his Qualifications, than of making any single one eminent or extraordinary.

And among those who are the most richly endowed by Nature, and accomplished by their own Industry, how few are there whose Virtues are not obscured by the Ignorance, Prejudice or Envy of their Beholders? Some Men cannot discern between a noble and a mean Action. Others are apt to attribute them to some false End or Intention, and others purposely misrepresent or put a wrong Interpretation on them.

But the more to enforce this Consideration, we may observe that those are generally most unsuccessful in their Pursuit after Fame, who are most desirous of obtaining it. It is Salustius's Remark upon Cato, that the less he coveted Glory, the more he acquired it.

Men take in all natural Pleasure in crossing our Inclinations, and disappointing us in what our Hearts are most set upon. When therefore they have discovered the passionate Desire of Fame in the Ambitious Man (as no Temper of Mind is more apt to show it self) they become spring and reserved in their Commendations, they envy him the Satisfaction of an Applause, and look on their Praises rather as a Kindness done to his Person, than as a Tribute paid to his Merit. Others who are free from this natural Perverseness of Temper grow wary in their Praises of one, who sets too great a Value on them, lest they should raise him too high in his own Imagination, and by Consequence remove him to a greater Distance from themselves.

But further, this Desire of Fame naturally betrays the ambitious Man into such Indecencies as are a lessening to his Reputation. He is still afraid lest any of his Actions should be thrown away in private lest his Deserts should be concealed from the Notice of the World, or receive any Disadvantage from the Reports which others make of them. This often sets him on empty Boasts and Ostentations of him-self, and betrays him into vain fantastick Recitals of his own Performances. His Discourse generally leans one Way, and whatever is the Subject of it, tends obliquely either to the detracting from others or to the exalting of him-self. Vanity is the natural Weakness of an ambitious Man, which exposes him to the secret Scorn and Derision of those he converses with and ruins the Character he is so industrious to advance by it. For tho' his Actions are never so glorious, they lose their Lustre when they are drawn at large and set to shine by his own Hand and as the World is more apt to find fault than to commend, the worst will probably be censured when the great Action that occasioned it is forgotten.

Besides this very Desire of Fame is looked on as a Weakness [and] Imperfection in the greatest

Character. A solid and substantial Greatness of Soul looks down with a generous Neglect on the Censures and Applauses of the Multitude, and places a Man beyond the little Noise and Strife of Louange. Accordingly we find in our selves a secret Awe and Veneration for the Character of one who moves about us in a regular and illustrious Course of Virtue without any regard to our good or ill Opinions of him, to our Reproaches or Commendations. As on the contrary it is usual for us, when we would take off from the Fame and Reputation of an Action, to ascribe it to vain Glory, and a Desire of Fame in the Actor. Nor is this common Judgment and Opinion of Mankind ill-founded for certainly it denotes no great Mastery of Mind to be worked up to any noble Action by so selfish a Motive, and to do that out of a Desire of Fame, which we could not be prompted to by a disinterested Love to Mankind or by a generous Passion for the Glory of hum that made us.

This is Fame a thing difficult to be obtained by all, but particularly by those who thirst after it, since most Men have so much either of Ill nature, or of Warmness, as not to grtify [for] sooth the Vanity of the Ambitious Man, and since this very Thirst after Fame naturally betrays him into such Indecencies as are a lessening to his Reputation, and is it self looked upon as a Weakness in the greatest Characters.

In the next Place, Fame is easily lost, and is difficult to be preserved as it was at first to be acquired. But this I shall make the Subject of a following Paper

THESE are many Passions and Tempers of Mind which naturally dispose us to depress and vilify the Merit of one rising in the Esteem of Mankind. All those who made their Entrance into the World with the same Advantages, and were once looked on as his Equals, are apt to think the Fame of his Merits a Reflection on their own Indeserts and will therefore take care to reproach him with the Scandal of some past Action, or derogate from the Worth of the present, that they may still keep him on the same Level with themselves. The like Kind of Consideration often stirs up the Envy of such as were once his Superiors, who think it a Detraction from their Merit to see another get ground upon them and overtake them in the Pursuits of Glory and will therefore endeavour to sink his Reputation, that they may the better preserve their own. Those who were once his Equals envy and defame him, because they now set him their Superior and those who were once his Superiors, because they look upon him as their Equal.

And such a Principle is Ambition or a Desire of Fame, by which [great<sup>1</sup>] Endowments are not suffered to lie idle and useless to the Publick, and many vicious Men over-reached, as it were, and engaged contrary to their natural Inclinations in a glorious and laudable Course of Action. For we may further observe, that Men of the greatest Abilities are most fired with Ambition. And that on the contrary, narrow and narrow Minds are the least actuated by it. Whether it be that [a Man's Sense of his own<sup>2</sup>] Incapacities makes [him<sup>3</sup>] despair of coming at Fame, or that [he has<sup>4</sup>] not enough range of Thought to look out for any Good which does not more immediately relate to [his<sup>5</sup>] Interest or Convenience, or that Providence, in the very Frame of [his Soul<sup>6</sup>], would not subject [him<sup>7</sup>] to such a Passion as would be useless to the World, and a Torment to [himself<sup>8</sup>].

Were not this Desire of Fame very strong, the Difficulty of obtaining it, and the Danger of losing it when obtained, would be sufficient to deter a Man from so vain a Pursuit.

How few are there who are furnished with Abilities sufficient to recommend their Actions to the Admiration of the World, and to distinguish

<sup>3</sup> [them]      <sup>4</sup> [they have]

themselves from the rest of Mankind? Providence for the most part sets us upon a Level, and observes a kind of Proportion in its Dispensation to wards us. If it renders us perfect in one Accomplishment, it generally leaves us defective in another, and seems careful rather of preserving every Person from being mean and deficient in his Qualifications, than of making any single one eminent or extraordinary.

And among those who are the most richly endowed by Nature, and accomplished by their own Industry, how few are there whose Virtues are not obscured by the Ignorance, Prejudice or Envy of their Beholders? Some Men cannot discern between a noble and a mean Action. Others are apt to attribute them to some false End or Intention, and others purposely misrepresent or put a wrong Interpretation on them.

But the more to enforce this Consideration, we may observe that those are generally most unsuccessful in their Pursuit after Fame, who are most desirous of obtaining it. It is Salustius's Remark upon Cato, that the less he coveted Glory, the more he acquired it.

Men take an ill natur'd Pleasure in crossing our Inclinations, and disappointing us in what our Hearts are most set upon. When therefore they have discovered the passionate Desire of Fame in the Ambitious Man (as no Temper of Mind is more apt to show it self) they become sparing and reserved in their Commendations, they envy him the Satisfaction of an Applause, and look on their Praises rather as a Kindness done to his Person, than as a Tribute paid to his Merit. Others who are free from this natural Perverseness of Temper grow wary in their Praises of one, who sets too great a Value on them, lest they should raise him too high in his own Imagination, and by Consequence remove him to a greater Distance from themselves.

But further, this Desire of Fame naturally betrays the ambitious Man into such Indecencies as are a lessening to his Reputation. He is still afraid lest any of his Actions should be thrown away in private lest his Deserts should be concealed from the Notice of the World or receive any Disadvantage from the Reports which others make of them. This often sets him on empty Boasts and Ostentations of himself, and betrays him into vain fantick Recitals of his own Performances. His Discourse generally turns one Way, and whatever is the Subject of it, tends obliquely either to the detracting from others or to the extolling of himself. Vanity is the natural Weakness of an ambitious Man, which exposes him to the secret Scorn and Denial of those he converses with, and ruins the Character he is so inductions to advance by it. For tho' his Actions are never so glorious, they lose their Lustre when they are driven at large and set to show by his own Hand and as the World is more apt to find fault than to commend, the Boast will probably be censured when the great Action that occasioned it is forgotten.

Besides this very Desire of Fame is looked on as a Manner's [and?] Imperfection in the greatest

Character. A solid and substantial Greatness of Soul looks down with a generous Neglect on the Censures and Applauses of the Multitude, and places a Man beyond the little Noise and Strife of Tongues. Accordingly we find in our selves a secret Awe and Veneration for the Character of one who moves thovous in a regular and illustrious Course of Virtue without any regard to our good or ill Opinions of him, to our Reproaches or Commendations. As on the contrary it is usual for us, when we would take off from the Fame and Reputation of an Action, to ascribe it to Van Glory, and a Desire of Fame in the Actor. Nor is this common Judgment and Opinion of Mankind ill-founded for certainly it denotes no great Bravery of Mind to be worked up to any noble Action by so selfish a Motive, and to do that out of a Desire of Fame, which we could not be prompted to by a disinterested Love to Mankind, or by a generous Passion for the Glory of him that made us.

This is Fame a thing difficult to be obtained by all, but particularly by those who thirst after it, since most Men have so much either of ill nature, or of Wariness, as not to gratify [or?] soothe the Vanity of the Ambitious Man, and since this very Thirst after Fame naturally betrays him into such Indecencies as are a lessening to his Reputation, and is it self looked upon as a Weakness in the greatest Characters.

In the next Place, Fame is easily lost, and as difficult to be preserved as it was at first to be acquired. But this I shall make the Subject of a following Paper. C

ἡμῶν γὰρ τε καὶ τῆς τέλει αὐτῆς ἀντὶ τοῦ μὲν αἰῶνος

THE FIRST of many Passions and Tempers of Mind which naturally dispose us to depress and vilify the Merit of one rising in the Esteem of Mankind. All those who made their Entrance into the World with the same Advantages, and were once looked on as his Equals, are apt to think the Fame of his Merits a Reflection on their own Indeserts and will therefore take care to reproach him with the Scandal of some past Action, or derogate from the Worth of the present, that they may still keep him on the same Level with themselves. The like kind of Consideration often stirs up the Envy of such as were once his Superiors, who think it a Detraction from their Merit to see another get ground upon them and over take them in the Pursuits of Glory, and will therefore endeavour to sink his Reputation, that they may the better preserve their own. Those who were once his Equals envy and defame him because they now see him their Superior and those who were once his Superiors, because they look upon him as their Equal.

I at further, a Man whose extraordinary Reputation thus lifts him up to the Notice and (th

servation of Mankind draws a Multitude of Eyes upon him that will narrowly inspect every Part of him, consider him nicely in all Views, and not be a little pleased when they have taken him in the worst and most disadvantageous Light. There are many who find a Pleasure in contradicting the common Reports of Fame, and in spreading abroad the Weaknesses of an exalted Character. They publish their ill-natur'd Discoveries with a secret Pride, and applaud themselves for the Singularity of their Judgment which has searched deeper than others, detected what the rest of the World have overlooked, and found a Flaw in what the Generality of Mankind admires. Others there are who proclaim the Errors and Infirmitics of a great Man with an inward Satisfaction and Complacency, if they discover none of the like Errors and Infirmitics in themselves for while they are exposing anothers Weaknesses, they are tacitly aiming at their own Commendations, who are not subject to the like Infirmitics, and are apt to be transported with a secret Kind of Vanity to see themselves superior in some respects to one of a sublime and celebrated Reputation. Nay, it very often happens, that none are more industrious in publishing the Blemishes of an extraordinary Reputation, than such as lie open to the same Censures in their own Characters, as either hoping to excuse their own Defects by the Authority of so high an Example, or using an imaginary Applause to themselves for resembling a Person of an exalted Reputation, though in the blamable Parts of his Character. If all these secret Springs of Detraction fail, yet very often a vain Ostentation of Wit sets a Man on attacking an established Name, and sacrificing it to the Mirth and Laughter of those about him. A Satyr or a Libel on one of the common Stump, never meets with that Reception and Approbation among its Readers, as what is aimed at a Person whose Merit places him upon an Eminence, and gives him a more conspicuous Figure among Men. Whether it be that we think it shews greater Art to expose and turn to ridicule a Man whose Character seems so improper a Subject for it, or that we are pleased by some implicit Kind of Revenge to see him taken down and humbled in his Reputation, and in some measure reduced to our own Rank, who had so far raised himself above us in the Reports and Opinions of Mankind.

Thus we see how many dark and intricate Motives there are to Detraction and Defamation, and how many malicious Spies are searching into the Actions of a great Man, who is not always the best prepared for so narrow an Inspection. For we may generally observe, that our Admiration of a famous Man lessens upon our nearer Acquaintance with him and that we seldom hear the Description of a celebrated Person, without a Catalogue of some notorious Weaknesses and Infirmitics. The Reason may be, because any little Slip is more conspicuous and observable in his Conduct than in anothers, as it is not of a piece with the rest of his Character, or because it is impossible for a Man at the same time to be attentive to the more important [Part] of his Life, and to keep a watchful Eye over all the inconsiderable Circumstances of his Behaviour and Conversation, or because, as we have before observed, the same Temper of Mind which inclines us to a Desire of Fame, naturally betrays us into such Slips and Unwinnings as are not incident to Men of a contrary Disposition.

After all it must be confess'd, that a noble and triumphant Merit often breaks through and dissipates these little Spots and Sullies in its Reputation, but if by a mistaken Pursuit after Fame, or through human Infirmary, any false Step be made in the more momentous Concerns of Life, the whole Scheme of ambitious Designs is broken and disappointed. The smaller Stains and Blemishes may die away and disappear amidst the Brightness that surrounds them, but a Blot of a deeper Nature casts a Shade on all the other Beauties, and darkens the whole Character. How difficult therefore is it to preserve a great Name, when he that has acquired it is so obnoxious to such little Weaknesses and Infirmitics as are no small Diminution to it when discovered, especially when they are so industriously proclaimed, and aggravated by such as were once his Superiors or Equals by such as would set to show their Judgment or their Wit, and by such as are guilty or innocent of the same Slips or Misconducts in their own Behaviour?

But were there none of these Dispositions in others to censure a famous Man, nor any such Miscarriages in himself, yet would he meet with no small Trouble in keeping up his Reputation in all its Height and Splendour. There must be always a noble Train of Actions to preserve his Fame in Life and Motion. For when it is once at a Stand, it naturally flags and languishes. Admiration is a very short-lived Passion, that immediately decays upon growing familiar with its Object, unless it be still fed with fresh Discoveries, and kept alive by a new perpetual Succession of Miracles rising up to its View. And even the greatest Actions of a celebrated [Person's] labour under this Disadvantage, that however surprising and extraordinary they may be, they are no more than what are expected from him but on the contrary, if they fall any thing below the Opinion that is conceived of him, tho' they might raise the Reputation of another, they are a Diminution to his.

One would think there should be something wonderfully pleasing in the Possession of Fame, that, notwithstanding all these mortifying Considerations, can engage a Man in so desperate a Pursuit and yet if we consider the little Happiness that attends a great Character, and the Multitude of Disquietudes to which the Desire of it subjects an ambitious Mind, one would be still the more surprised to see so many restless Candidates for Glory.

Ambition raises a secret Tumult in the Soul, it inflames the Mind, and puts it into a violent Hurry of Thought. It is still reaching after an empty imaginary Good, that has not in it the Power to abate or satisfy it. Most other things we long for can allay the Cravings of their proper Satisfactions, and for a while set the Appetite at Rest. But Fame is a Good so wholly foreign to our Natures, that we have no Faculty in the Soul adapted to it, nor any Organ in the Body to relish it: an Object of Desire placed out of the Possibility of Fruition. It may indeed fill the Mind for a while with a giddy kind of Pleasure, but it is such a Pleasure as makes a Man restless and uneasy under it, and which does not so much satisfy the present Thirst, as it excites fresh Desires, and sets the Soul on new Enterprises. For how few ambitious Men are there, who have got as much Fame as they desired, and whose Thirst after it has not been as eager in the very Height of their Reputation, as it was before they became known and eminent among Men? There is not any Circumstance in Cæsar's Character which gives me a greater Idea of him, than a Saying which Cicero tells us he frequently made use of in private Conversation, Ut at he was satisfied with his Share of Life and Fortune, Se satis vel ad Naturam, vel ad Gloriam visisse. Many indeed have given over their Pursuits after Fame, but that has proceeded either from the Disappointments they have met in it, or from their Experience of the little Pleasure which attends it, or from the better Informations or natural Coldness of old Age, but seldom from a full Satisfaction and Acquiescence in their present Enjoyments of it.

Nor is Fame only unsatisfying in it self, but the Desire of it lays us open to many accidental Troubles which those are free from who have no such tender Regard for it. How often is the ambitious Man cast down and disappointed, if he receives no Prize where he expected it? Nay how often is he mortified with the very Prizes he receives, if they do not rise so high as he thinks they ought, which they seldom do unless increased by Flattery, since few Men have so good an Opinion of us as we have of our selves? But if the ambitious Man can be so much grieved even with Prize it self, how will he be able to bear up under Scandal and Defamation? For the same Temper of Mind which makes him desire Fame, makes him hate Reproach. If he can be transported with the extraordinary Prizes of Men he will be as much dejected by their Censures. How little therefore is the Happiness of an ambitious Man, who gives every one a Dominion over it, who thus subjects himself to the good or ill Speeches of others, and puts it in the Power of every malicious Tongue to throw him into a Fit of Melancholy, and destroy his natural Rest and Repose of Mind? Especially when we consider that the World is more apt to censure than applaud, and himself fuller of Imperfections than Virtues.

We may further observe, that such a Man will be more grieved for the Loss of Fame, than he could have been pleased with the Enjoyment of it. For tho' the Presence of this imaginary Good cannot make us happy, the Absence of it may make us miserable. Because in the Enjoyment of an Object we only find that Share of Pleasure which it is capable of giving us, but in the Loss of it we do not proportion our Grief to the real

Value it bears, but to the Value our Fancies and Imaginations set upon it.

So inconsiderable is the Satisfaction that Fame brings along with it, and so great the Disquietudes, to which it makes us liable. The Desire of it stirs up very uneasy Motions in the Mind, and is rather inflamed than satisfied by the Presence of the Thing desired. The Enjoyment of it brings but very little Pleasure, tho' the Loss or Want of it be very sensible and afflicting, and even this little Happiness is so very precarious, that it wholly depends on the Will of others. We are not only tortured by the Reproaches which are offered us, but are disappointed by the Silence of Men when it is unexpected, and humbled even by their Praises.<sup>2</sup> C

Οὐχ' εὐδαι Διός
Ὀφθαλμοὶ ἐγγυς ὅ' ἐστι λαὶ παρῶν ποῦνι
Incert. ex Stob

THAT I might not lose myself upon a Subject of so great Extent as that of Fame, I have treated it in a particular Order and Method. I have first of all considered the Reasons why Providence may have implanted in our Mind such a Principle of Action. I have in the next Place shewn from many Considerations, first that Fame is a thing difficult to be obtained, and easily lost, Secondly, that it brings the ambitious Man very little Happiness, but subjects him to much Uneasiness and Dissatisfaction. I shall in the last Place shew, that it hinders us from obtaining an End which we have Abilities to acquire, and which is accompanied with Fullness of Satisfaction. I need not tell my Reader, that I mean by this End that Happiness which is reserved for us in another World, which every one has Abilities to procure, and which will bring along with it Fullness of Joy and Pleasures for evermore.

How the Pursuit after Fame may hinder us in the Attainment of this great End, I shall leave the Reader to collect from the three following Considerations.

First, Because the strong Desire of Fame breeds several vicious Habits in the Mind.

Secondly, Because many of those Actions, which are apt to procure Fame, are not in their Nature conducive to this our ultimate Happiness.

Thirdly, Because if we should follow the same Actions to be the proper Instruments, both of requiring Fame, and of procuring this Happiness, they would nevertheless fail in the Attainment of this last End, if they proceeded from a Desire of the first.

These three Propositions are self evident to those who are versed in Speculations of Morality. For which Reason I shall not enlarge upon them, but proceed to a Point of the same Nature, which may open to us a more uncommon Field of Speculation.

From what has been already observed, I think we may make a natural Conclusion, that it is the greatest Folly to seek the Praise or Approbation of any Being, besides the Supreme; and that for these two Reasons, because in other Beings can make a right Judgment of us, and esteem us according to our Merits; and because we can procure no considerable Benefit or Advantage from the Esteem and Approbation of any other Being.

In the first Place no other Being can make a right Judgment of us, and esteem us according to our Merits. Created Beings see nothing but our Outside; and can therefore only frame a Judgment of us from our external Actions and Behaviour, but how unfit these are to give us a right Notion of each other's Perfections may appear from several Considerations. There are many Virtues, which in their own Nature are incapable of any outward Representation. Many silent Perfections in the Soul of a good Man, which are great Ornaments to human Nature, but not able to discover themselves to the Knowledge of others: they are transacted in private, without Noise or Show, and are only visible to the great Searcher of Hearts. What Actions can express the entire Purity of Thought which refines and sanctifies a virtuous Man? That secret Rest and Contentedness of Mind, which gives him a Perfect Enjoyment of his present Condition? That inward Pleasure and Complacency, which he feels in doing Good? That Delight and Satisfaction which he takes in the Prosperity and Happiness of another? These and the like Virtues are the hidden Beauties of a Soul, the secret Graces which cannot be discovered by a mortal Eye; but make the Soul lovely and precious in his Sight, from whom no Secrets are concealed. Again, there are many Virtues which want an Opportunity of exerting and shewing themselves in Actions. Every Virtue requires Time and Place, a proper Object and a fit Conjunction of Circumstances, for the due Exercise of it. A State of Poverty obscures all the Virtues of Liberty and Munificence. The Patience and Fortitude of a Martyr or Confessor he concealed in the flourishing Times of Christianity. Some Virtues are only seen in Affliction, and some in Prosperity: some in private, and others in a publick Capacity. But the great Sovereign of the World beholds every Perfection in its Obscurity, and not only sees what we do, but what we would do. He views our Behaviour in every Concurrence of Affairs, and sees us engaged in all the Possibilities of Action. He discovers the Martyr and Confessor without the same Actions may represent a Man as hypocritical and designing to one, which make him appear a Saint or Hero to another. He therefore who looks upon the Soul through its outward Actions, often sees it through a deceitful Medium, which is apt to discolour and pervert the Object. So that on this Account also, He is the only proper Judge of our Perfections, who does not guess at the Sincerity of our Intentions from the Goodness of our Actions, but weighs the Goodness of our Actions by the Sincerity of our Intentions.

But further, it is impossible for outward Actions to represent the Perfections of the Soul, because they can never shew the Strength of those Principles from whence they proceed. They are not adequate Expressions of our Virtues, and can only shew us what Habits are in the Soul, without discovering the Degree and Perfection of such Habits. They are at best but weak Resemblances of our Intentions, faint and imperfect Copies that may represent us with the general Design, but can never express the Beauty and Life of the Original. But the great Judge of all the Earth knows every different State and Degree of human Improvement from those weak Stirrings and Tendencies of the Will which have not yet formed themselves into regular Purposes and Designs, to the last entire finishing and Consummation of a good Habit. He beholds the first imperfect Rudiments of a Virtue in the Soul, and keeps a watchful Eye over it in all its Progress, 'till it has received every Grace it is capable of, and appears in its full Beauty and Perfection. Thus we see that none but the Supreme Being can esteem us according to our proper Merits, since all others must judge of us from our outward Actions, which can never give them a just Estimate of us, since there are many Perfections of a Man which are not capable of appearing in Actions, many which, allowing no natural Incapacity of shewing themselves, wait an Opportunity of doing it; or should they all meet with an Opportunity of appearing by Actions, yet those Actions may be misinterpreted, and applied to wrong Principles; or though they plainly discovered the Principles from whence they proceeded, they could never shew the Degree, Strength and Perfection of those Principles.

And as the Supreme Being is the only proper Judge of our Perfections, so is he the only fit Rewarder of them. This is a Consideration that comes home to our Interest, as the other adapts it self to our Ambition. And what could the most aspiring, or the most selfish Man desire more, were he to form the Notion of a Being to whom he would recommend himself, than such a Knowledge as can discover the least Appearance of Perfection in him, and such a Goodness as will proportion a Reward to it.

before Men and Angels, and pronounce to him in the Presence of the whole Creation that best and most significant of Applauders, Well done, thou good and faithful Servant, enter thou into thy Master's Joy

Diode et Impera

PLEASURE and Recreation of one Kind or other are absolutely necessary to relieve our Minds and Bodies from too constant Attention and Labour. Where therefore publick Diversions are tolerated it behoves Persons of Distinction, with their Power and Example, to preside over them in such a Manner as to check any thing that tends to the Corruption of Manners, or which is too mean or trivial for the Entertainment of respectable Creatures. As to the Diversions of this kind in this Town, we owe them to the Arts of Poetry and Music. My own private Opinion, with Relation to such Recreations, I have heretofore given with all the Frankness imaginable, what concerns those Arts at present the Reader shall have from my Correspondents. The first of the Letters with which I requit myself for this Day is written by one who proposes to improve our Entertainments of Dramatick Poetry, and the other comes from three Persons, who as soon as named, will be thought capable of advancing the present State of Music.

MR SPECTATOR,

I am considerably obliged to you for your speedy Publication of my last in yours of the 18th Instant and am in no small Hopes of being settled in the Post of Comptroller of the Cries. Of all the Objections I have heard since after in publick Coffee-houses there is but one that seems to carry any Weight with it, viz That such a Post would come too near the Nature of a Monopoly. Now, Sir, because I would have all Sorts of People made easy, and being willing to have more Strings than one to my Bow, in case that of Comptroller should fail me, I have since formed another Project, which being grounded on the dividing a present Monopoly I hope will give the Publick an Equivalent to their still Content. You know, Sir, it is allowed that the Business of the Stage is, as the Latin has it In-cunda et Idonea ducere Vitæ. Now there being but one Dramatick Theatre licensed for the Delight and Profit of this extensive Metropolis, I do humbly propose, for the Convenience of such of its Inhabitants as are too distant from Covent Garden, that another Theatre of Lace may be erected in some spacious Part of the City and that the Direction thereof may be made a Franchise in Fee to me, and my Heirs for ever. And that the Town may have no Jealousy of my ever coming to an Union with the Set of Actors now in being, I do further propose to constitute for my Deputy my near Kinsman and Adventurer,

Kit Crewket, whose long Experience and Improvements in those Affairs need no Recommendation. 'Twas obvious to every Spectator what a quite different Look the Stage was upon during his Government and had he not been bolted out of his Trap-Doors, his Garrison might have held out for ever, he having by long Pains and Perseverance arriv'd at the Art of making his Acting fight without Pay or Provisions. I must confess it, with a melancholy Amaze-ment, I see so wonderful a Genius laid aside, and the rude Slaves of the Stage now become us Masters, Dunces that will be sure to suppress all Theatrical Intertaiments and Activities that they are not able themselves to shine in.

Every Man that goes to a Play is not oblig'd to have either Wit or Understanding, and I must own it, that all who go there should see something which may improve them in a Way of which they are capable. In short, Sir, I would have something done as well as said on the Stage. A Man may have no active Body, though he has not a quail Conception for the Imagination therefore of such as are, as I may so speak, unpoetical Wits or mumble Fellows, I would fain ask any of the present Mismanagers, Why should not hope-drancers, Vaulters, Tumblers, Ladder-rollers, and Posture-makers appear again on our Stage? After such a Representation, a Five bar Gate would be leaped with a better Grace next Time any of the Audience went a Hunting. Sir, these things cry loud for Reformation and fall properly under the Province of SPECTATOR General but how indeed should it be otherwise, while Fellows (that for Twenty Years together were never paid but as their Master was in the Humour) now presume to pay others more than ever they had in their Lives, and in Contempt of the Practice of Persons of Condition, have the Insolence to owe no Tradesman a Farthing at the End of the Week. Sir, all I propose is the publick Good, for no one can imagine I shall ever get a private Shilling by it. Therefore I hope you will recommend this Matter in one of your this Week's Papers, and desire when my House opens you will accept the Liberty of it for the trouble you have receiv'd from,

SIR,

I S I have Assurances Your Humble Servant, that the Frank maker will declare for us.

THESE are some Things which cannot come under certain Rules, but which one would think could not need them. Of this kind are outward Civilities and Salutations. These one would imagine might be regulated by every Man's Common Sense without the Help of an Instructor, but that which we call Common Sense suffers under that Word for it sometimes implies no more than that Faculty which is common to all Men, but sometimes signifies right Reason, and what all Men should consent to. In this latter Acceptation of the Phrase, it is no great Wonder People err so much against it, since it is not every one who is possessed of it and there are several who against common Rules and Fashions, dare obey it's dictates. As to Salutations, which I was about to talk of I observe as I wrote that I own there are great Inconveniences committed with regard to this Particular. You shall sometimes see a Man begin the Offer of a Salutation, and observe a forbidding Air, or escaping Eye, in the Person he is going to salute, and stop short in the Pale of his Neck. Thus in the Person who believed he could do it with a good Grace and was refused the Opportunity, is justly repented with a Coldness the whole ensuing Season. Your great Beauties, People in much Favour or by any Means or for any Purpose overset are apt to practise this which one may call the preventing Aspect, and throw their Attention another Way, lest they should confer a Bow or a Curtsy upon a Person who might not appear to deserve that Dignity. Others you shall find so obsequious, and so very courteous, as there is an escaping their Frowns of this Kind. Of this Sort may be a Man who is in the fifth or sixth Degree of Favour with a Minister; this good Creature is resolved to shew the World, that great Honours cannot at all change his Manners. he is the same civil Person he ever was. he will venture his Neck to bow out of a Coach in full Speed, at once, to shew he is full of Business, and yet is not so taken up as to forget his old Friend. With a Man, who is not so well formed for Courtship and elegant Behaviour, such a Gentleman as this seldom finds his Account in the Return of his Compliments, but he will still go on, for he is in his own Way, and must not omit let the Neglect fall on your Side, or where it will, his Business is still to be well-bred to the End. I think I have read in one of our English Comedies, a Description of a Fellow that affected knowing every Body, and for Want of Judgment in Time and Place would bow and smile in the Face of a Judge sitting in the Court, would sit in an opposite Gallery and smile in the Minister's Face as he came up into the Pulpit, and nod as if he alluded to some Familiarities between them in another Place. But now I happen to speak of Salutation at Church, I must take notice that several of my Correspondents have importuned me to consider that Subject, and settle the Point of Decorum in that Particular.

I do not pretend to be the best Courtier in the World, but I have often on publick Occasions thought it a very great Absurdity in the Company (during the Royal Presence) to exchange Salutations from all Parts of the Room, when certainly Common Sense should suggest, that all Regards at that Time should be engaged, and cannot be diverted to any other Object, without Disrespect to the Sovereign. But as to the Complaint of my Correspondents, it is not to be imagined what Offence some of them take at the Custom of Saluting in Places of Worship. I have a very angry Letter from a Lady, who tells me (so) one of her Acquaintance, [who,] out of meer Pride and a Pretence to be polite, takes upon her to return no Civilities, done to her in Time of Divine Service, and is the most religious Woman for no other Reason but to appear a Woman of the best Quality in the Church. This absurd Custom had better be abolished than returned, if it were but to prevent I will of no less, her a Nourer than this is. But I am informed of Object one much more considerable. A Dissenter of Rank and Distinction was lately prevailed upon by a Friend of his to come to one of the greatest Congregations of the Church of Lugubra about Town. After the Service was over, he declared he was very well satisfied with the little Ceremony which was used towards God Almighty. but at the same time he feared he should not be able to go through those required towards one another. As to this Point he was in a State of Despair, and feared he was not well bred enough to be a Convert. There have been many Scandals of this Kind given to our Protestant Dissenters from the outward Pomp and Respect we take to our selves in our Religious Assemblies. A Quaker who came one Day into a Church, fixed his Eyes upon an old Lady with a Carpet Brier, then that from the Pulpit before her, expecting when she would hold forth. An Anabaptist who designs to come over himself, and all his Family, within few Months, is sensible they want Preceding enough for our Congregations, and has sent his two [eldest] Daughters to learn to dance, that they may not misbehave themselves at Church. It is worth considering whether, in regard to well bred People with scrupulous Consciences, a good Christian of the best Air in the World ought not rather to deny herself the Opportunity of shewing so many Graces, than keep a bishful Proselyte without the Pale of the Church.

Singula de nobis annis prevedat tur cunctes—Hor

MR SPECTATOR,

I AM now in the Sixty fifth Year of my Age, and having been the greater Part of my Days a Man of Pleasure, the Decay of my [elder]

'Faculties is a Stagnation of my Life But how is it, Sir, that my Appetites are increased upon me with the Loss of Power to gratify them? I write this, like a Criminal, to warn People to enter upon what Reformation they may please to make in themselves in their Youth, and not expect they shall be capable of it from a fond Opinion some have often in their Months, that if we do not leave our Desires they will leave us. It is far otherwise, I am now as warm in my Dress, and as suppliant if I see a pretty Woman, as when in my Youth I stood upon a Bench in the Pit to survey the whole Circle of Beauties. The Folly is so extravagant with me, and I went on with an little Cheek of my Desires, or Resignation of them, that I can assure you, I very often merely to entertain my own Thoughts, sit with my Spectacles on, writing Love-Letters to the Beauties that have been long since in their Graves. This is to warm my Heart with the faint Memory of Delights which were once agreeable to me, but how much happier would my Life have been now, if I could have looked back on my worthy Action done for my Country? If I had laid out that which I profused in Luxury and Wantonness, in Acts of Generosity or Charity? I have lived a Bachelor to this Day, and instead of a numerous Offspring, with which, in the regular Ways of Life, I might possibly have delighted my self, I have only to amuse my self with the Reputation of Old Stories and Intrigues which no one will believe I ever was concerned in. I do not know whether you have ever treated of it or not, but you cannot fall on a better Subject, than that of the Art of growing old. In such a Lecture you must propose, that no one set his Heart upon what is transient; the Beauty grows wrinkled while we are yet gazing at her. The witty Man sinks into a Humourist imperceptibly, for want of reflecting that all Things around him are in a Flux, and continually changing. Thus he is in the Space of ten or fifteen Years surrounded by a new Set of People, whose Manners are as natural to them as his Delights, Method of Thinking, and Mode of Living, were formerly to him and his Friends. But the Mischief is, he looks upon the same kind of Errors which he himself was guilty of with an Eye of Scorn, and with that sort of Ill-will which Men entertain against each other for different Opinions. Thus a crasse Constitution, and an unsteady Mind is filled with various Passions for young Men doing foolishly what it is folly to do it all. Dear Sir, this is my present State of Mind, I hate those I should laugh at, and envy those I condemn. The Time of Youth and vigorous Manhood passed the Way in which I have disposed of it, is attended with these Consequences but to those who live and pass away Life as they ought all Parts of it are equally pleasant only the Memory of good and worthy Actions is a Rest which must give a quicker Relish to the Soul than ever it could possibly taste in the highest Enjoyments or Jollities of Youth. As for me, if I sit down in my great Chair and begin to ponder the Vigories of a Child are not more ridiculous than the Circumstances which are heaped up in my Memory

'Fine Gowns, Country Dances, Ends of Times, interrupted Conversations, and mid night Quarrels, are what must necessarily compose my Soliloquy. I beg of you to print this, that some Ladies of my Acquaintance, and my Year, may be persuaded to wear warm Night caps, thus cold Season and that my old friend Jack Lavender may buy him a Cane, and not creep with the Air of a Strut. I must add to all this, that if it were not for one Pleasure, which I thought a very mean one 'till of very late Years, I should have no one great Satisfaction left, but if I live to the 10th of March, 1714, and all my Securities are good, I shall be worth Fifty thousand Pound

I am, Sir,

Your most humble Servant,
Jack Astorby

Mr SPECTATOR,

'You will infinitely oblige a distressed Lover, if you will insert in your very next Paper, the following Letter to my Mistress. You must know, I am not a Person apt to despair, but she has got an odd Humour of stopping short unaccountably, and, as she herself told a Confident of hers, she has cold Fits. These fits shall last her a Month or six Weeks together and as she falls into them without Provocation, so it is to be hoped she will return from them without the Merit of new Services. But Life and Love will not admit of such Intervals, therefore pray let her be admonished as follows

Madam,

'I Love you, and I honour you therefore pray do not tell me of waiting, till Decencies, till Forms, till Humours are consulted and gratified. If you have that happy Constitution as to be indolent for ten Weeks together, you should consider that all that while I burn in Impatience and Ievers but still you say it will be time enough, tho' I and you too grow older while we are yet talking. Which do you think the more reasonable, that you should alter a State of Indifference for Happiness, and that to oblige me, or I live in Torment, and that to have no Manner of Obligation upon you? While I indulge your Insensibility I am doing nothing if you favour my Passion, you are bestowing bright Desires, gay Hopes, generous Cares, noble Resolutions and transporting Raptures upon,

Madam,

Your most devoted humble Servant

Mr SPECTATOR,

'Here's a Gentlewoman lodges in the same House with me that I never did any Injury to in my whole Life and she is always railing at me to those that she knows will tell me of it. Don't you think she is in Love with me? or would you have me break my Mind yet or not?

Your Servant,
I B

Mr SPECTATOR,

'I am a Footman in a great Family, and am in Love with the House maid. We were all at Hot coekles last Night in the Hall these hot days, when I lay down and was blinded, she pulled off her Shoe, and hit me with the Heel

'such a Ray, as almost broke my Heart to Pieces
'Pray, Sir, was this Love or Spite? I.

Γάμος γὰρ ἀνθρώποισιν ὑκαταῖον ἀλλοῦ
[arg. vel Poet.]

MY Father, whom I mentioned in my first Speculation, and whom I must always name with Honour and Gratitude, has very frequently talked to me upon the Subject of Marriage I was in my younger Years engaged, partly by his Advice, and partly by my own Inclinations in the Courtship of a Person who had a great deal of Beauty, and did not at my first Approaches seem to have any Aversion to me, but as my natural Taciturnity hindered me from showing my self to the best Advantage she by degrees began to look upon me as a very silly Fellow, and being resolved to regard Merit more than any Thing else in the Persons who made their Applications to her, she married a Captain of Dragoons who happened to be beating up for Recruits in those Parts.

This unlucky Accident has given me an Aversion to pretty I allow ever since, and discouraged me from trying my Fortune with the Fair Sex The Observations which I made in this Conjunction, and the repeated Advices which I received at that Time from the good old Man above mentioned, have produced the following Essay upon Love and Marriage.

The pleasantest Part of a Man's Life is generally that which passes in Courtship, provided his Passion be sincere, and the Party beloved kind with Discretion Love, Desire, Hope, all the pleasing Motions of the Soul rise in the Pursuit.

It is easier for an artful Man who is not in Love, to persuade his Mistress he has a Passion for her, and to succeed in his Pursuits, than for one who loves with the greatest Violence True Love has ten thousand Grievs, Impatience and Resentments, that render a Man unamiable in the Eyes of the Person whose Affection he solicits besides, that it sinks his Figure, gives him Fears, Apprehensions and Poorness of Spirit, and often makes him appear ridiculous where he has a mind to recommend himself.

Those Marriages generally abound most with Love and Constraint, that are preceded by a long Courtship The Passion should strike Root, and gather Strength before Marriage be gratified on it A long Course of Hopes and Expectations fixes the Idea in our Minds and habituates us to a Fondness of the Person beloved.

There is Nothing of so great Importance to us, as the good Qualities of one to whom we join our selves for Life, they do not only make our present State agreeable, but often determine our Happiness to all Eternity Where the Choice is left to Friends, the chief Point under Consideration is an Estate Where the Parties chuse for themselves, their Thoughts turn most upon the Person They have both their Reasons The first would procure many Conveniences and Pleasures of Life to the Party whose Interests they espouse and at the same time may hope that the Wealth of their Friend will turn to their own Credit and Advantage The others are preparing for themselves a perpetual Feast A good Person does not only chuse, but continue Love, and breeds a secret Pleasure and Complacency in the beholder, when the first Heats of Desire are extinguished It puts the Wife or Husband in Countenance both among Friends and Strangers, and generally fills the Family with a healthy and beautiful Race of Children.

I should prefer a Woman that is agreeable in my own Eye, and not deformed in that of the World, to a Celebrated Beauty If you marry one remarkably beautiful, you must have a violent Passion for her, or you have not the proper Taste of her Charms, and if you have such a Passion for her, it is odds but it [would] be smothered with Fears and Jealousies.

Good Nature and Evenness of Temper will give you an easy Companion for Life, Virtue and good Sense, in recreable Friend Love and Constraint, a good Wife or Husband Where we meet one Person with all these Accomplishments, we find an hundred without any one of them The World, notwithstanding, is more intent on Trains and Enriches, and all the showy Parts of Life we love rather to dazzle the Multitude, than consult our proper Interest[s] and, as I have elsewhere observed, it is one of the most unaccountable Passions of human Nature, that we are at greater Pains to appear easy and happy to others, than really to make our selves so Of all Disputes, that in Humour makes the most unhappy Marriages, yet scarce enters into our Thoughts at the contriving of them Several that are in this Respect unequally yoked and unequal for Life, with a Person of a particular Character, might have been pleased and happy with a Person of a contrary one, notwithstanding they are both perhaps equally virtuous and laudable in their kind.

Before Marriage we cannot be too inquisitive and discerning in the Faults of the Person beloved, nor after it too dim-sighted and superficial However perfect and accomplished the Person appears to you at a Distance, you will find many Weaknesses and Imperfections in her Humour, upon a more intimate Acquaintance, which you never discovered or perhaps suspected Here therefore Discretion and Good-nature are to shew their Strength the first will hinder your Thoughts from dwelling on what is disagreeable, the other will rise in you all the Tenderness of Compassion and Humanity, and by degrees soften those very Imperfections into Beauties.

Marriage enlarges the Scene of our Happiness and Miseries A Marriage of Love is pleasant a Marriage of Interest easy and a Marriage, where both meet, happy A happy Marriage has in it all the Pleasures of Friendship, all the Enjoyments of Sense and Reason, and indeed all the Sweetness of Life Nothing is a greater Mark of a degenerate and vicious Age, than the common Ridicule [which] passes on this State of Life. It is, indeed, only happy in those who can look down with Scorn or Neglect on the Impieties of the Times, and tread the Paths of Life together in a constant uniform Course of Virtue

Aulus emulato Ilium iusta Jervest—Ovid

I THINK myself highly obliged to the Publick for their kind Acceptance of a Paper which visits them every Morning, and has in it none of those Seis singes that recommended so many of the Writings which are in Vogue among us

As, on the one Side, my Paper has not in it a single Word of News, a Reflection in Politics nor a Strake of Party: so on the other, there are no Fashionable Touches of Insideliess, no obscene Ideas, no Satire upon Priesthood, Marriage, and the like popular Topicks of Ridicule: no private Scandal, nor any Thing that may tend to the Defamation of particular Persons, Families, or Societies

There is not one of these above mentioned Subjects that would not sell a very indifferent Paper, could I think of gratifying the Publick by such mean and base Methods. But notwithstanding I have rejected every Thing that savour of Party, every Thing that is loose and immoral, and every Thing that might create Uneasiness in the Minds of particular Persons, I find that the Demand of my Papers has increased every Month since their first Appearance in the World. This does not perhaps reflect so much Honour upon my self, as on my Readers, who give a much greater Attention to Discourses of Virtue and Morality, than ever I expected, or indeed could I hope.

When I broke loose from that great Body of Writers who have employed their Wit not so far as in propagating Vice and Irreligion, I did not question but I should be treated as an odd kind of Fellow that had a mind to appear singular in my Way of Writing. But the general Reception I have found, convinces me that the World is not so corrupt as we are apt to imagine, and that if those Men of Parts who have been employed in vitiating the Age had endeavour'd to rectify and amend it, they need not have sacrificed their good Sense and Virtue to their Fame and Reputation. No Man is so sunk in Vice and Ignorance, but there are still some hidden Seeds of Goodness and Knowledge in him, which give him a Relish of such Reflections and Speculations as have an Aptness<sup>2</sup> to improve the Mind, and make the Heart better.

I have shewn in a former Paper, with how much Care I have avoided all such Thoughts as are loose, obscene or immoral: and I believe my Reader would still think the better of me, if he knew the Pains I am at in qualifying what I write after such a manner, that nothing may be interpreted as aimed at private Persons. For this Reason when I draw any faulty Character, I consider all those Persons to whom the Mixture of the World may possibly apply it, and take care to dash it with such particular Circumstances as may prevent all such ill directed Applications. If I write any Thing, on a black Man, I run over in my Mind all the eminent Persons in the Nation who are of that Complexion. When I place an ungenerous Man at the Head of a Character, I examine every Syllable and Letter of it, that it may not bear any Resemblance to one that is real. I know very well the Value which every Man sets upon his Reputation, and I how painful it is to be exposed to the Mirth and Derision of the Publick, and should therefore scorn to divert my Reader at the Expense of a private Man.

As I have been thus tender of every particular Person's Reputation, so I have taken more than ordinary Care not to give Offence to those who appear in the higher Figures of Life. I would not make myself merry ever with a Piece of Personality, I am not deal with a Publick Character, for which Reason I have never glanced upon the late den, and Profection of Mr. Hoyness, and his Attendants, nor with anything that might be considered as disrespectful to any particular Person. As to Advantages, which the Publick may reap from this Paper, it is not the least that it draws many Minds off from the Intemperance of Party, and directs them to Subjects of Discourse that are, I am persuaded, both more profitable and more useful. I have been the first Witness of those Gentlemen who set on foot the Royal Society, and had then a very good Character. It turned many of the private Persons of that Society to the Disquisition of rational Knowledge, who as they had conversed in Politics with the same Part and Application might have set their Country in a Flame. The same Paper, the Harcourter the Quaker, and the like Inventions were thrown out to these loose Spirits, as they had been sent to a Whale that he might set the Ship on our board. Therefore, while he diverts himself with those innocent Amusements

I have been to very great loss in the Particular of not hurting any Man's Reputation: that I have foreborn mention of every such Author as I could not name without Honour. This I must confess to have been a Piece of very great Self-denial. For as the Publick catches nothing better than the Ridicule which turns upon a Writer of a Party, there is no Man, which a Man that has but a very ordinary Talent in Ridicule may execute with greater Ease. One might raise a hundred for a Quarter of a Year together upon the Works of a Person who has published but a very few Volumes. For which [Reason] I am astonished, that those who have appeared against this Paper have made so very little of it. The Criticisms which I have hitherto published, have been made with an Intention rather to discover Beauties and Excellencies in the Writers of my own Time, than to publish any of their Faults and Imperfections. In the mean while I should take it for a very great Favour from some of my Understanding Detractors, if they would break all Measures with me so far, as to give me a Pretence for examining their Performances with an impartial Eye. Nor shall I look upon it as any Breach of Charity to criticize the Author, so long, as I keep clear of the Person.

In the mean while, till I am provoked to such Hostilities, I shall from time to time endeavour to do Justice to those who have distinguished themselves in the polite Parts of Learning, and to point out such Beauties in their Works as may have escaped the Observation of others.

As the first Place among our Literary Poets is due to Milton, and as I have drawn more Quotations out of him than from any other, I shall enter into a regular Criticism upon his Paradise Lost, which I shall publish every Saturday till I have given my Thoughts upon that Poem. I shall not however presume to impose upon others my own particular Judgment on this Author but only deliver it as my private Opinion. Criticism is of a very large Extent, and every particular Master in this Art has his favourite Passages in an Author, which do not equally strike the best Judges. It will be sufficient for me if I discover many Beauties or Imperfections which others have not attended to, and I should be very glad to see any of our eminent Writers publish their Discoveries on the same Subject. In short I would always be understood to write my Papers of Criticism in the Spirit which Hornet has expressed in those two famous Lines

—Siquid inusitatus istis, Candidus impetis, sis, o, tunc utere recte cum

‘If you have made any better Remarks of your own, communicate them with Candour, if not, make use of these I present you with’ C.

*Gratulor quod cum quem necesse erat diligere, qualiscunque esset, Intem habes is ut licenter

MR. SPECTATOR,

I AM the happy Father of a very towerly Son, in whom I do not only see my Life but also my Manner of Life, renewed. It would be extremely beneficial to Society, if you would frequently resume Subjects which serve to bind these sort of Relations faster, and endear the Ties of Blood with those of Good will, Protection, Observance, Indulgence, and Veneration

<sup>1</sup> [Reasons]

I would, methinks, have this done after an uncommon Method, and do not think any one, who is not capable of writing a good Play, fit to undertake a Work wherein there will necessarily occur so many secret Instincts and Passions of human Nature which would pass unobserved by common Eyes. I think Heaven I have no outrageous Offence to answer my own excellent Parents to answer for but which I am now and then alone, and look back upon my past Life, from my earliest Infancy to this time there are many Faults which I committed if it did not appear to me, even till I myself became a Father. I had not till then a Notion of the Irrangings of Heart, which a Man has when he sees his Child do a Pardonable Thing, or the various Drap which serves him when he sees he will get something more out of it. It is not to be imagined, what a Remembrance to me for a long Train of childish Negligences of my Mother when I saw my Wife the other Day look out of the Window, and turn as pale as Asbes upon seeing my younger Boy sliding upon the Ice. These slight Intimations will give you to understand, that there are numberless little Crimes which Children take notice of when they are doing, which upon Reflection when they shall themselves become Fathers this, will look upon with the utmost Sorrow and Contrition, that they did not regard, before those whom they offended were to be no more seen. How many thousand Things do I remember which would have highly pleased my Father, and I omitted for no other Reason, but that I thought what he proposed the Effect of Humour and old Age, which I am now convinced had Reason and good Sense in it. I cannot now go into the Parlour to him, and make his Heart glad with an Account of a Matter which was of no Consequence but that I told it, and acted in it. The good Man and Woman are long since in their Graves, who used to sit and plot the Welfare of us their Children, while, perhaps, we were sometimes trudging at the old Mills at another End of the House. The Truth of it is, we were merely to follow Nature in these great Duties of Life, tho we have a strong Instinct towards the performance of them, we should be on both Sides very deficient. Age is so much welcome to the Generosity of Mankind, and Growth towards Manhood so desirable to all, that Resignation to Decree is too difficult a Task in the latter and Diffidence, amidst the Impulse of gay Desires, appears unresolvable to the Son. There are so few who can grow old with a good Grace, and yet fewer who can come slow enough into the World, that a Father, were he to be returned by his Desires, and a Son, were he to consult himself only, could neither of them behave himself as he ought to the other. But when Reason interposes against Instinct where it would carry either out of the Interests of the other, there arises that happiest Interchange of good Offices between those dearest Relations of human Life. The Father, according to the Opportunities which are offered to him, is throwing down Blessings on the Son, and the Son endeavouring to appear the worthy Offspring of such a Father. It is after this manner that Cornelius and his first-born

'dwell together Camillus enjoys a pleasing and indolent old Age, in which Passion is subdued, and Reason exalted. He waits the Day of his Dissolution with a Resignation mixed with Delight, and the Son fears the Accession of his Father's Fortune with Diffidence, lest he should not enjoy or become it as well as his Predecessor. Add to this, that the Father knows he leaves a Friend to the Children of his Friends, an easy Landlord to his Tenants, and an agreeable Companion to his Acquaintance. He believes his Son's Behaviour will make him frequently remembered, but never wanted. This Commerce is so well cemented, that without the Pomp of saying, Son, be a Friend to such a one when I am gone Camillus knows, being in his Favour, is Direction enough to the grateful Youth who is to succeed him, without the Admonition of his mentioning it. These Gentlemen are honoured in all their Neighbourhood, and the same Effect which the Court has on the Manner of a Kingdom, their Characters have on all who live within the Influence of them.

'My Son and I are not of Fortune to communicate our good Actions or Intentions to so many as these Gentlemen do. But I will be bold to say, my Son has, by the Applause and Approbation which his Behaviour towards me has gained him, occasioned that many an old Man, besides my self, has rejoiced. Other Men's Children follow the Example of mine, and I have the inexpressible Happiness of overhearing our Neighbours, as we ride by, point to their Children, and say, with a Voice of Joy, There they go.

'You cannot, MR SPECTATOR, pass your time better than insinuating the Delights which these Relations well regarded bestow upon each other. Ordinary Passions are no longer such, but mutual Love gives an Importance to the most indifferent things, and a Merit to Actions the most insignificant. When we look round the World, and observe the many Misunderstandings which are created by the Malice and Insinuation of the meanest Servants between People thus related, how necessary will it appear that it were inculcated that Men would be upon their Guard to support a Constancy of Affection, and that grounded upon the Principles of Reason, not the Impulses of Instinct.

'It is from the common Prejudices which Men receive from their Parents, that Hatreds are kept alive from one Generation to another. And when Men act by Instinct, Hatreds will descend when good Offices are forgotten. For the Degeneracy of human Life is such, that our Anger is more easily transferred to our Children than our Love. Love always gives something to the Object it delights in, and Anger spoils the Person against whom it is moved of something laudable in him. From this Degeneracy therefore, and a sort of Self-Love, we are more prone to take up the Ill-will of our Parents, than to follow them in their Friendships.

'One would think there should need no more to make Men keep up this sort of Relation with the utmost Sanctity, than to examine their own Hearts. If every Father remembered his own Thoughts and Inclinations when he was a Son,

'and every Son remembered what he expected from his Father, when he himself was in a State of Dependence, that one Reflection would preserve Men from being dissolute or rigid in these several Capricies. The Power and Subjection between them, when broken, make them more emphatically Tyrants and Rebels against each other, with greater Cruelty of Heart, than the Disruption of States and Empires can possibly produce. I shall end this Application to you with two Letters which passed between a Mother and Son very lately, and are as follows.

Dear FRANK,

'If the Pleasures, which I have the Grief to hear you pursue in Town, do not take up all your Time, do not deny your Mother so much of it, as to read seriously this Letter. You said before Mr Letacré, that an old Woman might live very well in the Country upon half my Jointure, and that your Father was a fond Fool to give me a Rent Charge of Eight hundred a Year to the Prejudice of his Son. What Letacré said to you upon that Occasion, you ought to have born with more Decency, as he was your Father's well beloved Servant, than to have called him Country Ant. In the first place, Frank, I must tell you, I will have my Rent duly paid, for I will make up to your Sisters for the Partiality I was guilty of, in making your Father do so much as he has done for you. In any, it seems, live upon half my Jointure. I lived upon much less, Frank, when I carried you from Place to Place in these Arms, and could neither eat, dress, or mud any thing for feeding and tending you a weakly Child, and shedding Tears when the Convulsions you were then troubled with returned upon you. By my Care you outgrew them, to throw away the Vigour of your Youth in the Arms of Harlots, and deny your Mother what is not yours to detain. Both your Sisters are crying to see the Passion which I smother but if you please to go on thus like a Gentleman of the Town, and forget all Regards to your self and Family, I shall immediately enter upon your Estate for the Arrear due to me, and without one Tear more condemn you for forgetting the Fondness of your Mother, as much as you live the Example of your Father.

O Frank, do I live to omit writing my self,

Your Affectionate Mother,

MADAM,

'I will come down to-morrow and pay the Money on your Knees. Pray write so no more. I will take care you never shall, for I will be for ever hereafter,

Your most dutiful Son,

F. 1

'I will bring down new Heads for my Sisters. Pray let all be forgotten.

— Secret is that it falls 'tis Sent its 'tis — Hot

I have been from Age to Age in Affection to love the Pleasure of Solitude, amongst those who cannot possibly be supposed qualified for passing Time in that Manner. This People have taken up from reading the many agreeable things which have been writ on this Subject, for which we are beholden to excellent Persons who delighted in being retired and abstracted from the Pleasures that enchain the Generality of the World. This Way of Life is recommended indeed with great Beauty, and in such a Manner as disposes the Reader for the time to a pleasing Forgetfulness, or Negligence of the particular Hurry of Life in which he is engaged, together with a Longing for that State which he is charmed with in Description. But when we consider the World itself, and how few there are capable of a religious, learned, or philosophical Solitude, we shall be apt to change our Regard to that sort of Solitude, for being a little singular in enjoying Time after the Way a Man himself lives best in the World, without going so far as wholly to withdraw from it. I have often observed, there is not a Man breathing who does not differ from all other Men, as much in the Sentiments of his Mind as the Features of his Face. The Fidelity is, when any one is so happy as to find out and follow what is the proper Bent of his Genius, and turn all his Endeavours to exert himself according to that prompt him. Instead of this, which is an innocent Method of enjoying a Man's self, and turning out of the general Tricks wherein you have Crowds of Rivals, there are those who pursue their own Way out of a Sourness and Spirit of Contradiction. These Men do every thing which they are able to support, as if Guilt and Impunity could not go together. They choose a thing only because another dislikes it and affect forsooth an inviolable Constancy in Matters of no manner of Moment. Thus sometimes an old Fellow shall wear this or that sort of Cut in his Cloaths with great Integrity, while all the rest of the World are degenerated into Buttons, Pockets and Loops up now to their Ancestors. As insignificant as even this is, if it were searched to the Bottom, you perhaps would find it not sincere, but that he is in the Fashion in his Heart, and holds out from mere Obstinacy. But I am running from my intended Purpose, which was to celebrate a certain particular Manner of pressing away Life, and is a Contradiction to no Man, but a Resolution to contract none of the exorbitant Desires by which others are enslaved. The best way of separating a Man's self from the World is to give up the Desire of being known to it. After a Man has preserved his Innocence, and performed all Duties incumbent upon him, his Time spent his own Way is what makes his Life differ from that of a Slave. If they who affect Show and Pomp knew how many of their Spectators denied their trivial Taste, they would be very much less elated, and have an Inclination to examine the Merit of all they have to do with. They would soon find out that there are many who make a Figure below what their Fortune or Merit entitles them to out of mere Chauce, and an elegant Desire of Ease and Disincombrance. It is odd I look like Romance to tell you in this Age of an old Man who is contented to pass for an Humourist, and one who does not understand the Figure he ought to make in the World, while he lives in a Lodging of Ten Shillings a Week with only one Servant. While he dresses himself according to the Season in Cloth or in Stuff, and has no unnecessary Attention to any thing, but the Tell which calls to Prayers twice a Day. I say it would look like a little to report that this Gentleman gives away all which is the Overplus of a great Fortune, by secret Methods to other Men. If he has not the Pomp of a numerous Train, and of Prose vots of Service to him, he has every Day he lives the Conviction that the Widow, the Fatherless, the Mourner, and the Stranger bless his unseen Hand in their Prayers. This Humourist gives up all the Compliments which People of his own Condition could make to him, for the Pleasures of helping the Afflicted, supplying the Needy, and befriending the Neglected. This Humourist keeps to himself much more than he wants, and gives a just Refuse of his Superfluities to purchase Heaven, and by freeing others from the Temptations of Worldly Want, to carry a Retinue with him thither.

Of all Men who affect living in a particular Way, next to this admirable Character, I am the most enamoured of Irish, whose Condition will not admit of such Largeness, and perhaps would not be capable of making them, if it were Irish, tho' he is now turned of fifty, has not appeared in the World, in his real Character since five and twenty, at which Age he ran out a small Purmony, and spent some Time after with Rakes who had lived upon him. A Course of ten Years time, passed in all the little Alleys, By-Paths and sometimes open Taverns and Streets of this Town, gave Irish a perfect Skill in judging of the Inclinations of Mankind, and acting accordingly. He seriously considered he was poor, and the great Horror which most Men have of all who are in that Condition. Irish judged very rightly, that while he could keep his Poverty a Secret he should not feel the Weight of it. He improved this Thought into an Affection of Closeness and Covetousness. Upon this one Principle he resolved to govern his future Life, and in the thirty-sixth Year of his Age he repaired to Long-lair, and looked upon several Dresses which hung there deserted by their first Masters, and exposed to the Purchase of the best bidder. At this Place he exchanged his gay Shabbiness of Cloaths fit for a much younger Man, to worn ones that would be decent for a much older one. Irish came out thoroughly equipped from Head to Foot, with a little oaken Cane in the Form of a substantial Man that did not mind his Dress, turned of fifty. He had at this time fifty Pounds in ready Money, and in this Habit, with this Fortune, he took his present Lodging in St. John Street, at the Mansion-House of a Taylor's Widow, who washes and can clear-starch his Bands. From that Time to this, he has kept the main Stock, without Alteration under or over to the value of five Pounds. He left off all his old Acquaintance to a Man, and all his Arts of Life, except the Play of Backgammon, upon which he has more than bore his Charges. Iris has, ever since he came into this Neighbourhood, given all the Intimations, he skillfully could, of being a close Hunk worth Money. No body comes to visit him, he receives no Letters, and tells his Money Morning and Evening. He has, from the publick Papers, a Knowledge of what generally passes, shuns all Discourses of Money, but shrugs his Shoulder when you talk of Securities. He denies his being rich with the Air, which all do who are vain of being so. He is the Oracle of a Neighbouring Justice of Peace, who meets him at the Coffee-house, the Hopes that what he must come to Somebody, and that he has no Heirs, have that Effect where ever he is known, that he every Day has three or four Invitations to dine at different Places, which he generally takes care to choose in such a manner, as not to seem inclined to the richer Man. All the young Men respect him, and say he is just the same Man he was when they were Boys. He uses no Artifice in the World, but makes use of Men's Designs upon him to get a Maintenance out of them. This he carries on by a certain Pccvishness, (which he acts very well) that no one would believe could possibly enter into the Head of a poor Fellow. His Mein, his Dress, his Carriage, and his Language are such, that you would be at a loss to guess whether in the Active Part of his Life he had been a sensible Citizen, or Scholar that knew the World. These are the great Circumstances in the Life of Iris, and thus does he pass away his Days a Stranger to Mankind and at his Death, the worst that will be said of him will be, that he got by every Man who had Expectations from him, more than he had to leave him.

I have an Inclination to print the following Letters for that I have heard the Author of them has some where or other seen me, and by an excellent Faculty in Mimickry my Correspondents tell me he can assume my Air, and give my Turns with a Slyness which diverts more than any thing I could say if I were present. Thus I am glad my Silence is atoned for to the good Company in Town. He has carried his Skill in Imitation so far, as to have forged a Letter from my Friend Sir Roger in such a manner, that any one but I who am thoroughly acquainted with him, would have taken it for genuine.

MR SPECTATOR,

'Having observed in Lilly's Grammar how sweetly Bacchus is and Apollo run in a Verse I have (to preserve the Amity between them) call'd in Bacchus to the Aid of my Profession of the Theatre. So that while some People of Quality are besperring Plays of me to be acted upon such a Day, and others, Hogsheds for their Houses against such a Time, I am wholly employ'd in the agreeable Service of Wit and Wine. Sir, I have sent you Sir Roger de Coverley's Letter to me, which pry come comply with in Favour of the Bumper Tavern. Be kind, for Old Comical Ones,

'The Hogsheds of Neat Port came first, and have gotten these good Reputation in these Parts, and I am glad to hear, that a Fellow who has been laying out his Money ever since he was born, for the meer Pleasure of Wine, has thought himself of joining Profit and Pleasure together. Our Sexton (poor Man) having received Strength from thy Wine since his fit of the Gout, is hugely taken with it. He says it is given by Nature for the Use of Families, that no

Richard Estcourt, born at Tewkesbury in 1688, and educated in the Latin school there, stole from home at the age of 15 to join a travelling company of comedians at Worcester, and, to avoid detection made his first appearance in woman clothes as Roxana in Alexander the Great. He was discovered, however, pursued, brought home, carried to London, and bound apprentice to an apothecary in Hatton Garden. He escaped again, wandered about England, went to Ireland, and there obtained credit as an actor then returned to London, and appeared at Drury Lane, where his skill as a mimic enabled him to perform each part in the manner of the actor who had obtained chief credit by it. His power of mimicry made him very diverting in society, and as he had natural politeness with a sprightly wit, his company was sought and paid for at the entertainments of the great 'Dick Estcourt' was a great favourite with the Duke of Marlborough, and when men of wit and rank joined in establishing the Beefsteak Club they made Estcourt their Providence, with a small gold girdler, for badge, hung round his neck by a green ribbon. Estcourt was a writer for the stage as well as actor, and had shown his agreement with the Spectator's dramatic criticisms by ridiculing the Italian opera with an interlude called Prunella. In the Numbers of the Spectator for December 28 and 29 Estcourt had advertised that he would on the 1st of January open 'the Bumper Tavern in James's Street, Westminster, and had had in 'neat natural wines, fresh and in 'perfection, being bought by Broole and Hellier, by whom the said Tavern will from time to time be supplied with the best growths that shall be imported to be sold by wholesale as well as retail, with the utmost fidelity by his old servant, trusty Anthony, who has so often adorned both the theatres in England and Ireland, and as he is a person altogether unknowing in the wine trade, it cannot be doubted but that he will deliver the wine in the same natural purity that he receives it from the said merchants and on these assurances he hopes that all his friends and acquaintance will become his customers, desiring a continuance of their favours no longer than they shall find themselves well served.' This is the venture which Steele here backs for his friend with the influence of the Spectator.

'Steward's Table can be without it, that it strengthens Digestion, excludes Surfeits, Fevers, and Phlegm, which green Wines of any kind can't do. Pray get a pure young Roan and I hope next Term to help fill your Bumper with our People of the Club: but you must have no Bulls stirring when the Spectator comes I for bore ringing to Du her while he was down with me in the Conner. Thank you for the little Hams and "miserable Orisons" pray keep some always by you. Dixer'e null'e est aliquid, quia unus in angulis Pity est et munda to aus o' le lupu'—Ovid

ONE of the Fathers, if I am rightly informed, has defined a Woman to be ἑμὸν φιλόλοσμον, or Animal that delights in Finery. I have already treated of the Sex in two or three Papers, conformably to this Definition, and have in part observed that in all Ages they have been more careful than the Men to adorn that Part of the Head, which we generally call the Ornament.

This Observation is so very obvious that when in ordinary Discourse we say a Man has a fine Head, a long Head, or a good Head we express ourselves metaphorically and speak in relation to his Understanding whereas when we say of a Woman, she has a fine, a long or a good Head, we speak only in relation to her Commode.

It is observed among Birds, that Nature has finished all her Ornaments upon the Male, who very often appears in a most beautiful Head-dress. Whether it be a Crest, a Comb, a Tuft of Feathers, or a natural little Plume, erected like a kind of Pinnacle on the very Top of the Head [As Nature on the contrary] has poured out her Charms in the greatest Abundance upon the Female Part of our Species, so they are very ridiculous in bestowing upon themselves the finest Ornamentures of Art. The Peacock in all his Pride does not display half the Colours that appear in the Garments of a British Lady, when she is dressed either for a Ball or a Birth-day.

But to return to our Female Herd: The Ladies have been for some time in a kind of moulting Season, with regard to that Part of their Dress, having cast great Quantities of Ribbon, Lace, and Cambric, and in some measure reduced that Part of the human Figure to the beautiful globular Form, which is natural to it. We have for a great while expected what kind of Ornament would be substituted in the Place of those antiquated Commodities. But our Female Projectors were all the last Summer so taken up with the Improvement of the Patience that they had not time to attend to any thing else, but having at length sufficiently adorned the lower Parts, they now begin to turn their Thoughts upon the other Extremity, as well as neighbouring the old Kitchen Proverb that if you light your Fire at both Ends, the middle will shift for it self.

I am engaged in this Speculation by a Sight which I lately met with at the Opera. As I was standing in the hinder Part of the Box, I took notice of a little Cluster of Women sitting together in the prettiest coloured Hoods that I ever saw. One of them was Blue another Yellow and another Philomelot the fourth was of a Pink Colour, and the fifth of a pale Green. I looked with as much Pleasure upon this little party coloured Assembly as upon a Bed of Tulips, and did not know at first whether it might not be an Embassy of Isidra Queen but upon my going about into the Pit, and taking them in Front, I was immediately undeceived, and saw so much Beauty in every Face, that I found them all to be English. Such Eyes and Lips, Cheeks and Foreheads, could be the Growth of no other Country. The Completion of their Faces hindered me from observing any further the Colour of their Hoods, though I could easily perceive by that unspeakable Satisfaction which appeared in their Looks, that their own Thoughts were wholly taken up on those pretty Ornaments they wore upon their Heads.

I am informed that this Fashion spreads daily, in-much that the Whig and Tory Ladies begin already to hang out different Colours, and to show their Principles in their Head dress. Nay if I may believe my Friend WILL. HERRICOM, there is a certain old Coquet of his Acquaintance who intends to appear very suddenly in a Rainbow Hood, like the Jas in Dryden's Virgil, not questioning but that among such a variety of Colours she shall have a Charm for every Heart.

My Friend WILL, who very much values himself upon his great Lusts, his into Gallantry, tells me, that he can already guess at the Humour a Lady is in by her Hood, as the Counters of Morocco know the Disposition of their present Emperor by the Colour of the Dress which he puts on. When Alester da wraps her Head in Prime Colour, her Heart is set upon Execution. When she covers it with Purple, I would not, says he, advise her Lover to approach her, but if she appears in White, it is Peace, and he may hand her out of her Box with Safety.

WILL informs me likewise, that these Hoods may be used as Signals. Why else, says he, does Cornelia always put on a Black Hood when her Husband is gone into the Country?

Such are my Friend HERRICOM's Dreams of Gallantry. For my own part, I impute this Diversity of Colours in the Hoods to the Diversity of Complexion in the Faces of my pretty Country Women. Ovid in his Art of Love has given some Precepts as to this Particular, though I find they are different from those which prevail among the Moderns. He recommends a Red striped Silk to the pale Complexion, White to the Brown, and Dark to the Fair. On the contrary my Friend WILL, who pretends to be a greater Master in this Art than Ovid, tells me, that the palest Features look the most agreeable in white Surset, that a Face which is overflushed appears to advantage in the deepest Scarlet, and that the darkest Complexion is not a little alleviated by a Black Hood. In short, he is for losing the Colour of the Face in that of the Hood, as a Fire burns dimly, and a Candle goes half out, in the Light of the Sun. This, says he, your Ovid himself has hinted, where he treats of these Matters, when he tells us that the blue Water Nymphs are dressed in Sky coloured Garments, and that Aurora, who always appears in the Light of the Rising Sun, is robed in Saffron.

Whether these his Observations are justly grounded I cannot tell, but I have often known him, as we have stood together behind the Ladies, praise or dispraise the Complexion of a Face which he never saw, from observing the Colour of her Hood, and has been very seldom out in these his Guesses.

As I have Nothing more at Heart than the Honour and Improvement of the Fair Sex,* I cannot conclude this Paper without an Exhortation to the British Ladies, that they would excel the Women of all other Nations as much in Virtue and good Sense, as they do in Beauty, which they may certainly do, if they will be as industrious to cultivate their Minds, as they are to adorn their Bodies. In the mean while I shall recommend to their most serious Consideration the Saying of an old Greek Poet,

NO Vice or Wickedness which People fall into from Indulgence to Desires<sup>[s]</sup> which are natural to all, ought to place them below the Compassion of the virtuous Part of the World, which indeed often makes me a little apt to suspect the Sincerity of their Virtue, who are too warmly provoked at other Peoples personal Sins. The unlawful Commerce of the Sexes is of all other the hardest to avoid, and yet there is no one which you shall hear the rigidest Part of Womankind speak of with so little Mercy. It is very certain that a modest Woman cannot abhor the Breach of Chastity too much, but pry let her hate it for her self, and only pity it in others. WILL HONEYCOMB calls these over offended Ladies, the Outragiously Virtuous.

I do not design to fill upon Failures in general, with relation to the Gift of Chastity, but at present only enter upon that large Field, and begin with the Consideration of poor and publick Whores. The other Evening passing along near Court Garden, I was jogged on the Elbow as I turned into the Piazza, on the right Hand coming out of James street, by a slim young Girl of about Seventeen, who with a pert Air asked me if I was for a Pint of Wine. I do not know but I should have indulged my Curiosity in having some Chat with her, but that I am informed the Man of the Bumper knows me, and it would have made a Story for him not very agreeable to some Part of my Writings, though I have in others so frequently said that I am wholly unconcerned in any Scene I am in, but merely as a Spectator. This Impediment being in my Way, we stood [under] one of the Arches by Twilight, and there I could observe as exact Features as I had ever seen, the most agreeable Shape, the finest Neck and Bosom, in a Word, the whole Person of a Woman exquisitely Beautiful. She affected to allure me with a forced Wantonness in her Look and Air, but I saw it checked with Hunger and Cold. Her Eyes were wan and eager, her Dress thin and tawdry, her Mien genteel and childish. This strange Figure gave me much Anguish of Heart, and to avoid being seen with her I went away, but could not forbear giving her a Crown. The poor thing sighed, curtsied, and with a Blessing, expressed with the utmost Vehemence, turned from me. This Creature is what they call newly come upon the Town, but who, I suppose, falling into cruel Hands was left in the first Month from her Dishonour, and exposed to pass through the Hands and Discipline of one of those Hags of Hell whom we call Bawds. But lest I should grow too suddenly grave on this Subject, and be my self outrageously good, I shall turn to a Scene in one of Fletcher's Plays, where this Character is drawn, and the Oeconomy of Whoredom most admirably described. The Passage I would point to is in the third Scene of the second Act of The Humorous Lieutenant. Leucippe who is Agent for the King's Lust, and bawds at the same time for the whole Court, is very pleasantly introduced, rendering her Minutes as a Person of Business, with two Maids, her Under-Secretaries, taking Instructions at a Table before her. Her Women, both those under her present Tutelage, and those which she is laying wait for, are alphabetically set down in her Book, and as she is looking over the Letter C, in a muttering Voice, as if between Soliloquy and speaking out, she says,

*Her Maidenhead will yield me, let me see now,
She is not Fifteen they say For her Complexion*

<sup>2</sup> [under in]

Cloe, Cloe, Cloe, here I late her,
Cloe, the Daughter of a Country Gentleman,
Her Age upon Fifteen No her Complement,
A low ch brown, here's t, Eyes black and rolling,
The Body neatly built, she strikes a Lyte well
Sings most to the eye These Hells consider'd, Her Maidenhood will amount to some three hundred,
Or three hundred and fifty Crows, 'till I ear it I and some
Her Fuller's foot, and a little Share deducted,
To buy her a Hunting Nag.

These Creatures are very well instructed in the Circumstances and Manners of all who are now Way related to the Fair One whom they have a Design upon. As Cloe is to be purchased with [350] Crowns, and the Father taken off with a Pard the Merchant's Wife next to her, who abounds in Plenty, is not to have downright Money, but the mercenary Part of her Mind is engaged with a Present of Plate and a little An-nuation. She is made to understand that it is a Man of Quality who dies for her. The I rumation of a young Girl for Business and the cur-down her Value for being a slight thing, together with every other Circumstance in the Scene are imitably excellent, and have the true Spirit of Comedy, tho' I were to be wished the Author had added a Circumstance which should make Le tiff's Baseness more odious.

It must not be thought a Digression from my intended Speculation, to talk of Bravos in a Discourse upon Witches for a Woman of the Town is not thoroughly and properly such, without having gone through the Education of one of these Houses. But the comprehensive Case of very many is, that they are taken into such Houses without any the least Suspicion, previous Temptation, or Admonition to what Place they are going.
The last Week I went to an Inn in the City to enquire for some Provisions which were sent by a Wagon out of the Country. And as I waited in one of the Boxes till the Chamberlain had looked over his Paper, I heard an old and a young Voice repeating the Questions and Responses of the Church-Catechism. I thought it no breach of good Manner, to peep it a Service, and look in it People so well employed, but who should I see there but the most useful Procreants in the Town examining a most beautiful Country-Girl, who had come up in the same Wagon with my Huys.
Whether she was well educated, could she arranging the Wagon with Servants and idle Fellows, of which this Town says she is too full.
At the same time, Whether she knew enough of Breeding, as that of a Squire or a Gentleman, or one that was her betters, should give her a civil Salute, she should curtsy and be humble, never theless. Her innocent sorrows, yes, and Please you's, and she would do her Endeavour, moved the good old Lady to take her out of the Hands of a Country Bumpkin her Brother, and hire her for her own Maid. I stood till I saw them all marched out to take Coach, the Brother loaded

2 [fifty]

with a great Cheese, he prevailed upon her to take for her Civilities to [his] Sister. This poor Cre-ature's Fate is not far off that of her's whom I spoke of above, and it is not to be doubted but after she has been long enough a Price to Lust she will be delivered over to I imagine the Imperial Commendation of the Industry and Charity of these antiquated Ladies, these Directors of Sin, after they can no longer command it, makes up the Merit of the mirrourable Dedication to the Plain-Dealer, and is a Master piece of Rascality on this Vice. But to understand all the Particulars of this Game the better, and to illustrate this Subject in future Discourses, I must venture my self, with my Friend Wit, into the Harms of Beauty and Gallantry, from purposed Vice in the Habitu-ations of the Wealthy, in distressed indigent Wickedness expelled the Harbours of the Brothel.

Weyerley's Plain Dealer having given offence to many Ladies was inscribed in a satirical little dour dedication 'To My Lady B'.

[One piece to him, Writers of Rome and Greece.] This application to Milton of a line from the first elegy (25th) in the second book of Properius is not only an example of Addison's fi-nity in choice of motto for a paper, but was so bold and well timed that it must have given a whole new shock to the minds of many of the spectator's readers. Addison was not before Steele in appreciation of Milton and diffusion of a true sense of his genius. Milton was the subject of the first piece of poetical criticism in the Tatler, where in his sixth number Steele, having said that 'all Milton's thoughts are wonderfully
'just and natural,' dwelt on the passage in which Adam tells his thoughts upon first falling asleep, soon after his creation. This passage he contrasts with 'the same apprehension of Annihilation' scribed to I've in a much lower sense by Virgil in his operative version of Paradise Lost. In Tatlers and Spectators Steele and Addison had been equal contributors to the diffusion of a sense of Milton's genius. In Addison it had been stroven when, at Oxford, in April, 1694, a young man in truned in the taste of the day, he omitted Shakespeare from a rhymed 'Account of the ely-
'English Poets,' but of Milton said

'Whatever his pen describes I more than see Whilst ev'ry verse, array'd in majesty,
Told and sublime, my whole attention draws
And seems above the critics nicer laws'

Eleven years older than he was when he wrote this, Addison now prepares by a series of Saturday Lectures, — the Saturday Paper which reached many turn chiefly upon Words For this Reason I shall wave the Discussion of that Point which was subscribers only in time for Sunday reading, being always set apart in the Spectator for moral or religious topics,—to show that, judged also by Aristotle and the 'critics' nice laws, Milton was even technically a greater epic poet than either Homer or Virgil. This nobody had conceded Dryden, the best critic of the outgoing generation, had said in the Dedication of the Translations of Juvenal and Persius, published in 1692, 'As for Mr Milton, whom we all admire with so much Justice, his Subject is not that of an Heroic Poem, properly so call'd His Design is the Losing of our Happiness his Event is not prosperous, like that of all other Epicque Works' (Dryden's French spelling of the word Epic is suggestive. For this new critical Mode was one of the fashions that had been imported from Paris), 'His Heavenly Machines are many, and his Human Persons are but two But I will not take Mr Rymers work out of his Hands He has promised the World a Critique on that Author wherein, tho' he will not allow his Poem for Heroick, I hope he will grant us, that his Thoughts are elevated, his Words sounding, and that no Man has so happily copy'd the manner of Homer, or so copiously translated his Grecisms and the Latin Elegancies of Virgil 'Tis true he runs into a Flat of Thought, sometimes for a Hundred Lines together, but 'tis when he is got into a Track of Scripture Neither will I justify Milton for his Blank Verse, tho' I may excuse him, by the Example of Hanibal Carr and other Italians who have used it For whatever Cause he alleges for the abolishing of Rhime (which I have not now the leisure to examine), his own particular Reason is plainly this, that Rhime was not his Talent he had neither the Ease of doing it, nor the Graces of it.' So Dryden, who appreciated Milton better than most of his critical neighbours, wrote of him in 1692 The promise of Rymers to discuss Milton was made in 1678, when, on the last page of his little book, The Tragedies of the Last Ages considered and examined by the Practice of the Ancients and by the Common Sense of all Ages, in a letter to Fleetwood Sheppard, Esq (father of two ladies who contribute in occasional letter to the Spectator), he said 'With the remaining Tragedies I shall also send you some reflections on that Paradise Lost of Milton's, which some are pleased to call a Poem, and assert Rhime against the slender Sophistry wherewith he attacks it' But two years after the appearance of Dryden's Juvenal and Persius Rymers prefixed to his translation of René Rapin's Reflections on Aristotles Poetics some Reflections of his own on Epic Poets. Herein he speaks under the hard Epic Poets of Chaucer, 'in whose time language was not capable of heroic character' of Spenser, who 'wanted a true Idea, and lost himself by following an unfaithful guide,' besides using a 'stanza which is in no wise proper for our language,' of Sir William Davenant, who, in Gondibert, 'has some strokes of an extraordinary judgment,' but 'is for unbeaten tracks and new ways started some Years since, whether Milton's Paradise Lost may be called an Heroic Poem? Those of thinking, 'his heroes are foreigners,' of Cowley, in whose Davidides 'David is the least part of the Poem,' and there is want of the 'one illustrious and perfect action which properly is the subject of an Epic Poem all failing through ignorance or negligence of the Fundamental Rules or Laws of Aristotle But he contemptuously passes over Milton without mention' René Rapin, that great French orick of whom Dryden said, in the Preface to his own conversion of Paradise Lost into an opera, that he was 'alone sufficient, were all other critics lost, to teach anew the Art of Writing,' René Rapin in the work translated and introduced by Rymers, worshipped in Aristotle the one God of all orthodox critics Of his Laws he said, 'There is no arriving at Perfection but by these Rules, and they certainly go astray that take a different course And if a Poem made by these Rules fails of success, the fault lies not in the Art, but in the Artist, all who have writ of this Art, have followed no other Idea but that of Aristotle' Again as to Style, 'to say the truth, what is good in this subject is all taken from Aristotle, who is the only source whence good sense is to be drawn, when one goes about to write' This was the critical temper Addison resolved to meet on its own ground and do battle with for the honour of that greatest of all Epic Poets to whom he fearlessly said that all the Greeks and Latins must give place In so doing he might suggest here and there cautiously, and without bringing upon himself the discredit of much heresy,—indeed, without being much of a heretic,—that even the Divine Aristotle sometimes fell short of perfection The conventional critics who believed they kept the gates of Fame would neither understand nor credit him Nine years after these papers appeared, Charles Gildon, who passed for a critic of considerable mark, edited with copious annotation as 'the Larus of Poetry' (1721), the Duke of Buckingham's 'Essay on Poetry,' Roscommon's 'Essay on Translated Verse,' and Lord Lansdowne 'on Unnatural Flights in Poetry,' and in the course of comment Gildon said that 'Mr Addison in the Spectator, in his criticisms upon Milton, seems to have mistaken the matter, in endeavouring to bring that poem to the rules of the epopœia, which cannot be done It is not an Heroic Poem, but a Divine one, and indeed of a new species It is plain that the proposition of all the heroic poems of the ancients mentions some one person as the subject of their poem But Milton begins his poem of things, and not of men' The Gildons are all gone and when, in the next generation after theirs, national life began, in many parts of Europe, strongly to assert itself in literature against the pedantry of the French critical lawgivers, in Germany Milton's name was inscribed on the foremost standard of the men who represented the new spirit of the age Gottsched, who drew French critical law from Leipzig, by passing sentence against Milton in his 'Art of Poetry' in 1737, raised in Bodmer an opponent who led the revolt who will not give it that Title may call it (if they please) a Disin. Poem. It will be sufficient to its Perfection, if it has in it all the Beauties of the highest kind of Poetry: and as for those who failed, <sup>1</sup> it is not an Heroic Poem, they need not care no more to the Diminution of it, than if they should say Adam is not Eve's, nor Eve Helen.

I shall therefore examine it by the Rules of Epic Poetry, and see whether it falls short of the Iliad or Æneid, in the Beauties which are essential to that kind of Writing. The first thing to be considered in an Epic Poem, is the Subject, which is perfect or imperfect, according as the Action which it relates is more or less so. This Action should have three Qualifications in it. First, It should be but One Action. Secondly, It should be an entire Action. And, Thirdly, It should be a great Action. To consider the Action of the Iliad, Æneid, and Paradise Lost, with these three several Lights. Homer to preserve the Unity of his Action hastens into the Midst of Things, as Horace has observed. <sup>2</sup> Had he gone of all that was more vigorous in German than light, and put it in end to French supremacy. Bodmer, in a book published in 1740 Pem II unter 1740 in der Poetie, praised and exalted Milton, and brought Addison to his aid by appealing to his own work a translation of these Milton papers out of the Spectator. Gottsched replied. Bodmer retorted. Bodmer translated Paradise Lost and what was called the English or Milton party (but was, in that form, really a German national party) were at last left masters of the field. It was in his that these papers of Addison should be brought in as aids during the contest. Careful as he was to conciliate opposing prejudices, he was yet first in the field, and this is owing to the first of his series of Milton papers, 'I yield place to him, Writers of Greece and Rome, is the first trumpet note of the one herald on a field from which only a quick ear can yet distinguish among, air of all that is near, the distant tramp of a retreating host' [say].

<sup>3</sup> Aristotle, Poetics, III § 1. after a full discussion of Tragedy, begins by saying, 'with respect to that species of Poetry which unites by Narration it is obvious, that the Poet ought to be dramatically constructed like that of Tragedy, and that it should have for its Subject one entire and perfect action, having a beginning, a middle, and an end, forming a complete whole, like an animal, and therein differing,' Aristotle says, from History, which treats not of one Action, but of one Time, and of all the events, casually connected, which happened to one person or to many during that time.

<sup>4</sup> Poetics, I § 9. 'Epic Poetry agrees so far with Tragedy as it is an imitation of great characters and actions.' Aristotle (from whose opinion, in this matter alone, his worshippers departed, right though he was) ranked a perfect tragedy above a perfect epic for, he said, 'all the parts of the Epic poem are to be found in Tragedy, not all those of Tragedy in the Epic poem.'

up to Leda's Egg, or begun much later, even at the Rape of Helen, or the Investing of Troy, it is manifest that the Story of the Poem would have been a Series of several Actions. He therefore opens his Poem with the Discord of his Princes and suitably interweaves, in the several succeeding Parts of it, an Account of every thing [internal] which relates to [the war] and had passed before that fatal Discussion. After the same manner, Æneis makes his first Appearance in the Æneid Scene, and within Sight of Italy, because the Action proposed to be celebrated was that of his settling himself in Lalium. But because it was necessary for the Reader to know what had happened to him in the taking of Troy, and in the preceding Parts of his Voyage, Virgil makes his Hero relate it by way of Episode in the second and third Books of the Æneid. The Contents of both which Books come before those of the first Book in the Thread of the Story, tho' for preserving of this Unity of Action they follow them in the Disposition of the Poem. Milton, in imitation of the two great Poets, opens his Paradise Lost with an initial Council plotting the Fall of Man, which is the Action he proposed to celebrate, and as for those great Actions, which preceded, in point of Time, the Battle of the Angels, and the Creation of the World, (which would have entirely destroyed the Unity of his principal Action, had he related them in the same Order that they happened) he cast them into the fifth, sixth, and seventh Books, by way of Episode to this noble Poem.

<sup>6</sup> Stoile Hunt. If allons, that Homer has nothing to boast of as to the Unity of his Poem, tho' at the same time that great Greek and Philosopher endeavors to illustrate this Imperfection in the Greek Poet by imputing it in some measure to the very Nature of an Epic Poem. Some have been of opinion, that the Æneid [also] labours in this Particular, and that Episodes which may be looked upon as Excesses rather than as Parts of the Action. On the contrary, the Poem, which we have now under our Consideration, hath no other Episodes than such as naturally arise from the Subject, and yet is filled with such a Multitude of astonishing Incidents, that it gives us at the same time a Pleasure of the greatest Variety, and of the greatest Simplicity, uniform in its Nature, tho' diversified in the Execution.

<sup>3</sup> Poetics V § 3. In arguing the superiority of Tragic to Epic Poetry, Aristotle says, 'there is less Unity in all Epic unumquam as appears from this — that any Epic Poem will furnish matter for several Tragedies. The Iliad, for example, and the Odyssey, contain many such subordinate parts, each of which has a certain Magnitude and Unity of its own, yet is the construction of those Poems so perfect, and as nearly approaching to the imitation of a single action, as possible' charging it Milton's Action is enriched with such a Variety of Circumstances, that I have taken as much Pleasure in reading the Contents of his Books as in the best invented Story I ever met with. It is possible, that the Traditions, on which the Ilfad and Æneid were built, had more Circumstances in them than the History of the Fall of Man, as it is related in Scripture. Besides, it was easier for Homer and Virgil to dash the Truth with Fiction, as they were in no danger of offending the Religion of their Country by it. But as for Milton, he had not only a very few Circumstances upon which to raise his Poem but was also obliged to proceed with the greatest Caution in every thing that he added out of his own Invention. And, indeed, notwithstanding all the Reservations I was under, he has filled his Story with so many surprising Incidents, which bear so close an Analogy with what is delivered in Holy Writ, that it is capable of pleasing the most delicate Reader, without giving Offence to the most scrupulous.

The modern Critics have collected from several Hints in the Ilfad and Æneid the Species of Time, which is taken up by the Action of each of those Poems but as a great Part of Milton's Story was transacted in Regions that lie out of the Reach of the Sun and the Sphere of Day, it is impossible to gratify the Reader with such a Calculation, which indeed would be more curious than instructive none of the Critics either Ancient or Modern, having laid down Rules to circumscribe the Action of an Epic Poem with any determin'd Number of Years, Days or Hours.

This Part of Criticism on Milton's Paradise Lost shall be carried on in the following [Saturday's] Papers

It is not that I think I have been more witty than I ought to be, that at present I wholly forbear any Attempt towards it. I am of Opinion that I ought sometimes to lay before the World the plain Letters of an, Correspondents in the artless Dress in which they hastily send them, that the Reader may see I am not Accuser and Judge my self, but that the Indecent is properly and fairly laid, before I proceed against the Criminal.

A friend of mine the other Night upbraiding what a graceful Lout Mr H has made, one of these Nose-wingers overhanging him, I pinched him by the nose. I was in the Pit the other Night, (when it was very much crowded) a Gentleman leaning upon me, and very heavily, I very civilly requested him to remove his Hand, for which he pulled me by the Nose. I would not resent it in so publick a Place, because I was unwilling to create a Disturbance. But have since reflected upon it as a thing that is unbecomingly and dishonourable, renders the Nose puller odious, and makes the Person pulled by the Nose look little and contemptible. This Grievance I humbly request you would endeavour to redress.

Mr SPECTATOR,

Your Discourse of the 29th of December on Love and Marriage is of so useful a Kind, that I cannot forbear adding my Thoughts to yours on that Subject. Methinks it is a Misfortune, that the Marriage State, which in its own Nature is adapted to give us the completest Happiness, this Life is capable of, should be so uncomfortable to so many as it daily proves. But the Mischief generally proceeds from the unwise Choice People make for themselves, and Expectation of Happiness from Things not capable of giving it. Nothing, but the good Qualities of the Person beloved can be a Foundation for a Love of Judgment and Discretion, and whoever expects Happiness from any Thing but Virtue, Wisdom, Good Humour, and a Similitude of Manners, will find themselves widely mistaken. But how few are there who seek after these things, and do not rather make Riches their chief if not their only Aim? How rare is it for a Man, when he engages himself in the Tangles of Marriage, to place his Hopes of living much such a Woman a constant, agreeable Companion? One who will divide his Cares and double his Joys? Who will manage that Share of his Estate he intrusts to her Conduct with Prudence and Industry, govern his House with Oeconomy and Discretion, and be an Ornament to himself and Family? Where shall we find the Man who looks out for one who places her chief Happiness in the Practice of Virtue, and makes her Duty her continual Pleasure? No Man rather seeks for Money as the Complement of all their Desires, and regardless of what kind of Wives they take, they think Riches will be a Minister to all kind of Pleasures and enable them to keep Mistresses, Horse, Houses, to drink, feast, and game with their Companions, pay their Debts contracted by former I extravagant, or some such vile and unworthy End, and indulge themselves in Pleasures which are a Shame and Scandal to humane Nature. Now as for the Women, how few of them are there who place the Happiness of their Marriage in the having a wise and virtuous Friend? one who will be faithful and just to all

<sup>1</sup> [or]

'and constant and loving to them? who with Care and Diligence will look after and improve the Estate, and without grudging allow whatever is prudent and convenient? Rather, how few are there who do not place their Happiness in outshining others in Pomp and Show? and that do not think within themselves when they have married such a rich Person, that none of their Acquaintance shall appear so fine in their Equipage, so adorned in their Persons, or so magnificent in their Furniture as themselves? Thus their Heads are filled with vain Ideas, and I heartily wish I could say that Equipage and Show were not the Chief Good of so many Women as I fear it is.

'After this Manner do both Sexes deceive themselves, and bring Reflections and Disgrace upon the most happy and most honourable State of Life, whereas if they would but correct their depraved Taste, moderate their Ambition, and place their Happiness upon proper Objects, we should not find Felicity in the Marriage State such a Wonder in the World as it now is.

'Sir, if you think these Thoughts worth inserting [amongst] your own, be pleased to give them a better Dress, and let them pass abroad, and you will oblige

MR SPECTATOR,

'As I was this Day walking in the Street, there happened to pass by on the other Side of the Way a Beauty, whose Charms were so attracting that it drew my Eyes wholly on that Side, in so much that I neglected my own Way, and chanced to run my Nose directly against a Post which the Lady no sooner perceived, but fell out into a Fit of Laughter, though at the same time she was sensible that her self was the Cause of my Misfortune, which in my Opinion was the greater Aggravation of her Crime. I being busy wiping off the blood which trickled down my Face, had not Time to acquaint her with her Barbruity, as also with my Resolution, viz never to look out of my Way for one of her Sex more. Therefore, that your humble Servant may be revenged, he desires you to insert this in one of your next Papers, which he hopes will be a Warning to all the rest of the Women Gazers, as well as to poor

—Ero rarissima rostro Sua plicatas— Ovid.

I WAS this Morning surprised with a great knocking at the Door, when my Landlady's Daughter came up to me, and told me, that there was a Man below desired to speak with me. Upon my asking her who it was, she told me it was a very grave elderly Person, but that she did not know his Name. I immediately went down to him, and found him to be the Coachman of my worthy Friend Sir ROGER DE COFFLEY. He told me that his Master came to Town last Night, and would be glad to take a Turn with me in Grays-Inn Walks. As I was wondering in my self what had brought Sir ROGER to Town, not having lately received any Letter from him, he told me that his Master was come up to get a Sight of Prince Eugene,<sup>1</sup> and that he desired I could immediately meet him.

I was not a little pleased with the Curiosity of the old Knight, though I did not much wonder at it, having heard him say more than once in private Discourse, that he looked upon Prince Eugene (for so the Knight always calls him) to be a greater Man than Scanderbeg.

<sup>3</sup> Prince Eugene was at this time in London, and caressed by courtiers who had wished to prevent his coming, for he was careful to mark his friendship for the Duke of Marlborough, who was the subject of hostile party intrigues. During his visit he and godfather to Steele's second son, who was named, after him, Eugene.

I was no sooner come into Gray's Inn Walks, but I heard my I friend upon the Terrace hemming twice or thrice to himself with great Vigour for he loves to clear his Pipes in good Air (to make use of his own Phrase) and is not a little pleased with any one who takes notice of the Strength which he still exerts in his Morning Hems.

I was touched with a secret Joy at the Sight of the good old Man, who before he saw me was engaged in Conversation with a Lady, to whom he had asked an Alm of him. I could hear my I friend chide him for not finding out some Work, but at the same time saw him put his Hand in his Pocket and give him Six pence.

Our Salutations were very hearty on both sides, consisting of many kind Shakes of the Hand and several affectionate Looks which we cast upon one another. After which the Knight told me my good Friend his Chaplain was very well, and much at my Service, and that the Sunday before he had made a most incomparable Sermon out of Dr Berron. I have left says he, all my Affairs in his Hands, and being willing to lay in Obligation upon him, have deposited with him thirty Marks, to be distributed among his poor Parishioners.

He then proceeded to acquaint me with the Welfare of Will White. Upon which he put his Hand into his Job and presented me in his Name with a Tobacco Stopper, telling me that Will had been busy all the Beginning of the Winter in turning great Quantities of them, and that he made a Present of one to every Gentleman in the Country who has good Principles and smokes. He added, that poor Will was at present under great Tribulation, for that Tour Lauch had taken the Law of him for cutting some Hazel Sticks out of one of his Hedges.

Among other Pieces of News which the Knight brought from his Country Seat, he informed me that John White was dead, and that about a Month after her Death. Wind was so very high, that it blew down the Lid of one of his Barrels. But for my own part, says Sir Roger, I do not think that the old Woman had any hand in it.

He afterwards fell into an Account of the Diversion which had passed in his House during the Holidays for Sir Roger after the laudable Custom of his Ancestors, always keeps open House at Christmas. I learned from him that he had killed eight fat Hogs for the Season, that he had dealt about his Chimes very liberally amongst his Neighbours, and that in particular he had sent a string of Hogs puddings with a pack of Cards to every poor Family in the Parish. I have often thought, says Sir Roger, it happens very well that Christmas should fall out in the Middle of the Winter. It is the most dead uncomfortable Time of the Year, when the poor People would suffer very much from their Poverty and Cold, if they had not good Cheer warm Fires, and Christmas Gambols to support them. I love to rejoice their poor Hearts at this season, and to see the whole Village merry in my great Hall. I allow a double Quantity of Malt to my small Beer, and set it running for twelve Days to every one that calls for it. I have always a Piece of cold Beef and a Mince Pye upon the Table, and am wonderfully pleased to see my Tenants pass away a whole Evening in playing their innocent Tricks, and muttering one another. Our I friend Will is as merry as any of them, and shews a thousand roguish Tricks upon these Occasions.

I was very much delighted with the Reflection of my old Friend, which carried so much Goodness in it. He then launched out into the Praise of the late Act of Parliament for securing the Church of England, and told me, with great Satisfaction, that he believed it already began to take Effect, for that a rigid Dissenter, who chanced to dine at his House on Christmas Day, had been observed to eat very plentifully of his Plumb porridge.

After having dispatched all our Country Matters, Sir Roger made several Inquiries concerning the Club, and particularly of his old Antagonist Sir Augustus. He asked me with a kind of Smile, whether Sir Augustus had not taken Advantage of his Absence, to vent among them some of his Republican Doctrines, but soon recovered upon his Countenance into a more than ordinary seriousness, Tell me truly says he, don't you think Sir Augustus had a Hand in the Pope's Procession?—but without giving me time to answer him, Well, well, says he, I know you are a wary Man, and do not care to call of publick Matters.

The Knight then asked me, if I had seen Prince Eugene, and made me promise to get him a Strand in some convenient Place where he might have a full Sight of that extraordinary Man, whose Presence does so much Honour to the British Nation. He dwelt very long on the Praises of this Great General, and I found that, since I was with him in the Country, he had drawn many Observations together out of his reading in Antiquary's Chronicle, and other Authors, [who?] always he in his Hall Window, which very much redound to the Honour of this Prince.

Having passed over the greatest Part of the Morning in hearing the Knight's Reflections, which were partly private, and partly political, he asked me if I would smoke a Pipe with him over a Dish of Coffee at Squire's. As I love the old Man, I take Delight in complying with every thing, that is agreeable to him, and accordingly went on him to the Coffee-house, where his venerable Figure drew upon us the Eyes of the whole Room. He had no sooner seated himself at the upper End of the high Table, but he called for a clean Pipe, a Paper of Tobacco, a Dish of Coffee, a Warm Candle, and the Supplement with such an Air of Cheerfulness and Good-humour, that all the Boys in the Coffee-room (who seemed to take pleasure in serving him) were at once employed on his several Errands, insomuch that no Body else could come at a Dish of Tea till the Knight had got all his Conveniences about him.

ing This very one Character of Sir Roger, as silly as it really is, has done more towards the Dispragment of Holy Orders, and consequently of Virtue it self, than all the Wit that Author or any other could make up for in the Conduct of the longest Life after it. I do not pretend, in saying this, to give myself Airs of more Virtue than my Neighbours, but assert it from the Principles by which Mankind must always be governed. Silles of Imagination are to be overlook'd, when they are committed out of Warmth in the Recommendation of what is Praise worthy, but a deliberate advancing of Vice, with all the Wit in the World, is as ill an Action as any that comes before the Magistrate, and ought to be received as such by the People T

I RECEIVE a double Advantage from the Letters of my Correspondents, first as they shew me which of my Papers are most acceptable to them and in the next place as they furnish me with Materials for new Speculations. Sometimes indeed I do not make use of the Letter it self, but form the Hints of it into Plans of my own Invention, sometimes I take the Liberty to change the Language or Thought into my own Way of Speaking and Thinking, and always (if it can be done without Prejudice to the Sense) omit the many Compliments and Applauses which are usually bestowed upon me

Besides the two Advantages above mentioned which I receive from the Letters that are sent me, they give me an Opportunity of languishing out my Paper by the skilful Management of the subscribing Part at the End of them, which perhaps does not a little conduce to the Ease, both of my self and Reader

Some will have it, that I often write to my self, and am the only punctual Correspondent I have. This Objection would indeed be material, were the Letters I communicate to the Publick stuffed with my own Commendations and if, instead of endeavouring to divert or instruct my Readers, I admired in them the Beauty of my own Performances. But I shall leave these wise Conjecturers to their own Imaginations, and produce the three following Letters for the Entertainment of the Day

SIR,

'I was last Thursday in an Assembly of Ladies where there were Thirteen different coloured Hoods. Your Spectator of that Day lying upon the Table, they ordered me to read it to them, which I did with a very clear Voice, till I came to the Greek Verse at the End of it. I must confess I was a little startled at its popping upon me so unexpectedly. However, I covered my Confusion as well as I could, and after having mutter'd two or three hard Words to my self, laugh'd heartily, and cried, A very good Jest, Faith. The Ladies desired me to explain it to them, but I begged their pardon for that, and told them, that if it had been proper for them to hear, they may be sure the Author would not have wrapp'd it up in Greek. I then let drop several Expressions, as if there was something in it that was not fit to be spoken before a Company of Ladies. Upon which the Matron of the Assembly, who was dressed in a Cherry-coloured Hood, commended the Discretion of the Writer for having thrown his filthy Thoughts into Greek, which was likely to corrupt but few of his Readers. At the same time she declared herself very well pleased, that he had not given a decisive Opinion upon the new-fashioned Hoods. For to tell you truly, says she, I was afraid he would have made us ashamed to shew our Heads. Now, Sir, you must know, since this unlucky Accident happened to me in a Company of Ladies, among whom I passed for a most ingenious Man, I have consulted one who is well versed in the Greek Language, and he assures me upon his Word, that your late Quotation means no more, than that Manners and not Dress are the Ornaments of a Woman. If this comes to the knowledge of my Female Admirers, I shall be very hard put to it to bring myself off handsomely. In the mean while I give you this Account, that you may take care hereafter not to betray any of your Well wishers into the like Inconveniences. It is in the Number of these that I beg leave to subscribe my self,

Tom Trappit

Mr SPECTATOR,

Your Readers are so well pleased with your Character of Sir ROGER DE COVERLEY, that there appeared a sensible Joy in every Coffee-house, upon hearing the old Knight was come to Town. I am now with a Knot of his Admirers, who make it their joint Request to you, that you would give us publick Notice of the Window or Balcony where the Knight intends to make his Appearance. He has already given great Satisfaction to several who have seen him at Squire's Coffee-house. If you think fit to place your short Face at Sir ROGER's Left Elbow, we shall take the Hint, and gratefully acknowledge so great a Favour

MR SPECTATOR,

THE Occasion of this Letter is of so great Importance, and the Circumstances of it such, that I know you will but think it just to insert it, in Preference of all other Matters that can present themselves to your Consideration I need not, after I have said this, tell you that I am in Love The Circumstances of my Passion I shall let you understand as well as a disordered Mind will admit That cursed Pickthank Mrs Fane! Alas, I am railing at one to you by her Name as familiarly as if you were acquainted with her as well as myself But I will tell you all, as fast as the alternate Interruptions of Love and Anger will give me Leave There is a most agreeable young Woman in the World whom I am passionately in Love with, and from whom I have for some space of Time received as great Marks of Favour as were fit for her to give, or me to desire The successful Progress of the Affair of all others the most essential towards a Man's Happiness, gave a new Life and Spirit not only to my Behaviour and Discourse, but also a certain Grace to all my Actions in the Commerce of Life in all Things tho' never so remote from Love You know the predominant Passion spreads its self thro' all a Man's Transactions, and exalts or depresses [him] according to the Nature of such Passion But alas, I have not yet begun my Story, and what is making Sentences and Observations when a Man is pleading for his Life? To begin then This Lady has corresponded with me under the Names of Love, she my Belinda, I her Cleanthes Tho' I am thus well got into the Account of my Affair, I cannot keep in the Thread of it so much as to give you the Character of Mrs Fane, whom I will not hide under a borrowed Name but let you know that this Creature has been since I knew her very handsome, (tho' I will not allow her even she has been for the future) and during the Time of her Bloom and Beauty was so great a Tyrant to her Lovers, so over-valued her self and under-rated all her Pretenders, that they have deserted her to a Man, and she knows no Comfort but that common one to all in her Condition, the Pleasure of interrupting the Amours of others It is impossible but you must have seen several of these Volunteers in Malice, who pass their whole Time in the most labourous Way of Life in getting Intelligence, running from Place to Place with new Whispers, without reaping any other Benefit but the Hopes of making others as unhappy as themselves Mrs Fane happened to be at a Place where I, with many others well acquainted with my Passion for Belinda, passed a Christmas-Evening There was among the rest a young Lady so free in Mirth, so amiable in a just Reserve that I commended it, I wrong her to call it a Reserve, but there appeared in her a Mirth or Cheerfulness which was not a Forbearance of more immoderate Joy, but the natural Appearance of all which could flow from a Mind possessed of an Habit of Innocence and Purity I must have utterly forgot Belinda to have taken no Notice of one who was growing up to the same womanly Virtues which shine to Perfection in her, had I not distinguished one who seemed to promise to the World the same Life and Conduct with my faithful and lovely Belinda When the Company broke up, the fine young Thing permitted me to take Care of her Home Mrs Fane saw my particular Regard to her, and was informed of my attending her to her Father's House She came early to Belinda the next Morning, and asked her if Mrs Such-a one had been with her? No If Mr Such-a one's Lady? No Nor your Cousin Such-a one? No Lord, says Mrs Fane, what is the Friendship of Woman?— Nay, they may laugh at it And did no one tell you any thing of the Behaviour of your Lover Mr What d'ye call last Night? But perhaps it is nothing to you that he is to be married to young Mrs — on Tuesday next? Belinda was here ready to die with Rage and Jealousy Then Mrs Fane goes on I have a young Kinsman who is Clerk to a Great Conveyancer, who shall shew you the rough Draught of the Marriage Settlement The World says her Father gives him Two Thousand Pounds more than he could have with you I went innocently to wait on Belinda as usual, but was not admitted I writ to her, and my Letter was sent back unopened Poor Betty her Maid, who is on my Side, has been here just now blubbering, and told me the whole Matter She says she did not think I could be so base and that she is now odious to her Mistress for having so often spoke well of me, that she dare not mention me more All our Hopes are placed in having these Circumstances in Urgency or Leisure, or indeed in the whole Circle of Nature.

Mistake was so sensible of this Defect in the Subject of his Poem, and of the few Characters it would afford him that he has brought it into it two Authors of a Shadowy and Faint Nature, in the Persons of Sir and De, by which means he has wrought it into the Body of his Fable a very beautiful and well invented Allegory. But notwithstanding the Fineness of this Allegory may atone for it in some measure I can not think that Persons of such a Chymical Existence are proper Actors in an Epic Poem because there is not that measure of Probability annexed to them which is requisite in Writings of this kind, as I shall shew more at large hereafter.]

I regret that I did not admit Faustus as an Actor in the Tragedy but the Part he acts is very short, and none of the most admirable Circumstances in that Dramatic Work. We find in Mock Heroic Poets particularly in the Disasters, several Allegorical Persons of this Nature

‘the greatest and most daring Geniuses that have appeared in the World and who has made his countenance a glorious present of the most lofty, but most irregular Poem that has been produced by the Mind of Man. That great Man had a desire to give the World something like an Epic Poem. In his resolve at the same time to break it to the Rules of Aristotle. So that he was ignorant of being or contented them. Mil on was the hero, who in the space of almost 4000 years resolved for his Country his Honour and his own, to preserve the World in its Original Poem. That is to say, a Poem that should have his own thoughts his own images, and his own spirit. In order to this he was resolved to write a Poem, that by virtue of its extraordinary Subject, cannot so properly be said to be against the Rules as it may be affirmed to be above them all. We shall now shew for what Reasons the choice of Mil on as Subject as it set him free from the obligation which he lay under to the Poetical Laws, so it necessarily threw him upon new Thoughts, new Images and in Original Spirit. In the next place we shall shew that his Thoughts, his Images and by consequence too, his Spirit are actually new and different from those of Homer and Virgil. Thirdly, we shall shew, that besides their Newness, they have visibly the Advantage of Homer and Virgil.’

<sup>3</sup> Sir Samuel Garth in his Disasters, a mock heroic poem upon a dispute, in 1697 among doctors over the setting up of a Dispensary in a room of the College of Physicians for relief of the sick poor, he uses the God of Sloth within the College, and outside, among other allegorical personifications Disease as a Fury to whom the erases of the Dispensary offer what our Poet calls in his Disasters, a mock heroic poem written in 1673 on a dispute between two churches personages of the chapter of a church in Paris, la Sainte Chapelle as to the possession of a pulpit, had with some minor allusions, chiefly personified Discord and more her which are very beautiful in those Compositions, and may, perhaps be used as an Argument that the Authors of it were of Opinion, [such] Characters might have a place in an Epic Work. For my own part, I should be glad the Reader would think so, for the sake of the Poem I am now examining, and must further add, that if such cryptic truths and all beings may be ever made use of on this Occasion, never were any more nicely imagined and employed in more proper Actions, than those of which I am now speaking.

Another Principal Actor in this Poem is the great Enemy of Mankind. The Part of Urgency in Homer's Odyssey is very much admired by Artists as perplexing that Fable with very agreeable Plot and Intricacies, not only by the many Adventures in his Voyage and the subtilty of his Behaviour, but by the various Concealments and Discoveries of his Person in several Parts of that Poem. In the Craft being I have now mentioned makes a much larger Voyage than Ulysses passes in practice many more Wiles and Stratagems and hides himself under a greater Variety of Shapes and Appearances all of which are severely detected, to the great Delight and Surprise of the Reader.

We may likewise observe with how much Art the Poet has varied several Characters of the Persons that speak to his infernal Assembly. On the contrary, how has he represented the whole Godhead exerting itself towards Man in useful Benevolence under the Three fold Distinction of a Creator, a Redeemer and a Comforter.

Nor must we omit the Person of Raphael who amidst his Tenderness and Friendship for Man shows such a Dignity and Condescension in all his Speech and Behaviour as are suitable to a Superior Nature. [The Angels are indeed as much diversified in Paradise, and distinguished by their proper Virtues, as the Gods are in Homer or Virgil. The Reader will find no more ascribed to Uriel, Gabriel, Micahel, or Raphael which is not in a particular manner suitable to their respective Characters.]

There is one particular Circumstance in the principal Actors of the First and Second which gives a [peculiar] Beauty to those two Poems, and was therefore contrived with very great Judgment. I mean the Authors having chosen for their Heroes, Persons who were so nearly related to the People for whom they wrote. Julius was a Greek and Æneas the very Founder of Rome. By this means their Countrymen (whom they principally proposed to themselves for their Readers) were particularly attentive to all the Parts of their Story and sympathized with their Heroes in all their Adventures. A Poet could not but rejoice in the Escapes, Successes and Victories of Æneas, and be grieved at any Defeat. Misfortunes or Disappointments that befel him as a enter into the form of an old piece or, very much as in Garth's poem the First Case

Greek must have had the same Regard for Achilles. And it is plain, that each of those Poems have lost this great Advantage, among those Readers to whom their Heroes are as Strangers, or indifferent Persons.

Milton's Poem is admirable in this respect, since it is impossible for any of its Readers, whatever Nation, Country or People he may belong to, not to be related to the Persons who are the principal Actors in it, but what is still infinitely more to its Advantage, the principal Actors in this Poem are not only our Progenitors, but our Representatives. We have an actual Interest in every thing they do, and no less than our utmost Happiness is concerned, and lies at Stake in all their Behaviour.

I shall subjoin as a Corollary to the foregoing Remark, an admirable Observation out of Aristotle, which hath been very much misrepresented in the Quotations of some Modern Critics. 'If a Man of perfect and consummate Virtue falls into a Misfortune, it raises our Pity, but not our Terror, because we do not fear that it may be our own Case, who do not resemble the Suffering Person.' But as that great Philosopher adds, 'If we see a Man of Virtue mixt with Infirmitie, fall into any Misfortune, it does not only raise our Pity but our Terror, because we are afraid that the like Misfortunes may happen to ourselves, who resemble the Character of the Suffering Person.'

I shall take another Opportunity to observe, that a Person of an absolute and consummate Virtue never be introduced in Tragedy, and shall only remark in this Place, that the foregoing Observation of Aristotle, tho' it may be true in other Occasions, does not hold in this, because in the present Case, though the Persons who fall into Misfortune are of the most perfect and consummate Virtue, it is not to be considered as what may possibly be, but what actually is our own Case, since we are emburk'd with them on the same Bottom, and must be Partakers of their Happiness or Misery.

In this, and some other very few Instances, Aristotle's Rules for Epic Poetry (which he had drawn from his Reflections upon Homer) cannot be supposed to quadrate exactly with the Heroic Poems which have been made since his Time, since it is plain his Rules would (still have been) more perfect, could he have perused the Aeneid, which was made some hundred Years after his Death.

In my next, I shall go through other Parts of Milton's Poem, and hope that what I shall there advance, as well as what I have already written, will not only serve as a Comment upon Milton, but upon Aristotle.

*Audire est operae pretium, procedere recte
Qui necis non vultis*—— Hor

I HAVE upon several Occasions (that have occurred since I first took into my Thoughts the present State of Fornication) weighed with my self, in behalf of guilty Females, the Impulses of Flesh and Blood, together with the Arts and Gallantries of crafty Men, and reflect with some Scorn that most Part of what we in our Youth think gay and polite, is nothing else but an Habit of indulging a Prurency that Way. It will cost some Labour to bring People to so lively a Sense of this, as to recover the nearly Modesty in the Behaviour of my Men Readers, and the bashful Grace in the Faces of my Women, but in all Cases which come into Debate, there are certain things previously to be done before we can have a true Light into the Subject Matter, therefore it will, in the first Place, be necessary to consider the impotent Venechers and industrious Hagg, who are supplied with, and are constantly supplying new Sacrifices to the Devil of Lust. You are to know then, if you are so happy as not to know it already, that the great Harack which is made in the Habitations of Beauty and Innocence, is committed by such as can only live waste and not enjoy the Soil. When you observe the present State of Vice and Virtue, the Offenders are such as one would think should have no Impulse to what they are pursuing as in Business, you see sometimes Fools pretend to be Knaves so in Pleasure, you will find old Men set up for Venechers. This latter sort of Men are the great Basis and Fund of Inquiry in the Kind we are speaking of. You shall have an old rich Man often receive Scravins from the several Quarters of the Town, with Descriptions of the new Wares in their Hands, if he will please to send Word when he will be waited on. This Interview is contrived, and the Innocent is brought to such Indecency as from Time to Time banish Shame and raise Desire. With these Preparatives the Hagg break their Wards by little and little, till they are brought to lose all Apprehensions of what shall befall them in the Possession of younger Men. It is a common Postscript of an Hagg to a young Fellow whom he invites to a new Woman, She has, I assure you, seen none but old Mr Such-a-one. It pleases the old Fellow that the Nymph is brought to him unadorned, and from his Bounty she is accommodated with enough to dress her for other Lovers. This is the most ordinary Method of bringing Beauty and Poverty into the Possession of the Town. But the particular Cases of kind Keepers, skilful Pimps, and all others who drive a separate Trade, and are not in the general Society or Commerce of Sin, will require distinct Consideration. At the same time that we are thus severe on the Abandoned, we are apt to represent the Case of others with that Mitigation as the Circumstances demand. Calling Names does no Good to speak worse of any thing than it deserves, does only take off from the Credit of the

<sup>1</sup> Poetics II § 12 But Addison misquotes the first clause Aristotle says that when a wholly virtuous man falls from prosperity into adversity, 'this is neither terrible nor pitious, but (μικρον) shocking.' Then he adds, that our pity is excited by undeserved misfortune, and our terror by 'some resemblance between the sufferer and ourselves.'

Accuser, and has implicitly the Force of an Apology in the Behalf of the Person accused. We shall therefore, according as the Circumstances differ, vary our Appellations of these Criminals. Those who offend only against themselves, and are not Scandals to Society, but out of Deference to the sober Part of the World, have so much Good left in them as to be ascribed, must not be huddled in the common Word due to the worst of Women but Regard is to be had to their Circumstances when they fell, to the uneasy Perplexity under which they lived under senseless and severe Parents, to the Importunity of Poverty, to the Violence of a Passion in its Beginning well grounded, and all other Alterations which make unhappy Women resign the Characteristick of their Sex, Modesty. To do otherwise than thus, would be to act like a Pedantick Stoick, who thinks all Crimes alike, and not like an impartial SPECTATOR, who looks upon them with all the Circumstances that diminish or enhance the Guilt. I am in Hopes, if this Subject be well pursued, Women will hereafter from their Infancy be treated with an Eye to their future State in the World, and not have their Tempers made too untractable from an improper Sourness or Pride, or too complying from Familiarity or Forwardness contraited at their own Houses. After these Hints on this Subject, I shall end this Paper with the following genuine Letter, and desire all who think they may be concerned in future Speculations on this Subject, to send in what they have to say for themselves for some Incidents in their Lives, in order to have proper Allowances made for their Conduct.

MR SPECTATOR, January 5, 1711.
The Subject of your Yesterday's Paper is of so great Importance, and the thorough handling of it may be so very useful to the Preservation of many an innocent young Creature, that I think every one is obliged to furnish you with what Lights he can, to expose the pernicious Arts and Practices of those unnatural Women called Bawds. In order to this the enclosed is sent you, which is verbatim the Copy of a Letter written by a Bawd of Figure in this Town to a noble Lord. I have concealed the Names of both, my Intention being not to expose the Persons but the Thing.

I am,
SIR,
Your humble Servant

My Lord,
I having a great Esteem for your Honour, and a better Opinion of you than of any of the Quality, makes me acquaint you of an Affair that I hope will oblige you to know. I have a Niece that came to Town about a Fortnight ago. Her Parents being lately dead she came to me, expecting to be found in so good a Condition as to set her up in a Milliner's Shop. Her Father gave fourscore Pounds with her for five Years. Her Time is out, and she is not sixteen. A pretty black Gentlewoman as ever you saw, a little Woman, which I know your Lordship likes well shaped, and as fine a Complexion for Red and White as ever I saw, I doubt not

'but your Lordship will be of the same Opinion. She designs to go down about a Month hence except I can provide for her, which I cannot at present. Her Father was once with whom all he had died with him, so there is four Children left destitute, so if your Lordship thinks fit to make an Appointment where I shall wait on you with my Niece, by a Line or two, I stay for your Answer for I have no Place fitted up since I left my House, fit to entertain your Honour. I told her she should go with me to see a Gentleman a very good Friend of mine, so I desire you to take no Notice of my Letter by reason she is ignorant of the Ways of the Town. My Lord, I desire if you meet us to come alone, for upon my Word and Honour you are the first that ever I mentioned her to. So I remain,

Your Lordship's
Most humble Servant to Command

'I beg of you to burn it when you've read it.

tribus Anticyris caput insanabile

Juv

I WAS Yesterday engaged in an Assembly of Virtuoso's, where one of them produced many curious Observations which he had lately made in the Anatomy of an Human Body. Another of the Company communicated to us several wonderful Discoveries, which he had also made on the same Subject, by the Help of very fine Glasses. This gave Birth to a great Variety of uncommon Remarks, and furnished Discourse for the remaining Part of the Day.

The different Opinions which were started on this Occasion, presented to my Imagination so many new Ideas, that by mixing with those which were already there, they employed my Fancy all the last Night, and composed a very wild Extravagant Dream.

I was invited, methought, to the Dissection of a Beast's Head and of a Coguel's Heart, which were both of them laid on a Table before us. An imaginary Operator opened the first with a great deal of Nicety, which, upon a cursory and superficial View, appeared like the Head of another Man but upon applying our Glasses to it, we made a very odd Discovery, namely, that what we looked upon as Brains, were no such in reality, but an Heap of strange Materials wound up in that Shape and Texture, and packed together with wonderful Art in the several Cavities of the Skull. For, as Homer tells us, that the Blood of the Gods is not real Blood, but only something like it so we found that the Brain of a Beast is not real Brain, but only something like it.

The Pituital Gland, which many of our Modern Philosophers suppose to be the Seat of the Soul, smelt very strong of Essence and Orange-flower Water, and was encompassed with a kind of Horny Substance, cut into a thousand little Faces or Mirrors, which were imperceptible to the naked Eye, insomuch that the Soul, if there had been any here, must have been all ways taken up in contemplating her own Beauties.

We observed a long Antrum or Cavity in the Sinciput, that was filled with Ribbons, Laces and Embroidery, wrought together in a most curious Piece of Network, the Parts of which were likewise imperceptible to the naked Eye. Another of these Antrums or Cavities was stuffed with invisible Billet-doux, Love-Letters, pricked Dances, and other Trumpery of the same Nature. In another we found a kind of Powder, which set the whole Company a Sneezing, and by the Scent discovered it self to be right Spanish. The several other Cells were stored with Commodities of the same kind, of which it would be tedious to give the Reader an exact Inventory.

There was a large Cavity on each side of the Head, which I must not omit. That on the right Side was filled with Lickings, Lattices, and Fishhoods, Vows, Promises, and Protestations; that on the left with Oaths and Imprecations. There issued out a Duct from each of these Cells, which run into the Root of the Tongue, where both joined together, and passed forward in one common Duct to the Lip of it. We discovered several little Roads or Canals running from the Ear into the Brain, and took particular care to trace them out through their several Passages. One of them extended itself to a Bundle of Sonnets and little musical Instruments. Others ended in several Bladders which were filled either with Wind or Froth. But the latter Canal entered into a great Cavity of the Skull, from whence there went another Canal into the Tongue. This great Cavity was filled with a kind of Spongy Substance, which the French Anatomists call Galliatas, and the English, Nonsense.

The Skins of the Forehead were extremely tough and thick, and, what very much surprized us, had not in them any single Blood Vessel that we were able to discover, either with or without our Glasses, from whence we concluded, that the Party when alive must have been entirely deprived of the Faculty of Blushing.

The Os Cruriforme was exceedingly stuffed, and in some Places drugged with Snuff. We could not but take notice in particular of this small Muscle which is not often discovered in Dissections, and draws the Nose upwards, when it expresses the Contempt which the Owner of it has upon seeing any thing he does not like or hearing any thing he does not understand. I need not tell my learned Reader, this is that Muscle which performs the Motion so often mentioned by the Latin Poets, when they talk of a Man's cocking his Nose, or playing the Rhinoceros.

We did not find any thing very remarkable in the Eye, saving only, that the Musculi Anatomi, or, as we may transmute it into English, the Ogling Muscles, were very much worn and decayed with use, whereas on the contrary, the Elevator, or the Muscle which turns the Eye towards Heaven, did not appear to have been used at all.

I have only mentioned in this Dissection such new Discoveries as we were able to make, and have not taken any notice of those Parts which are to be met with in common Heads. As for the Skull, the Face, and indeed the whole outward Shape and Figure of the Head, we could not discern any Difference from what we observe in the Heads of other Men. We were informed, that the Person to whom this Head belonged, had passed for a Man above five and thirty Years, during which time he Eat and Drank like other People, dressed well, talked loud, laughed frequently, and on particular Occasions had acquitted himself tolerably at a Ball or an Assembly, to which one of the Company added, that a certain Knot of Ladies took him for a Wit. He was cut off in the lower of his Age by the Blow of a Parting Shovel, having been surprized by an eminent Citizen, as he was tendering some Civilities to his Wife.

When we had thoroughly examined this Head with all its Apartments, and its several kinds of Furniture, we put up the Brain, such as it was, into its proper Place, and hid it aside under a broad Piece of Scarlet Cloth, in order to be perforata, and kept in a great Repository of Dissections. Our Operator telling us that the Preparation would not be so difficult as that of another Brain, for that he had observed several of the little Pipes and Tubes which ran through the Brain were already filled with a kind of Mercurial Substance, which he looked upon to be true Quick-Silver.

He applied himself in the next Place to the Cogit's Heart, which he likewise laid open with great Dexterity. There occurred to us many Particularities in this Dissection, but being unwilling to burden my Reader's Memory too much, I shall reserve this Subject for the Speculation of another Day.

Errat non en virtus possidet honestum — Hor

MR SPECTATOR,
I HOPE you have Philosophy enough to be capable of bearing the Mention of your Faults. Your Papers which regard the fallen Part of the Fair Sex, are, I think, written with an Indelicacy, which makes them unworthy to be inserted in the Writings of a Moralist who knows the World. I cannot allow that you are at Liberty to observe upon the Actions of Mankind with the Freedom which you seem to resolve upon at least if you do, you should take along with you the Distinction of Manners of the World, according to the Quality and Way of Life of the Persons concerned. A Man of Breeding speaks of even Misfortune among Ladies without giving it the most terrible Aspect it can bear. And this Tenderness towards them, is much more to be preserved when you speak of Vices. All Mankind are so far related, that Care is to be taken, in things to which all are liable, you do not mention what concerns one in Terms which shall

'disgust another Thus to tell a rich Man of the Indigence of a Kinsman of his, or abruptly inform a virtuous Woman of the Lapse of one who till then was in the same degree of Esteem with her self, is in a kind involving each of them in some Participation of those Disadvantages 'It is therefore expected from every Writer, to treat his Argument in such a Manner, as is most proper to entertain the sort of Readers to whom his Discourse is directed It is not necessary when you write to the Lea-table, that you should draw Vices which carry all the Horror of Shame and Contempt If you punt an unpertinent Self-love, an artful Glance, an assumed Complexion, you say all which you ought to suppose they can possibly be guilty of When you talk with this Limitation, you behave your self so as that you may expect others in Conversation may second your Railery, but when you do it in a Style which every body else forbears in Respect to their Quality, they have in easy Remedy in forbearing to read you, and hearing no more of their Faults A Man that is now and then guilty of an Intemperance is not to be called a Drunkard but the Rule of polite Railery, is to speak of a Man's Faults as if you loved him Of this Nature is what was said by Cæsar When one was ruling with an uncourtly Vehemence, and broke out, What must we call him who was taken in an Intrigue with another Man's Wife? Cæsar answered very gravely, A careless Fellow This was at once a Reprimand for speaking of a Crime which in those Days had not the Abhorrence attending it as it ought, as well as an Intimation that all intemperate Behaviour before Superiors loses its Aim, by accusing in a Method unfit for the Audience A Word to the Wise All I mean here to say to you is, That the most free Person of Quality can go no further than being [a kind of] Woman and you should never say of a Man of figure worse, than that he knows the World
